If what Silver was said was right this zone's Eggman lived somewhere off the shore close to the island. And since he'd gone over to personally talk to the man, in theory, Sorun probably could have just waited for him to get back to Sorun on his own with news for whether he could actually help or not. But that was before Sorun decided to have lunch, so now he needed to expedite the process before somebody found Dave.

Since swimming around the island trying to find it wasn't ideal to Sorun, since he didn't trust himself to not get exhausted and drown at some point, he needed a boat to get there. He was planning on stealing one from somebody, but he couldn't actually find a boat anywhere. Or even so much as a dock no matter where he looked. Everywhere he searched either lead to the beach or the forested areas outside the village. And walking along the beach just lead to more beach for Sorun.

Needless to say after ten minutes of walking along the beach without so much as seeing a single boat Sorun's patience was wearing thin.

"What the hell, it's a island people live on, there's not a single boat anywhere that anybody uses?" A frustrated sigh left Sorun as he kicked at the sand underneath his feet. He lifted Yamato up, looking down on it with a mixed expression. "If I knew where the damn place was I could just make a portal there, but I can't- I can fly, goddammit, god fucking dammit."

If it were physically possible he might have might have snapped the sword in half, he was squeezing down on it so hard due to the anger Sorun felt for himself. Wasn't the first time he could have solved a simple problem if he could only remember half the things this Emerald let him do, and dammit, he wouldn't be surprised if this wouldn't be the last time. His only solace was in the fact it was a rare occurrence when somebody else saw him make these mistakes. He wasn't so sure how far he could keep going otherwise.

In a flash of blue light and particles, the sword transmuted back into the Emerald. More blue light washed over Sorun's shoulders as blue, feathered arms appeared jutting out of his back, the clawed hands resting on his shoulders.

"Ten minutes of my life I'll never get back," Sorun spitefully muttered under his breath as the Bringer Claws extended outwards. The spectral wings flapped a few times, and Sorun felt his body lift off the ground as the wings carried him away.

He decided not to go too high. Sorun wasn't that knowledgeable about weather but he knew winds on large, open places like oceans were more intense than other places. That and looking out at all the blue in front of him flying around was nauseating to Sorun. Fortunately enough he didn't even have to look that hard for what he was looking for after a few minutes of gliding around the outer perimeter of the island; it was right there. A rock island out in the distance so small it could barely even be called an island, not even a mile out. Almost the entire surface area was taken up by a large, round building with reflective, white walls. He could have taken the place for some kind of observatory. Or the lab of a crazy scientist.

Good enough.

He couldn't fly over to the place and land down on the ground fast enough, and he almost sighed out in relief when the spectral limbs were replaced by the familiar weight of a sword in his hands. Never could get used to the flying thing. Tried to avoid it as much as possible. Sorun'd prefer walking any day of the week as long as it didn't involve a headache.

There was, fortunately enough, somewhat of a path in the rocks that lead up to the... evil lab building thing he assumed Eggman lived in. On the way there Sorun expected something annoying to happen that he'd have to take five seconds to deal with. Sentry turrets popping up out of the rocks or a security patrol of robots he'd come across and have to cut down or something. Surprisingly he didn't encounter anything in the way of security on the way to the lab. There wasn't even so much as a wall surrounding the place, something that had Sorun slightly baffled as he walked right up to the lab's front door.

At least... he was pretty sure this was the front door. It was just a wall with an oval outline cut into it, so he assumed it was one of those pneumatic sliding doors. A rather imposing one too, he'd thought annoyed, since the door itself seemed to be about three or four times taller than Sorun himself. He almost cut the door in half just for that alone, but he managed to restrain himself as he thought about what to do.

"Okay, so... I thought I'd run into Silver out here but I guess not," he mumbled out, turning away from the door to take a quick glance around. Nothing but him and some rocks out here. "Eh, maybe he got lost or is already in or something, I dunno. Find him later if I need to."

He turned back to the door. A small, red button off to the side of the door caught Sorun's attention. On a first glance it might have looked like a doorbell, but knowing Eggman it probably did something else. Like open a trapdoor under Sorun's feet or something else like that, so he was hesitant to reach out and actually touch it.

Then again... that'd be something he'd expect of Eggman Prime. This was a different, and Sorun would begrudgingly admit this, more subdued Eggman. So for all intents and purposes it probably was just a doorbell, but he didn't know if it was trapped or not.

"I even wanna knock on the front door? I mean I can just... ugh, I don't know." Maybe Silver had a point and he really should just be straight with him and ask. It'd probably even go further than just fighting his way to him. But try as he might, Sorun just couldn't shake the fact it was an Eggman he was dealing with. Surely not as worse a one as his. But still. There was a principle to consider.

"... Fuck it, what do I have to lose?" Sorun asked under his breath. Silver wanted to play it peaceful; he'd get mad if he found out Sorun tried the violent route, and more than that he didn't want to accidentally jeopardize their shot of getting back home. So against his better judgement he decided to hit the doorbell. He still used the tip of Yamato's scabbard to hit the button, though, for fear the button really was trapped and would shock him.

Except it didn't. There was no electrical buzz, no traps, nothing. Sorun was almost shocked to hear the sound of a doorbell ring out once he hit the button, but was even more shocked when nothing else happened.

"Well... alright, then." He supposed he really was just going to go through the front door here.

The minute after hitting the doorbell was spent with Sorun standing there, softly rocking back and forth on his feet as he waited for something to happen. Halfway through he wondered to himself if anybody had even heard the bell ring and should try again, but he held off on not wanting to appear rude. He made the conscious decision to ring the doorbell again, though, if another few minutes passed with nothing happening.

Right as he made that decision, the front door slid open with a small whish noise. The thing on the other side that opened the door certainly was round, but it wasn't the tall scientist Sorun was expecting.

No, it was a robot. A small little thing that barely reached up to Sorun's knees, and he wasn't even sure what he was looking at. Its "body" was a red, floating hemisphere that was connected to another red hemisphere that had two blue circular lights for eyes and a bunch of rectangles for a mouth. Two hemispheres connected by a mechanical torso about as thick as one of Sorun's fingers, with two equally thin arms and hands attached to its midsection.

Seeing it, Sorun couldn't help but scratch his head. Somehow this robot looked even less threatening than the ladybug wheel thing.

"Oh! Hello there." The little robot waved a hand up at Sorun. He even sounded polite, with that quiet, refined voice of his. "I don't suppose you're here about that part we ordered? That's been due to arrive for a few weeks now."

Sorun's eyes glanced off to the side, and then looked back down at the robot. "No?"

"Ohhh..." The robot slumped forwards in visible disappointment. Sorun opened his mouth to speak, but was waved off by the machine. "No, no, it's quite alright. There's always tomorrow." The robot perked up a bit, and then said, "I do have to say, though, that today is becoming an unusual one. It's not often the Doctor gets more than one visitor to his home. Actually, it's an odd day if he even gets one visitor now that I think about it..."

Sorun straightened when he heard that. "Was the first guy a hedgehog? White fur? Goofy haircut?"

"Why, yes, that's the precisely what he looked like," the robot confirmed to him. "A, uh, bit of an odd one, him. The way he talked you would assume he doesn't even know what a package courier is."

"Yeah I don't think he does, listen, you know where he is?"

"Ah, but of course. Your friend arrived inquiring about the good Doctor. Seeing no reason to object Cubot volunteered to show him to the Doctor. Though... hrm, that was admittedly some time ago," the robot admitted to Sorun. "It's very possible he may have gotten lost and lead your friend astray along the way. That tends to happen when I'm not around to correct him."

Sorun rose a questioning eyebrow. "A robot that gets lost, huh?"

"A number of his logic subsystems are faulty, but he tries his best all the same."

"Ah-huh. And you would be...?"

The robot seemed taken back by what Sorun assumed to be an innocent question. He floated back a couple inches and held a hand in front of his static, unmoving mouth that glowed brighter whenever he spoke. "You... you want to know my name?" he asked. By how reverent his tone was one would assume he was just given a marriage proposal.

The sudden shift made Sorun warily tilt his head back. "I did until you said it like tha-"

"Oh, what a remarkable day! Nobody ever asks about me!" the small robot gushed out, loud enough to startled Sorun. Apparently noticing Sorun's distress, the robot coughed - or at least attempted a cough-like sound - into his closed hand and seemed to compose himself. "Terribly sorry, sir, but nobody here or on the main island ever really talk to me. You may refer to me as Orbot."

"... Ahh, 'cause you're all round like an orb and a robot, so you're Orbot- ah, yeah, I get it," Sorun said with a nod. "So, like, you're a buddy Eggman made when he got lonely or something?"

"Oh, no no no... well yes, but no," Orbot denied with a shake of his head. "I'm one of... and decidedly the more intelligent and refined of the pair of us... two assistant bots the Doctor created to help with his daily going-ons. The other I referred to earlier, Cubot, would be the other."

Sorun made a half-nod. "So you help him make robots?"

"Well, somebody needs to hold all the tools and spare parts. Clean the lair, make the Doctor's breakfast, sort out his clothes in the wash because that blockheaded simpleton can't remember to separate the reds from the whites..." When he noticed Sorun's blank staring Orbot cleared his nonexistent throat. "But you certainly didn't come here to hear me ramble, please, come in, come in!"

So far the tiny robot seemed nice enough, and Sorun liked to think he had a good sense for these sorts of things. He was actually somewhat surprised one of Eggman's robots of all things was being so genuine and courteous with him, but, well... it was becoming increasingly evident this Eggman really may have been of a different breed. And even so it wouldn't stop surprising Sorun.

During his inner ruminations Orbot had said something and began floating down the hall. Seeing no reason not to Sorun decided to follow the little robot, taking the time to examine the inner surroundings of the "lair", as Orbot had called it.

Calling this place a lair honestly seemed disingenuous, at least in Sorun's opinion. The place was so clean and the lights were so bright that the place was practically shining white and chrome, and yet somehow it was just bright enough not to be nauseating to Sorun's eyes. If anything the sterile environment was almost pleasant, which was baffling to think considering an Eggman built this place. It was a total stark contrast to the interior of places Sorun had been in that had been designed by the Eggman he personally knew.

Dim lights. Cold, dark metal, uncomfortable angles, tight spaces, a dreary atmosphere, the heavy stench of metal and chemicals. Any place designed by that Eggman was by default gloomy and made Sorun want to leave as soon as possible. It didn't even fully encapsulate how terrible that man was, and they were still places Sorun could never stand to be in.

This place was so far on the opposite end of the spectrum that it was almost staggering to Sorun. He dared to say it was nice . Especially when Orbot lead him into a kitchen that for all intents and purposes just looked like a really well-furnished kitchen.

Afterwards Sorun slowly blinked in confusion as he wondered why he'd been lead into a kitchen.

"Um... hey, Orbot?" Sorun asked, making Orbot pause and turned back around towards him. "Why are we in a kitchen?" He took an appraising look around the kitchen, and then looked up at the ceiling. Again, he blinked. "Man, the dude even has a skylight in here. I want a skylight."

Orbot tapped his fingers together. "Oh, well, I'd assumed you wanted something to drink after taking a trip out here, and I took your silence when I posed the question as a sign of confirmation."

Sorun winced. "U-uh, right, sorry, man, I kind of spaced out and wasn't paying attention. And thanks for the offer, but I'd really rather- well, actually those fries were super salty and now that you mentioned it I actually could go for-" He cut himself off and shook his head. "No, never mind, Orbot I really, really need to see Eggman, okay?"

"You... sound rather distressed," Orbot noted. "Heavens, I hope everything is in order."

"It's fine, I just need, well, it's, uh, you see, it's sorta complicated- look, man, can you please just take me to the guy?"

"Well... that in of itself may prove to be a difficult request to fulfill at the moment," Orbot confessed. "The Doctor is currently in the middle of his shows and doesn't like to be disturbed."

Sorun cocked his head to the side. "Are we talking cartoon-length shows here or something more along the line of a soap opera?"

"The latter."

"Aw Jesus, dude, I ain't got that kind of time," Sorun breathed out. "Listen, can you please, please just take me to him? I'll take all the heat for interrupting him, I promise, but this is super important."

It was a bit startling how a robot that couldn't change his facial expression managed to look so pensive. Mostly in the hand motions, the way he kept wringing his hands together while floating back and forth so nervously. The longer this went on the more Sorun was silently cursing Silver for ingraining the idea that a peaceful resolution was actually a viable option, which was the only reason he was bothering to go through this nonsense. But he'd gone too far and committed, and by now the sword weighing down his left hand was nothing but an uncomfortable reminder how things could go if he got desperate enough.

"Well... if you're completely sure," Orbot finally said, making some of the tension leave Sorun. "Very well, then. This way, if you would."

The small, red robot lead Sorun out from the kitchen and into more clean, white hallways. And through a couple more rooms full of technological bits and pieces Sorun couldn't even begin to classify. Some time later they wound up in what was, as far as he could see, just an ordinary living room. A living room that was about three times wider than Sorun's own living room in his house, a fact he had no choice but to begrudgingly accept.

And in the middle of the room was a sight that forced Sorun to blink his eyes a few times to clear out the obstructions that were surely messing with his vision. He didn't know how to feel when he realized he was seeing completely fine. The sight of Eggman just... sitting there on a couch. Watching TV. Eating from a bowl of potato chips next to him. Like a normal person.

"Man, this day is just weird," Sorun decided, shaking his head at what he thought was an impossible sight. The only way he'd be more baffled was if it was the Eggman he knew, and he suspected the fact he at least barely comprehended all this was because they looked completely different. But even so, it was a hard sight to accept.

"Um... thank you, Orbot, you've been very helpful." The way Sorun spoke made his voice sound distant, and he was so transfixed on the sight of Eggman he couldn't even tear his eyes away to look at the robot. "I-I'll take it from here."

Orbot nodded up at Sorun. "Of course, sir. In the meantime of you conducting your business with the good Doctor I think I will go search for your missing companion. If they haven't shown up by now I truly do fear he was lead astray by Cubot. As if that would be the first time ..." he grumbled out quietly, turning around to float out of the room. Sorun hadn't heard him, though, still so focused on Eggman as he was.

By now Sorun was contemplating how he should proceed from here. Go in with sword drawn, making demands right out the gate? Sounded reasonable, left the least amount of room for Eggman to make an aggressive act. He hadn't even noticed Sorun yet he was so engrossed in his TV show; if he really wanted to Sorun could just sneak up behind him, stab him through the couch and separate things out of his brain. That was a guaranteed win.

Yet... he'd gotten this far being nice, and by now that last option, using a katana to rewrite someone, was growing increasingly unappealing by the second the longer Sorun was here, to the point he was trying desperately to not see it as an option. But yet again past experience, all those encounters Sorun had with Eggman Prime, was screaming at Sorun that trying to peacefully talk with him was a bad idea, that somebody would get hurt as a result and he needed to attack him now to mitigate the risk. His skin was itching just being in the same room as him.

"It's not the same person," Sorun reminded himself, breathing out slowly to try and calm himself. It was working, albeit barely. "He's not an evil person, not like the other guy. Absolutely nothing about him screams evil like the other guy. And Silver's around, he wouldn't... fuck, fuck fuck fuck..."

With great apprehension, Sorun took a step forwards. He clenched his right hand to stop it from shaking due to the anxiety, but he couldn't do anything to stop it from feeling so clammy no matter how hard he tried. His feet were automatically carrying him forwards, even if Sorun's mind was still in a whirl, voices arguing with each other over what he was supposed to do, how to go forwards, if he should just talk or not, voices yelling at each other over trusting the man in the couch even though every instinct Sorun had was telling him not to trust him.

He must have gotten close enough for Eggman to notice him, because eventually he turned his head from the TV to look at Sorun. "Oh, hey, other guy. How's it going?" he greeted, making Sorun freeze in his tracks. "Orbot let you in?"

"U-uh... yeah," Sorun stuttered, completely unsure as to how he was supposed to proceed.

"Cool." The scientist turned back to the TV. "You a big TV guy, Sorun?"

"Used to be," Sorun muttered.

"Ah, well sit, sit! You caught me in the middle of a commercial break, show'll pop back on any second now."

Sorun had doubts Eggman was being serious until he actually scooched over to make room for Sorun on the couch. He'd barely even made the conscious effort to move forwards and sit on the couch next to him. It was more an automatic reflex made out of morbid curiosity than anything else, the same kind of fascination that lead people horrified at the sight of a dead body to poke it. He couldn't understand what was going on but some baser, curious part of Sorun compelled him to sit down on the couch.

And so he did. Against all his better judgements. Against all the fears and warning voices. And once he did Sorun considered how terrible of a choice it was that he just made, that any second now a bunch of mechanical hands would pop up out of the floor to restrain him, or the couch would mechashift into some sort of stupid containment cell, the TV would start broadcasting some mind control beam, Orbot was just being so courteous to lull Sorun into a false sense of security because he was a robot and that was what Eggman programmed him for and now Sorun was fidgeting and breathing heavily, he made a mistake, he should have just attacked when he had the chance.

None of that happened. The commercial ended and the program switched to a bunch of Mobians on-screen talking. Eggman shifted his attention back to the screen and started eating out of the chip bowl. Sorun couldn't find it in himself to pay attention to the particulars of the show, what the characters were talking about or even the broad points of the plot. He'd noted a canned laugh track but nothing else. That and the soft crunching sound from Eggman eating the chips next to him.

It was such a surreal experience Sorun felt like he was in a fever dream. The voices warning of him danger devolved into a sputtering, confused mess he couldn't make sense of; his whole mind was like that. Stunned and confused at what was happening, shifting between states of disbelief and bafflement, drowned in incomprehensible noise.

He... really was just sitting around and chilling out.

"So you're not from around here, huh?"

The fog of confusion around Sorun only lifted up enough for him to hear, process, and respond to the question Eggman asked him. "Huh?" was all he could manage to say.

Eggman popped another chip in his mouth, and then said, "I thought about it for a bit and realized it's impossible for another human to be here. Trust me, I've looked. So you're either a time traveler from back when they were around or you're from another universe. Or a shapeshifting alien, I guess, but I mean come on, what are the odds of that?"

Somehow he couldn't fault the logic. "I'm, uhm, from another universe. Silver, too."

"White hedgehog guy?"

"Yeah."

"Called it." Eggman celebrated by throwing another chip in his mouth. "So what's your deal? You guys just going around visiting places or what?"

"No, we're... we're trying to get back home. We accidentally got dropped out of it when... well, it's Silver's home, technically, I'm not actually from there," Sorun corrected, "but I live there 'cause... stuff happened, and... uh, yeah. That's the long and short of it."

"Huh. Alright."

And that seemed to be the length of interest Eggman held on the subject, because he went right back to watching the show right after. Sorun blinked heavily, switching back and forth from the TV to Eggman, and then, fed up with feeling lost, he asked, "What is this?"

"What's what? The show?" Eggman shrugged. "It's only been running on for two seasons now but personally I feel they nail a lot of the characterization with the core cast-"

"Not the show, this ," Sorun nearly hissed through grit teeth. "This, this whole thing, what is this? What are you doing? A random stranger comes into your house and you invite them to watch TV with you?"

Sorun nearly lost it when Eggman slumped down in the couch a bit. "I don't have any friends so I thought it'd be nice, err... never got your name, what was it again?"

"I-I'm Sorun, I..." At a loss for words, Sorun tiredly mumbled out, "Aren't you supposed to be an evil scientist person?"

"I am an evil scientist." The amount of pride he had in the statement mixed with the utter lack of evidence Sorun saw on his part made him not believe him. "I got everything an evil scientist needs. Sweet evil lair, army of henchbots, I even have my own nemesis and his team of friends to contend with. What more do I need?"

"And you're evil 'cause you, what? What do you actually do?"

"Depends on what the mood is, I dunno, Sorun, I'm a mastermind. I have to mix it up every time or I get stuck in a rut," Eggman said as he ate a chip. "I enact some diabolical scheme on the town, Sonic and his friends stop me, I go out to the village every once in a while to catch lunch or a movie or something but that's about it. Otherwise I'm just kicking my feet up in my lair."

And just like that the paranoia and fear was rapidly draining out of Sorun. The slight shaking stopped, his breathing normalized, everything ceased. Now it was just Sorun staring up at Eggman in pure contemplation, followed by him making up his mind, scoffing, and sitting back against the couch.

Different zone, different rules. Something Sorun kept trying to remind himself of, but past experiences colored his perceptions too much that he couldn't help but be biased. Sitting next to the man of his ire, though, hearing him talk and what he does, it finally painted a clear picture for Sorun. He wasn't "evil" by any standard. Or if he was this whole zone's standard of "evil" was wildly below what it was on Mobius Prime, and that world's standard was already wildly, wildly below what was considered "evil" on Earth. With that kind of thinking now Sorun couldn't help but feel silly over being so worried with this Eggman. Different zone, different rules.

Hell, the multiverse was a multiverse for a reason. Infinite possibilities, he had to remind himself. For all he knew there was actually a good Eggman out there that wasn't evil in any capacity. Maybe in that Moebius place where everything was backwards.

A small shake in front of Sorun drew his attention. It was the bowl of chips, being held out to Sorun by Eggman. There was only a small amount of hesitation when Sorun took a chip and ate it. The chip was pretty good.

Well, that settled it. No person truly evil would ever offer another their share of chips.

"You're not sho' bad," Sorun said through the munching of the sole chip he'd taken from the bowl. After swallowing, he said, "Unless you're gonna tell me this is all some façade and you get off on putting people in the hospital with your robots?"

"What? Of course not!" Eggman shouted, sounding affronted. "What do you take me for, some deranged lunatic? I'm a evil genius, not a psychopath."

"Mm." Sorun's eyes drifted off to the television screen. "I really do hesitate to call you evil."

"Oh, really? Then by all means, tell me. What's your definition of evil?"

"Why ruin a good thing and tell you?"

He decided to drop the subject there and just watch the TV. Eggman didn't seem very satisfied by the answer, but he seemed to acknowledge Sorun was done with the topic, because he, too, turned back to the TV and went back to eating his chips. Once more they were left in silence, with only the odd crunching of chips to break up the sound of the program.

He disagreed with Eggman, though, now that Sorun could actually focus on the show. Characters were halfway decent, plot was shit. Once again he found himself missing Earth entertainment.

"Saw that twist comin' a mile away," Sorun thought to himself, slowly starting to mentally tune out the show the longer he watched. The movement of something slightly slipping in his grasp made him remember the katana he was holding, making Sorun turn his attention down to it. Yamato, of course, was still there in his grasp, patiently waiting. His eyes flicked back and forth from it to Eggman, and immediately new emotions welled up in him. Shame and guilt, mostly.

"I can't hurt this guy with the Yamato. I just can't. He's too nice." This was the man he'd come in here with plans to threaten, hurt, violate and irrevocably damage. Intent on twisting his very being by carving out pieces of memory and personality. He would have hesitated in doing such a thing with even Eggman Prime, to the point Sorun still doubted he'd be able to commit such a thing to that man. But this one? This Eggman? Someone who shared chips?

No. Couldn't be done. Sorun just plain refused to do it. And the more this went on the more he realized that Silver was right and they really should just ask nicely. Maybe once he actually found him they-

"Oh, hey, Sorun!" The familiar voice made Sorun's head snap up. In the entrance of the living room was Silver, who was standing there and waving at him. In front of him was the little red robot, Orbot, from earlier. And he was carrying in his arms a yellow, less round and more square counterpart whose mouth and eyes were completely dark.

Coincidentally, this was when the credits to the show on the TV began to hit. Eggman chose that time to look away, and then, upon seeing Orbot carrying the defunct cube-like robot, he set down the empty bowl and stood up from the couch.

"Orbot, there you are! What's wrong with Cubot? Don't tell me he's been sticking his finger in the electrical sockets again," Eggman groused, all but completely ignoring Silver as he stomped in front of the robot, who awkwardly shuffled off to the side near the couch where Sorun was sitting.

The small robot let out a sigh. "No, sir, according one of your guests Cubot got lost while attempting to lead him to you, and then summarily shut down all on his own. It's quite fortunate I managed to find them when I did, I assure you. The yellow fool almost wandered into the munitions vault."

"What!? I'd threaten to scrap him for parts if he was conscious enough to forget my threat! Let me see him." Eggman bent down and snatched up the yellow robot in his hands. He turned him over a few times while examining him, and then began feeling up his head. He opened a small hatch on the front of his face, peering in for a few seconds and then recoiling. "Ugh! Smells like a landfill in there. Why is there so much acid damage?"

"I believe Cubot has been getting into the battery packs and consuming them in an attempt to power himself, sir," Orbot replied.

"Again!? I ordered that childproof lock specifically so he couldn't get into the cabinet where I keep those batteries! That was weeks ago! Why haven't you installed it yet!?"

"We're still awaiting for it to arrive in the mail, sir."

"Grrr, the one time I don't pay for advanced shipping. Curse you, Stork & Co. Courier Service!"

Somehow it was more fun for Sorun to watch this exchange than the trash that was playing on the TV earlier, so he'd moved to the edge of the coach to watch Eggman and Orbot bicker over the yellow robot. Silver, who didn't seem nearly as interested, slinked closer to Sorun's side and tugged on his sleeve.

"Oh, hey, Silver," Sorun greeted, tearing his eyes away from the spectacle to face Silver. "You doing alright?"

"Huh? Oh, yeah, fine. Thanks," Silver said. "What are you doing here? I thought you wanted to sit on a beach forever because you were scared of your friend?"

He wasn't even being facetious when he said that - nothing but straight honesty poured out of Silver's mouth with that statement. It felt like a punch to the gut for Sorun, but somehow he managed to soldier on with a straight face. "I changed my mind, okay!? What, I'm not allowed to do that, change my mind, well I did, I do that a lot, my mind changed, Silver, okay, alright, I changed my mind!"

"O-okay, alright." Chuckling nervously, Silver backed up a step while facing his palms at Sorun. After, he said with a sincere smile,"Thanks for coming, Sorun."

"... Yeah."

"Confounded robot, I swear, you try to cut corners on programming an AI and this is what happens," Eggman grumbled out, stepping over to where the two were. Orbot floated a ways back, holding Cubot in his arms. "Take it from me, kids, it doesn't pay to rush these things."

"I will definitely take your word for that, Mr. Eggman," Silver promised him. "Is your friend going to be alright?"

"Eh, no, probably never, but I can fix him so it doesn't really matter," Eggman answered with a wave of his hand. "Now, why don't we get down to talking about why you two are visiting me? Not that I'm unhappy to have the company, but if you two are looking for a place to crash because you just came to this universe then you can forget it. Orbot has enough chores having to wait on one person."

"Oh, no, we're not looking for that, mister," Silver denied, shaking his head. "We... well, it's actually pretty funny, you see me and Sorun are trying to get to this specific universe, but it's, well, it's kind of far, actually, and since you're such a big genius we were hoping you could, you know... help us get there faster...?" A large, hopeful smile spread over Silver's face as he looked up at the Doctor's blue spectacles. "Pretty please?"

Eggman made a humming sound, examining Silver with a hidden expression who continued to smile at him. Then he glanced up at Sorun, who was looking at him with an otherwise impassive face. In a move that surprised both of them, he shrugged and said, "Yeah, sure, here, gimme a second."

Before any of them could respond he reached forwards and grabbed one of Silver's quills. The Mobian cried out when he plucked one free, and then turned around and walked out of the living room with Sorun staring after him and Silver rubbing at the spot his quill had been yanked out. The silent whish of a door closing marked his departure, leaving the two alone with the floating robot.

Nothing was really said between the three of them. Sorun didn't have any words, Silver looked like he wanted to start some conversation but seemed unsure of what to say, so his eyes just kept drifting between the other two. Orobot was just hovering there silently, still as a statue carrying the other robot. It was a rather uncomfortable silence, only broken up when Silver had cleared his throat at one point. Meanwhile Sorun was silently hoping Eggman actually did have some solution for them and that he and Silver would be gone before the cops found that guy he knocked out.

A few minutes of anxious waiting later and Eggman returned, holding a machine in his hands. A white, metal, box-like thing that barely fit in the two hands he was using to carry it. With a loud huff of exertion he set the metal box down on the floor, causing a loud clunk! to be heard, after which he stood up and straightened his back out, eliciting a few cracks.

"Ahh, oh yeah, there we go," Eggman groaned out. "Orbot, plug it in, would you?"

Wordlessly, the red robot hovered towards the boxy machine, and while balancing the body held with one hand reached with another to grab at an electrical plug sticking out of the side of the box. He pulled it away, revealing an extending cable spooling out of the box that Orbot carried to a nearby electrical socket. After plugging it in, a heavy whirring sound was heard from the box as it started up, and the few gaps and lines in the box's surface began glowing an intense purple.

"So... what's that?" Silver asked, eyeing the machine with interest while Sorun silently observed.

"Eh, dabbled with going to alternate universes once. Didn't really end well. Made this during one of my late-night benders before I realized going to other worlds often ends horribly so I just chucked it in my broom closet. But hey, if you guys need it I can break it out for a few minutes," Eggman explained.

"That's great, mister Eggman, but why did you pull one of my quills out?" Silver asked. He was still rubbing at that spot. "It kind of hurt."

"Different universes are beholden to different laws of physics. Usually these differences are so minute as to not matter, but it's a large factor in explaining a particular universe's makeup," Eggman said. The top of the box opened up, and a small funnel extended out from the opening. Eggman dropped the white quill in the funnel, after which a purple, holographic keyboard and screens were projected up from the box and in front of Eggman. He fixed his covered eyes on the screens and began typing on the keyboard while continuing to speak. "Every single universe has its own completely unique energy signature, and matter is really just energy with extra steps. It's like using a dosimeter to measure background radiation, and everything emits radiation, even if ninety-nine percent of it is harmless. So if I have a sample of matter from a particular universe, I can read that signature and pinpoint where in the multiverse is a universe that registers that same signature using this machine. Any evil genius worth their salt can do it, really, it's not that hard."

With skeptical eyes trained on the box, Sorun asked, "And... you can power a machine able to do all that by plugging it in a wall outlet?"

"The cold fusion reactor I have powering this place can do a lot of things, Sorun."

"Eh, alright." Sorun decided to leave it there. It seemed if there was one commonality among Eggmen across the multiverse it was that he had no idea how their inventions worked, but if it got them home he didn't really care enough to know the details.

"Mmhm, just a sec, and... wow, really?" Eggman seemed taken back by what he was reading on one of the floating screens in front of him. He turned his head to look at Sorun and Silver, visibly surprised. "You guys are from that big universe that's smack-dab in the middle of the multiverse?"

"Yep," Sorun confirmed, nodding. "That a problem?"

"Well, yeah. Now I get why you guys wanted help getting there. That place is forever away."

"You said you could get us there," Sorun reminded him, voice a tone lower.

"I thought when you said that you just needed directions or something! I didn't know it was a matter of distance! You weren't specific!" Eggman argued out. "I can give you a precise set of coordinates to where in the multiverse it is but that's the best I can do for you. This thing can't actually make a portal to other worlds. Had to trash the last invention that could because it almost blew the world up."

Coordinates. That single word alone made Sorun sit straight up on the couch he was sitting on. It was like a switch in his brain was suddenly flipped on from hearing that word; suddenly it made sense why he wasn't able to just use Yamato to cut a portal to the Prime Zone. That was it. The missing piece. Knowledge on where exactly in the big, wide multiverse his destination was.

While Silver seemed crestfallen at the news, Sorun was the exact opposite. He felt an immense wave of relief wash over him as he dared to hope that finally, finally he could get home to sleep in his own damn bed. "Oh, that's actually perfect. I can work with that," he said, sliding off the couch and walking towards Eggman. "Just gimme the coordinates and I can do the rest."

Eggman looked at Sorun oddly. "Um... if you say so." A sound was emitted from the machine, like an old printer going off. All eyes present turned towards it as a slip of paper was slowly ejected out of a slot on top of the machine. When it finished Eggman tore the slip of paper out and gave it to Sorun. "Here you go. Dunno know what exactly you're planning with it."

Taking the piece of paper in his hand, Sorun looked down at it. He didn't know what he expected; it was just an incredibly large string of numbers that was otherwise incomprehensible to his eyes in how they related to anything. A random mess of nothing, really, at least to someone like him that didn't know what he was looking at.

But knowledge of function wasn't a requirement, just knowledge of the numbers themselves. Because they clicked with him. He felt something, like a small pulse or harmless static shock from the Yamato he held trail up his arm and to his brain, and suddenly he just knew. Or more accurately, he knew he was suddenly able of doing something he previously couldn't. Something he couldn't do but had attempted. Now he could. It's what the sword was telling him.

He could open a portal to Mobius Prime with these numbers.

"... Why help us with this?" Sorun suddenly asked, looking up from the paper to Eggman. He may have been relieved beyond all relief to finally put this damned trip to an end, but it didn't help quell that question burning in his mind. "I mean don't get me wrong, I'm super grateful, but why?"

"Uh... it's not really that big a deal. Really, it's, like, five minutes out of my day," Eggman answered. He glanced up at Silver, and then leaned down closer to Sorun's face while holding his hand to the side of his mouth. "And also between you and me, Sorun, we're cool, but that Silver guy stopped all my robots with his mind and he comes off as a kind of goody-goody guy. I got enough on my plate dealing with a blue hedgehog that can run faster than sound, I don't need a white telekinetic one running around, too. That's too much work even for me, so if you could take him with you when you leave that'd be great."

"Ah." That Sorun could actually buy over Eggman doing this out of the kindness of his heart beyond it not costing him anything more than a few minutes. Accepting the answer, Sorun nodded up at the Doctor. "Sure, I get it. You don't have to worry about him much longer."

He was given a grateful look by the Doctor, who went as far as to flash him two thumbs-ups. Ignoring him, Sorun turned to Silver, who was looking at him expectantly. "Silver," he announced, "I got what I need. We can get to Mobius Prime now."

"Wait, what? Really? Really!?" In a blink Silver's eyes lit up in excitement, and a wide smile broke out on his face. "You really can now!?" he nearly screamed. His body was nearly vibrating he seemed to excited.

"Yeah, assuming I didn't get anything wrong." After pocketing the slip of paper, Sorun grasped Yamato's handle with his right hand. The sword was pulled out of the sheath, glimmering slightly in the light. Silver looked on with anticipation while Eggman and Orbot watched with curiosity.

A blue cross was cut into the air. For Sorun, it was just like opening up a portal anywhere else. He felt the location, the destination locked on as the cross folded inwards to form a blue portal hovering in front of him. That was it right there. The way back home. All that was left was to go through.

"So, uh... yeah. That's it," Sorun said, turning to Silver. "It's through there. We just need to step through and we're good."

"Wow, uh... just from the paper thing Eggman gave you?"

Sorun shrugged. "Apparently."

"Oh..." Hesitantly, Silver took a step towards the portal. He seemed just relieved as Sorun felt at the news, still smiling widely as he let out an light chuckle. "Well, that's it, then." He looked towards Eggman, smiling wide enough to show teeth while waving at him. "Thanks for everything mister Eggman and mister Orbot! We never would have made it back home without your help!"

"Er, yeah, sure, don't mention it." Visibly off-put by the compliment, all Eggman could do was awkwardly wave as Silver stepped through the portal. He watched him go, then turned his head down to Sorun. "So you just carry around a magic sword?"

"Pretty much, yeah," Sorun said. His mouth thinned a bit at the sight of the larger male, and the gratefulness he felt made him look away and towards the portal. "I can't really overstate how much you've helped us out here. It's something I can never repay, mostly 'cause I don't want to, but... yeah. Thanks. You're one of the good ones." He turned and made his way towards the portal. "Better than my Eggman at any rate."

"You know, the other guy that just left is way better at compliments than you," Eggman remarked with a dry voice.

One foot already in the portal, Sorun couldn't help but chuckle. "It just ain't my style. Neither is the long goodbyes." Taking a final glance back at Eggman, Sorun held up two fingers and flashed him a V symbol. "Been an experience. Seeya."

And after that, he disappeared through the portal.

Chapter 88

Recursion Error

Episode 88- The finish line was somehow reached

Sorun didn't really know why that portal spit them out here of all places.

By all accounts the place was completely and utterly unrecognizable to him. A shingle beach on the edge of a freshwater lake so large and vast that from just standing there he wouldn't be able to differentiate it from an ocean if it weren't for the different smell. Thing was there were precious few lakes in the world on this sort of scale. So he hadn't had to think too hard on what this place was within a second of seeing it. And there was no shaking off that sense of familiarity he felt just seeing it. The lake.

The lake...

"Well... there it is," Sorun said, mostly to himself, Silver standing behind him and silently watching. He bent down and picked up one of the numerous rocks composing the beach they were standing on. "The last piece of evidence that even some alternate version of my home ever existed. Gone."

He threw the stone. It'd gone further than he would have thought it'd gone, given the amount of strength he put in it. He watched with a lost expression as it hit the surface of the lake and sunk into the water.

It wasn't much of a surprise. He knew from reading a map, way back when Sally showed him one of the world. He'd always known it was gone here on Mobius, but it was another thing seeing it in person. Having visual evidence drive home the fact that Sorun was the last living testament that his people and culture ever existed, that, even if it would have been different in some sense, this world's version of his home hadn't even survived in a physical capacity.

Because this world's Detroit was gone. Obliterated. Annihilated. At least his was still out there. Dead and hollow, but there were still things there, things he wanted, pieces of culture that solely belonged to him now as the last living human of that zone, and now that he knew the key components to traveling between zones with Yamato he'd been silently debating grabbing the numbers to his home from Tails or Nicole and going back there. One day. Maybe. If he ever worked up the nerve.

But this Detroit, or lack thereof, was here. Or more accurately the evidence that it no longer existed was here. And all it served was a reminder to Sorun for how alone he really was.

"I don't get it," came Silver's voice, who stepped besides Sorun. He was giving the lake a confused look. "It's just a bunch of water."

"Before aliens came into the picture and the humans of this world thought it'd be the greatest idea ever to dissect their ambassador this lake used to be split up in five parts," Sorun explained as he reached for another stone. "It was a part of a country called America. Two peninsulas called Michigan that broke the lake into the five Great Lakes. They were the biggest freshwater lakes in the whole world." He threw the second stone. "My home was there. Detroit. It was the biggest city in Michigan.

"Of course then the aliens bombed the whole world with gene bombs. And either those gene bombs completely destroyed Michigan or thousands of years of continental drift and shifting tectonic plates just caused it to sink into the lakes. Or maybe some combination both, I don't know." Sorun bent down for a third rock while Silver silently listened to him, shifting his attention from the water to Sorun. "Either way it's gone, and now the five Great Lakes are this... Super Lake, I guess, that feeds into the river cutting the American landmass completely in half. Or what used to be America, at least," he mumbled, rolling the rock around in his hand.

"That's... huh," Silver said, watching as Sorun threw the rock. He turned back to Sorun and tried to give him a helpful smile. "I, er, bet it was pretty neat living next to a lake this big, huh?"

His efforts didn't bear any fruit, but Sorun breathed heavily out of his nose for the effort Silver put in anyway. Even if it didn't wipe the frown off his face. "Well, that's the thing, Silver. In all that time I never actually looked at the lake. Like really looked at it. Few passing glances, maybe, but that was it. Seeing it now, I dunno. Just feels final."

"Final?"

"I just thought... there was maybe something here, you know, something I'd recognize, the tiniest shred of something that connected me to the life I used to have before coming here." Sorun gestured out to the lake. "But there's nothing. Just a bunch of water. It's all gone."

Silver winced, and then made a sad frown as he stared out into the water. "Well, uh... maybe there's still something there?"

"Hm?" Sorun bent down to pick up another rock.

"You know, under the water!" Silver replied. He tried to sound helpful, but the forced smile he held was wavering. "You don't think we could just go down there? Maybe look for something you recognize? Hey, maybe you had a Sorun Prime that lived here and some of his stuff might be there!"

"Who cares about that guy?" Sorun asked. When he turned to glance at Silver he saw him surprised and a bit stunned, forced smile frozen on his face with wide eyes. "In all honesty I doubt there ever was a Sorun Prime. My zone was pretty unique, wasn't even connecting to the Cosmic Interstate. Don't even know if that place could be considered part of the multiverse. The Eggman from that last zone said the laws of physics are slightly different in every zone, but mine must have been really out there with no Chaos energy. Then again there is a Statue of Liberty here..."

"Eh, maybe you're right," Silver said. "We saw a bunch of different versions of Sonic and other people in those zones, but we didn't see any other Soruns."

"Mm." Sorun ran his thumb over the latest stone he'd picked up. It was flatter and more smooth than any of the other ones he'd thrown so far. "Well, in any case, even if the city did just sink into the lake it's been thousands of years. Doubt there'd be anything substantial left at this point. Worst part is Michigan didn't even get the worst of it. A bunch of island nations like the Philippines and New Zealand are straight-up gone. The only islands on that side of the world that still exist is Australia and Japan, and that last one got turned into a giant geode inhabited by rock-eating birds. I still don't know how that last one happened."

He threw the stone at the water, and in the same motion turned to Silver. Due to how quickly he'd turned Sorun wasn't able to note how the stone he'd thrown had skipped across the water's surface fifty times before sinking in.

"Anyways! I gotta announce my return. And that's... yeah, that's gonna go great," Sorun mumbled out, shoulders falling at the realization. It was only now that he was about to actually do it that he realized how nervous he was over the whole thing. What people's reactions would be, what he was even supposed to do or say, how to act. He felt anxious just trying to keep track of it all. Almost sick at the thought.

"So do you have any idea what you're going to say to them?" Silver questioned.

Shrugging, Sorun wondered, "Maybe I can go in and just act like nothing happened? 'Ah, hey guys, how's it going? Huh? Enerjak?

Yeah I dunno. Why? What's new with you?'"

Silver struggled to maintain his helpful grin. "I, um... don't, really think that'll work, Sorun. And they'll ask about me."

"Ah, yeah, you and the whole future thing." Sorun rubbed his chin in thought. "Speaking of which, should we actually tell them about the whole 'we need to prevent the apocalypse' thing?"

"Why-why wouldn't we?"

"I mean if we bring awareness of the problem to everyone won't it make it harder to predict- eh, on second thought we're already butterfly-effecting everything just by hanging around, no getting around that, I guess," Sorun reasoned with himself. He put five seconds of thought into the matter and then pointed out, "I don't really want to panic them. Plus they got their hands full with the Eggman thing-"

"So you want to lie to them?"

"Nnnno," Sorun answered with a heavy amount of hesitation. "If they ask tell them, I just don't want-"

"Well they're gonna ask where I'm from and why I'm here, Sorun, there's not really any getting around that."

"Okay, alright, we'll play it by ear." In hindsight they had a week of preparation. They probably should have used it to actually prepare for this thing, and now Sorun was finding that he felt like kicking himself for never doing so. But planning was never his strong suit anyways. "Just maybe, eh, maybe keep the traitor thing quiet? It'll do nothing but cause problems and I'm still not convinced that's actually real."

Silver made a small nod. "Okay. So where to first?"

"Where, indeed?" He gripped Yamato's sheath with both hands and stared down at it in thought. There was one place that immediately stood out to mind. "Their war with Eggman's still going on. Gotta be at least one person at the old HQ."

"Sure, but wouldn't it be easier if we just went back to the city you live in?"

Nope. Couldn't do that. Nicole lived in that place. "U-uh, well, you know, there's a lotta people there and I kinda wanna ease into this, so I say we go to the HQ first."

"Oh, okay." To Sorun's relief, Silver made a shrug of acceptance. "So we're going right now?"

Sorun's hands tightened around the sword's sheath. He looked behind him, at the lake and the horizon filled with nothing but water. The sun had just now set completely on them, and his nerves were making him on edge for this. Nevertheless, he still pulled the sword out. "Yeah," he said, his voice nearly a croak. "Sure, let's go."

"Alright. Hey, one more thing?"

Sorun looked up. "Hm?"

"I, um... so I left our backpacks back in that last zone by accident, so could we-?"

"Nope. Can't. Need the numbers and it's too far to walk."

Silver deflated at the news, but gave an accepting nod anyways. Sorun hadn't noticed, too focused on the current task at hand. It was taking him longer than usual to cut a cross into the air so it would fold into a portal. His hands shaking so hard from fear was making it more difficult than normal.

Sorun didn't have fond memories of the Freedom HQ. Fond memories of the people, maybe, but that was it. He just didn't like being there.

It was the place that he first arrived into this world from, after he'd been dragged against his will. It was the place he had to resign himself into being a Freedom Fighter in, back when he was one and hated every second of it. Just being near it was a reminder of those times, and he tried to think as little about the place as possible.

So naturally he'd do everything in his power to avoid ever going there again. But the alternative was going back to New Mobotropolis and seeing Nicole, so it was off to the HQ they went.

He didn't have a plan for what he was gonna say. Zip. Zero. Zilch. And for how nervous he was over this whole thing, when he stepped out of that portal and in that first millisecond caught a glimpse of the old HQ and was reminded how much he hated it, he realized he was about as tired as he was nervous. Maybe even more tired than nervous. Because quite frankly he was just done at this point.

With all those emotions causing a turmoil in Sorun, he hadn't stepped through the portal normally. Not with confidence, not with nervousness, eyes darting around fearfully, not even in anger at having to step foot back in this place. No, when Sorun walked through that portal his entire form was hunched forwards, sword and scabbard held so loosely they were scraping against the ground, with a facial expression that read "I don't fucking care about anything right now".

Oh, but Sonic was there, so that was good. Sitting on the couch. Holding the most comical expression of shock on his face when Sorun walked through that portal, eyes practically fixing to pop out of his head. A face that at any other time he would have laughed at, but right now Sorun just couldn't bother. So he'd only regarded the wide-eyed, frozen hedgehog sitting on the couch in front of him for a second before lazily swinging his sword behind him after Silver walked through behind him to close the portal.

"Hey, I'm back." That's all the energy Sorun could spare to say before stepping over and collapsing into a sitting position on the couch next to Sonic. He dropped the implements in his hands on the ground, causing them to flash and converge into the Emerald, and then slumped forwards on the couch while staring at the ground and hoping, praying, Sonic would just roll with it and treat his sudden resurrection like normal.

The stuttering from the other teen sitting next to him was telling him it just wasn't so.

"Uh- wha- you- Sorun, you- y-you're- holy- WHAT!?" That final exclamation from Sonic didn't make Sorun so much as flinch. He did, however, heave out a heavy sigh while Sonic continued to yammer on. "S-Sorun, you're here! You're okay!"

"Evidently." Sorun glanced to the side, half-expecting to see Sonic attempt at poking him to make sure he wasn't a ghost. He wasn't, thankfully, but he sure was looking at Sorun like he was one. "What's with the look? I just got stuck in a giant crystal. Not even the first time that happened to someone."

"No, Sorun, you... what are you talking about, you disappeared when we stuck you in that thing!"

"Ah, really? Alright."

Sonic nodded so quickly it hurt to see. "Yeah, after Knuckles and his dad magicked you in that thing there was this big flash of light, and poof! You were gone!" he quickly exclaimed. "We- we all thought you died, Sorun! We tried everything but nobody could find you! We couldn't even figure out what actually happened! Where'd you go?"

Sorun responded by clapping his hands together, fingers pointed forwards. "Time travel, Sonic. It's... complicated ." That last word was hissed out venomously. He should have figured something wacky would happen to him with all the time shenanigans he'd been pulling, but at least it meant Silver was at least somewhat accurate in getting them into the right point in time. To some point after he got sealed in the Master Emerald. He didn't want to imagine what things would be like if Silver messed up and sent them to before that, if he'd have to deal with some time clone or something. He had enough problems.

The answer Sonic received caused him to recoil back, and his face twisted in confusion and surprise. "Time travel?" he repeated. "What?"

"Yeah, I don't really wanna talk about it," Sorun said. Frankly speaking he wanted to recount that specific tale as little as possible. And things like all the robbery and murder would have to be omitted forever. "I, uh, I went here, then there, then I was all over and now I'm back." He bent down and picked up the blue Chaos Emerald. "Was walking all over the mega road- the ultra freeway- whatever that road connecting the multiverse together is called, I was going left and right using Yamato to cut into different worlds trying to find this pla-"

He paused when a sudden thought struck Sorun. One thought specifically aimed at the Chaos Emerald he was holding. His thoughts ran through a couple of loops, and after coming to a final conclusion he made a small hum. "Huh. Guess there's just eight of these things now."

"What?"

"Yeah time travel's nuts like that, don't worry about it," Sorun said, dropping the gem back at his feet. "How long have I been gone, anyways? Few days? A week?"

"Uhh... no." Sonic didn't look at all satisfied by the answer given by Sorun, and looked like he wanted to fire off about a million different questions, but thankfully he managed to restrain himself to answer Sorun's question. And the human teen did not like that awkward look Sonic was wearing. "You, um... that was a few months ago, Sorun." He grimaced a bit, glanced to the side, and then looked back at Sorun. "Like, winter ends in a week."

"... Ah." Yeah, that would make it awkward. Also made the situation with Nicole significantly worse. His heartrate was spiking just thinking about it, and Sorun's face made it look like he wanted to die for real at the moment.

"Yeah..." Sonic exhaled through clenched teeth, rubbing a hand behind his head while making it a point not to look at Sorun's face. "Guess we're, uh, gonna... gonna have to get rid of that grave, huh?"

Sorun shriveled a bit more. "I got a grave?"

"Mhm, we, er, there was a whole funeral and everything." When Sorun didn't respond Sonic tried putting on a forced smile to cheer Sorun up. It didn't. "If it makes you feel any better there were tons of times they had to get rid of statues of me when people thought I died, so I know how you're feeling right now."

Sorun glanced at Sonic. "Did I get a statue?"

The hedgehog flinched. "N... no, it was just a headstone."

He glanced away. "I see how it is." Fucking guy had to one-up him in everything.

"So yeah, that's... yeah..." Sonic finished, voice trailing off.

"Mm," Sorun sounded out.

"..."

"..."

"... Honey didn't hire somebody to replace me, did she? Because I really need that job-"

"Hey, when are you guys planning on restocking the fridge?" came a new voice from off to the side. The owner of the voice stepped within Sorun's peripheral view, causing him to look towards the source of the noise. "I don't want to be that guy but-"

The voice cut himself off the moment he spotted Sorun, and then stopped mid-step. Sorun was equally stunned when he saw Knuckles walk into view for completely different reasons. He'd wager Knuckles was shocked seeing somebody that was supposed to be dead suddenly completely fine and sitting on a couch. There was even the beginnings of a smile growing on his face.

For Sorun it was the complete opposite. He saw Knuckles standing there. He also kept seeing flashes of gold superimpose themselves over his image, saw his growing smile flicker between a kind one and a cruel, manic one. He kept imagining that helmet flickering over Knuckles' head and was even unconsciously reaching towards the blue gem sitting near him. And then Knuckles spoke out, and the illusion shattered. Sorun shook his head and it was just Knuckles standing there. Speaking normally. Not like a maniac.

"Sorun! Buddy! You-you're back!" Knuckles happily exclaimed. He stepped forwards, continuing with, "You have no idea how glad-man, I can't believe-!"

When Knuckles had moved forwards, Sorun had slid further down the couch, away from him while making sure the blue Emerald was still in his vision. Knuckles froze at the movement, and at the wary look Sorun was holding on his face. The smile dropped off his face and he lifted his mitts up in a reassuring manner.

"Um... everything okay, man?" he hesitantly asked Sorun.

"I don't know, Knuckles. Is everything okay?" Sorun asked back. "No deific brain worm parasites here to ruin everyone's day?"

Knuckles winced at that. He felt Sonic shift around uncomfortably at the mention of Enerjak. Silver was mainly just standing off in the corner silently watching the whole exchange, but whereas the other two Mobians were exuding an aura of awkwardness he just seemed mainly curious and seemed satisfied to just observe.

"Umm, Sorun?" Sonic asked from besides Sorun. "You do see it's Knuckles, right? You can relax."

When Sorun answered, he didn't turn his head to Sonic. He kept his eyes trained on Knuckles. "I know for you guys that was months ago, but for me that was literally last week. The experience is still a bit raw."

Knuckles recoiled at that, going as far as to take a step back. He didn't seem overly hurt by the statement, but his expression visibly fell all the same. It did nothing to change Sorun's attitude or mood, who only kept glaring at him.

He nearly lashed out when Sonic touched his shoulder, though he did draw his hand back when Sorun flinched at the gesture. "Okay, Sorun, I get it, but Enerjak really is gone-"

"I know it's gone, Sonic, I killed it myself."

For some reason Knuckles looked off-put by that statement, and it was reflected in the expression he made. Sorun grew confused at that expression, and when he turned back back to Sonic he was even more surprised to see Sonic was holding the same expression.

"What's with those looks?" Sorun looked back and forth between the two, and then focused on Sonic. "Did you... what, did you not see me cut the thing in half?"

"No, we did," Sonic assured him, glancing at Knuckles and then back at him, "we just, you know... we just didn't expect it is all."

"You didn't expect it?"

"Well he was-"

"It, Sonic, it was an it, it barely even had an identity of its own," Sorun snapped.

Rolling his eyes, Sonic amended, "Fine, it , we just assumed you would use your sword to separate it from Knuckles like you did the first time. You know, just send it back to where it lived."

Sorun was more surprised that that was the conclusion everyone came to out of any other. "... No, dude, it's dead. The forever kind," he said. "I mean the original idea was I was gonna separate out Enerjak's Chaos Force link with Yamato, but when I tried it didn't work. It can't cut those links that give powers. And I could separate them, yeah, but there wasn't much stopping it form re-possessing Knuckles and I didn't have any other way to deal with it."

He would have thought that explanation would be satisfactory. There weren't any other options and it was an insane god parasite that wanted to ruin the whole world. What other choice did he have at the time? He would have assumed it'd be enough of an explanation, but when he looked at Sonic's face Sorun just saw a pensive, unsure expression on him. Like he didn't fully agree with Sorun's reasoning.

"It's just..." Sonic began, a bit quiet, "did... did you really had to go that far with Enerjak?"

It took a few moments for Sorun to even comprehend what Sonic was asking. "It... It soul-snatched the whole world, why is this even a question?"

"I get it, but-"

"No, Sonic, you don't. You keep saying that but you don't," Sorun interrupted. The feeling from being shaken at Knuckles' mere sight wore off in an instant as anger began to worm into Sorun's tone. "I was alone during that whole fight, do you even get that? You know what was going through my head the whole time, hearing the things it was saying, that I was fighting a god knowing no matter what I was gonna die in the next five minutes with all your bodies strung up on the wall behind it-!?"

He would have went even further than that if Sorun hadn't become aware of how loud his voice had grown. Or grown aware of how concerned Sonic's face had grown, which only served to irritate Sorun even further. It was more difficult than he would have liked, but he managed to calm himself down with a deep breath.

"... I did the best I could with what I had, alright?" Sorun finally muttered, leaning forwards on the couch while looking down. "I thought it was the only way to free you all. For all I know it was. So yeah. When I couldn't cut its link, I just cut it. None of you were there. What was I supposed to do?"

Because he really wanted to know if there was some magical solution the whole time he could have used to solve that problem without nearly killing himself. Was waiting for Sonic to give him some kind of grandstanding speech and to be lectured why he shouldn't have ended the existence of what basically amounted to a parasite. But when he glanced up at Sonic all he saw was that conflicted, sympathetic look he was giving in lieu of the previous look. Less apprehension and more understanding.

Somehow that was even worse, and Sorun didn't know why. Like arguing the point with Sonic would have actually made him feel better.

"No, Sorun, I didn't mean... everyone's grateful for what you did," he said. "I... yeah. I know you tried, Sorun. And I get you wanted to be done with the whole fighting thing and that whole experience must have been terrifying for you, so... just, thanks. For saving us."

It'd been more than he was expecting, and he sounded genuine. Which wasn't all that surprising to Sorun. In the whole time he knew Sonic he only knew him to be genuine, teasing, or sarcastic. Rarely ever actually upset. But he'd take the thanks if it meant an end to any and all topics surrounding Enerjak. He'd leave that topic alone in the past forever if he could.

But he probably couldn't. Not when Sorun lifted his head up and saw Knuckles, and wondered if he'd be reminded of that thing every time he saw him or heard his voice. Not when he was wondering if there would ever be a time he wouldn't have to pause to remind himself it was just Knuckles and he didn't need to attack him.

Probably never, really. But it would be fine as long as he just maintained the outward appearance that everything was fine. No problems that way.

"It's fine, whatever, don't worry about it," Sorun assured them. He leaned back into the couch and stretched his legs out, doing his best to appear as casual as possible. He asked another question that'd been bugging him. "Speaking of which, everybody's okay, right? There wasn't anyone left out or anything? All the souls got returned back to their bodies?"

"Yeah, all of them," Sonic confirmed. The answer and change in topic made some of the tension leave his body and he slacked further into the couch. "No husked-out bodies with unaccounted souls, nobody getting body-swapped, none of that. Whatever you did really did fix everything."

Sorun made a small nod. "Alright. Alright, yeah. Yeah, that's good. That's good to hear." Of all his screwups in life at least that was one thing he could put on the list of "things I haven't screwed up". That one could probably go on the top of what was admittedly a depressingly short list, even. And relieved him a bit in that, whatever fallout he was going to have to endure as a result of all this, at least it'd been worth it. He wasn't so sure how long he'd be able to hold that sentiment.

"Guys, did you already clear out the fridge? We just stocked-"

The new person that just walked into the room cut themselves off when, Sorun presumed, she saw him sitting on the couch. He already knew it was Sally from how the voice sounded, and based on Knuckles' reaction earlier he had a pretty good idea of what her face would like like when he glanced over at her.

Yeah, it was about what he expected. Stunned silence and an admittedly more subdued look of surprise than what Knuckles and Sonic had worn. Her expression still made it seem like she was looking at a ghost, which, to be fair, wasn't completely out of the ballpark. She opened her mouth to try and speak, but at first only a stuttering sound came out. Then she shook her head, blinked a few times, and tried again.

"Sorun. You're... you're alive."

"Despite the world's best efforts it seems," Sorun replied. "And believe me, it tried really hard."

"I... will take your word for that." Her eyes shifted upwards towards the shy-looking white-furred hedgehog standing near the back of the living room. "Who's he?"

"Oh, that's Silver. He's, like, from the future or something, it's not really all that important."

Almost robotically, Sally turned back towards Sorun. The surprise had already worn off, and she seemed shockingly calm at the moment. "The future," she dully repeated.

"Mhm, yeah."

"..." She sighed out and reached up to pinch the point between her eyes. She held the position for a few moments and closed her eyes, seemingly thinking about something, and then lowered her hand while asking, "Right, Sorun, could you and I talk in private for a moment?"

That hadn't been a request Sorun was expecting to hear. Granted he hadn't been expecting anything, and yet still he was taken back a bit from the request. Sonic and Knuckles looked equally off-put, though

Silver just seemed nervous and was making it a point to shy away from people's looks.

"Okay?" He didn't really know why that was the first thing she was asking, but Sorun didn't really see a reason to refuse. "Silver, I... I'll be back, I guess?" he said, giving a shrug to the hedgehog who only sent a confused glance back his way. Sorun didn't know how to respond to that so he just turned to Sally. "So, like... off to the side private-private, or-?"

She'd turned around before he even finished. "Just follow me," she said. She walked off in what Sorun vaguely remembered was the direction to the lab in this place. All he could think to do was follow her as he tried to figure out what was going on.

It was, indeed, the lab Sally took him to. Was about the same as he remembered: a well-lit, metal-lined room full of computers and machines that looked out of place in an underground bunker with dirt walls. He didn't know what needed to be discussed that they needed a whole room in private. So private she made it a point to close the door behind them so they were sealed in the room. Really, he couldn't imagine what she could possibly have to say to somebody she thought dead five minutes prior.

Even stranger was that, after she'd closed the door and walked back in front of Sorun, who was so bewildered he could do nothing but just stand there, she just... stared at him. No blankly - her face was continually shifting through a myriad of emotions the longer she examined him, but for the life of him Sorun couldn't figure out what they were, or what was even going on in her mind that this was how Sally was reacting to his sudden resurrection.

Really, it was so strange that he couldn't help but comment on it.

"So, uh... you didn't pull me to the lab just to make sure I'm not some kind of robot doppelganger Eggman made or something, did you?" Sorun awkwardly asked. She didn't respond at all. She just kept staring at him, expression locked in... concentration? Confusion? Utter loss at what to say? "'Cause I'll freely admit that sounds like something he'd do, so I'll do an x-ray test or whatever, but-"

"No, Sorun," she interrupted, voice completely calm, "I believe it's you. You're the only person I know that'd be so flippant after coming back from the dead."

"... I mean I didn't technically die, but thanks, I gue-"

"It wasn't a compliment."

Sorun's mouth clamped shut, and then his lips thinned as he thought over Sally's words. He wasn't able to come to a conclusion and only became more confused. "Uh... so what-"

Slap!

The weirdest thing was he'd seen the hit coming. He didn't know if that meant Sally'd been holding back or something else was going on, but he'd been able to perceive her flattened hand racing towards his face. Sorun still hadn't been able to dodge despite that, though, because he'd been so astounded by what she was doing that he literally didn't know how to react. He'd registered the slap coming. Was even able to identify that the slap was indeed a slap and that he should move. But the idea that Sally, who treated him more nicely than most others, was doing this after learning not even minutes ago that he wasn't dead after months seemed so wrong, so alien and backwards, that Sorun just didn't know how to react.

As a result he'd eaten the hit. Felt her hand smack him right across his face with enough force to whip his head to the side. He could tell just from the burning sting in conjunction with the dull throb there was probably a large, angry red handprint on his face. But the pain just barely registered above Sorun processing that Sally just slapped him, and it took a few seconds for the message to actually get through.

It did get through, though, and he didn't know whether to feel angry over the fact she just slapped him or completely lost over the fact why he just got slapped. He'd inhaled deeply and looked back at her, and he legitimately couldn't believe she had the audacity to look upset at him .

"Why... do you keep hitting people, Sally?" Sorun asked, doing a remarkable job of keeping his voice level and calm.

"Do you have any idea what you did?" she asked him, voice low and angered. "Any at all, Sorun?"

He threw his hands up. "No, none," Sorun replied, voice becoming bitter as some of his growing anger leaked through. "Enlighten me. Enlighten the guy who just finished the worst road trip in his life what he did, Sally, do it, enlighten me."

"Nicole! The kiss!"

"Oh, that." Yeah, now he understood why she was so mad. And now suddenly all the anger and bitterness was washing out of him and the burning sensation on his cheek was all but forgotten when he was reminded of that particular event. Where he was once upset at her now he just felt slightly fearful, and was suddenly finding it extraordinarily difficult to hold eye contact with her. In fact he failed and found his eyes drifting down towards the floor. "She... told you about that, huh...?"

"No, don't do that, look up. Look at me," Sally snapped. Sorun did so, albeit with great difficulty, and he visibly flinched back at the angered glare she was giving him. "Do you have a single notion of how much grief you put Nicole through with that stunt you pulled?"

He didn't really want to answer that question. More because of the intense guilt he was suddenly feeling more than anything else. And that he couldn't even think up of a good excuse for why he'd done it other than "I needed a pep boost", because he sincerely doubted Sally would take that as an excuse. Hell, he wouldn't even take it.

"Well!?"

Sorun shuddered at Sally's raised voice before asking in a quiet voice, "What do you even want me to say? I thought I was gonna die again, there was nobody else-"

"I do not believe for a single second that you decided to kiss her because she was the last available option on the planet, Sorun, so don't you even-"

"It wasn't even a mouth kiss, why are you getting on my case with this!?"

"Because I have never so much as seen you hug someone, Sorun," Sally ground out, causing Sorun's voice to go silent. "You're just... not physically affectionate. At all. So you can imagine how even that kind of kiss looks for you."

He couldn't even deny it. It showed as much when he turned his head away from Sally's glare. "What would you even know about how I feel?" he asked.

She made a short sigh. "You're really gonna make me do this?" she asked. When Sorun didn't respond, she made another short sigh. "Alright, fine. I know about that letter you wrote to the newspaper."

The last time Sorun felt such blind panic it was when, for a split second, he thought he'd died when King Shadow cut his head off. He snapped his gaze back to Sally, eyes as wide as they could go and face pale, and his panic only increased when he saw the completely serious look on her face. She'd only make that accusation that was completely correct if she knew it was correct. And that damn confidence she was exuding spelled out that she knew she was right. Which she was. Which terrified Sorun, because that letter was supposed to be a secret nobody but he knew about because he wrote it and Honey because his boss was nosey.

"How?" he asked. More demanded, with the frantic tone Sorun had taken. "H-how could you possibly know that?"

The angered look on Sally's face was transitioning into frustration. "Do you think, and I want you to think real hard on this one, Sorun, that it's a very strange coincidence that Aly's name and my name sound suspiciously similar to each other?"

"Wait, hold on, give me a minute." He actually looked down at his hands, like he was counting off fingers, and for a moment Sally's expression was replaced by one of complete disbelief as Sorun began sounding it out to himself. "Sally... Aly... both have an A in them, I guess, L and a Y, too... kind of in the same position but it's missing another L... Sally, Sally, SSSS... aly? Saly!"

His head snapped up, and a loud, audible gasp left Sorun when he finally figured it out. He didn't want it to be true, but the logic was sound. And it was the only explanation for how she could possibly know he wrote that letter when he'd used such a clever pseudonym. But unfortunately, when this revelation came to mind only one single response managed to rise in Sorun's mind.

"Oh my god, Sally, your romance advice sucks!"

The remark was apparently so unexpected that she became flustered upon hearing it. "W-what!?" And now she looked insulted. "What is that supposed to mean!?"

"Man, I read your response to my letter! 'You might be looking at a game over otherwise if you do nothing,' what was- what even was that, huh!?"

"I was trying to be relatable to you by using a bunch of game terms! I was trying to help you!"

"By using a bunch of cringey wording I had to fight to read through!?"

"Do you want another slap!?"

Sorun shut his mouth at that. Sally crossed her arms in response, giving him a pointed look while saying, "And I'll have you know many people find my column and advice laudable. It's not my fault you chose quite literally the worst time to enact on it in what was equally the worst way possible, Sorun."

Shoulders slumping downwards, Sorun asked in a defeated tone, "But how did you even know that letter was mine? I used a really clever pseudonym and everything."

He didn't know what to feel when she gave him an almost pitying look. "Sorun, I... I just read it. I figured it out."

"No. That's impossible." He shook his head, refusing to believe it was something as simple as 'she just figured it out by looking at it'. Not after all the work he put into crafting it. "Nobody could have possibly cracked that code, Sally, there's just no way."

"A four-year-old could have cracked it, Sorun, it wasn't that hard!"

Sorun made another loud gasp at hearing that, and then wilted when he realized, yeah, she was definitely smart enough to piece it together on her own. Hell, if he'd known it was Sally behind that whole column he would have never made that letter to begin with for fear she'd figure him out. How was he supposed to know?

"... You still don't know for sure who I was talking about in that letter-"

"Sorun."

"Fine, Sally, evidently you have the entire narrative already, so what do you want out of me?" he asked her. "I-I-I like her, there, I admit it, you Columbo'd your way through the whole mystery."

She gave him a glare through narrowed eyes. "And you really thought the best way to display those feelings was to-"

"I made. An irrational. Decision," Sorun bit out through grit teeth. "I make a lot of those. It's not like I'm trying to be a screwup here, Sally, these things just happen."

"Sorun-"

"And-and you know what, you weren't there! Alright? Lit-literally the whole world's population got their souls sucked out by that thing, I had to be the guy to do something about it because Nicole couldn't and the other guy wasn't up to it, I wasn't thinking, okay, I was freaking out and it was a gut reaction I don't know okay I don't know why I went and did that I just did-"

"Sorun!" The yell caused Sorun to stop mid-rant, startled from the way Sally had suddenly raised her voice. She'd also clamped her hands over his shoulders to hold him in place. He hadn't realized how hard he'd been shaking until she'd physically forced him to become still. And now he saw a majority of the anger that she had held was being replaced with concern.

"Look, Sally, just- listen, look, I, look, listen it's, look, I, I... there was, there was nobody else. You were all supposed to be there to fix everything like you usually do but you weren't there so I had to do it and-and I can't do it like you guys can." His hands were still shaking despite Sally holding him in place. He wished they weren't. "And she was the only bright part in all that, you know? And then I got thrown into a giant crystal while crumbling into dust and got spat out in some messed up alternate future, and you guys still weren't there so I had to fix everything again and I did so all that stuff never happened but I..."

He turned his head away. He didn't want to get into all that. Ever. If he had it his way that whole event would be buried forever for how much he detested his time in that alternate future.

"I'm... but I found Silver, and that was all a week ago, so... yeah I'm, he's, he's a great guy, you know, you should really introduce yourself to him sometime," Sorun said. "I'm over all that, everything is fine, I'm just, I'm, I'm attempting- this is my attempt- what I'm trying to say is, back then, the kiss with Nicole, I, um, I wasn't really in a good headspace. At the time. 'Cause things were bad. But it's fine because we're all here now and all the problems are gone forever. I made them gone forever."

Sally didn't look like she believed him so much. Concern had bloomed into worry, and while she'd let him go, she was making it a point to continue to stand close to him. The next words she spoke were made and spoken in extreme care.

"Sorun, are you sure you're doing okay?"

He probably would have laughed if he was in the mood. But he wasn't, because the current mood he felt didn't allow it. He didn't even know what the mood was, what he was feeling. This nervousness eating away at him, and at this point he wasn't even sure what he was nervous over, just that he was, and somehow that was more maddening than the nervousness itself. "When even was the last time I was okay?" he asked her back. The response hadn't made any of her worry fade. "I'll be fine, I just... you know, barely managed to get past the whole Earth thing, then this all happened and I... would, just like some time. To come down from all that."

Because really that just what he wanted most. He just wanted to go back home and go back into the routine he had before the Enerjak incident. He wanted his steady days and casual postal job back. Just to hang around town and with friends without having to worry about anything. He'd gotten there, just for the briefest time. Gotten to a point where everything was fine, like back on home, and he just wanted to go back to that and stop thinking about all the things that happened back then.

"How is Nicole, by the way?" he asked her. Because as much as he just wanted to forget all that and move on there was that one, single mistake following him and he needed to address it.

Sally glanced to the side and grabbed at one of her shoulders. Not an encouraging reaction. "Well, you saw what happened the first time."

He internally winced, but on the outside Sorun just looked sadder. "So that bad?"

"Not... as bad as then," she hesitantly added, though the pensive look Sally had on her face told a different story. "She's just been really withdrawn. Runs the city and doesn't do much else. I stop by her servers to keep her company sometimes."

"Oh. Um. Thanks for that."

Her blue eyes shifted back to Sorun, and now he couldn't read her expression at all. "I'm her oldest friend, Sorun. Of course I wasn't going to leave her alone with sometime like this." When Sorun didn't respond Sally's features furrowed and she spoke again. "It's part of why I'm upset at you. I get it, before you start I get it," she said when he opened his mouth to speak. He paused, and then closed his mouth to allow her to continue. "I know the whole fighting and saving the world thing just isn't for you, Sorun, and I know you've been struggling with a ton of things ever since coming here and your original home and everything. I understand the situation with Enerjak must have been extremely stressful on you, and I get with all that and you thinking you were going to die again you were prone to do something rash. I can't even be that mad at you since your actions lead to everyone being saved, so thank you, Sorun. Sincerely, thank you.

"But you need to understand that what you did to Nicole? Sonic did the exact same thing to me before getting stranded in space, so more than anybody I sympathize with what she's going through. And no matter the reason I can't say I appreciate what you did, Sorun."

He probably deserved feeling like somebody just punched him in the chest. It never even dawned on him that she went through the same thing. For a moment Sorun was even furious he did something as egregious as make the same mistake Sonic made once. But it was all lost in all the mixed emotions Sally was sending him. Thankfulness, sadness, bit of anger. All justified and warranted, he would admit.

"I just want to fix it, Sally." It was the honest truth. As honest as Sorun could get, at least.

"Then go fix it," she said. "To tell you the truth I always just thought it was Sonic but now that you did it, too, I can't help but wonder if every guy is just as hopeless when it comes to these things. Honestly, do you all think we like getting our hearts broken? Seeing people profess their feelings for us before going off to die?"

This time Sorun did manage crack a wry smile. It was so small it was nearly imperceptible, but it was there. "Well. A man oughta be a little stupid once in a while."

"Clearly." Sally palmed her own face and shook her head. More in bemusement now. "Just go. You're competent when you try to be so I'm trusting you can't possibly make this any worse, Sorun. Just go home and talk to her."

"Yeah, I'll... I'll go ahead and go do that." He gave a stiff nod. Part of him wanted to comment further on the slap, but he decided against it after figuring he probably deserved it. "I'm off, then. So... be seeing you, I guess?"

"We still live in the same town, so yeah, I'd imagine."

He turned to leave at that. Out of a desire to go back home and a desire to go see Nicole and fix what he did. Or even just to see her again. He didn't know which desire won out over the others, just that he needed to go back to New Mobotropolis.

"And Sorun?"

He was halfway to opening the lab's door when he heard Sally call his name out. When he looked back she was wearing the first smile he'd seen since coming back.

"I really am glad you're back," she said. "And I meant it when I said thanks. Just go home and stop worrying about saving the world, okay? We'll take care of it."

He mirrored her smile. "Yeah. I'll do that."

When he exited the lab and made it back to the HQ's living room he was met with the sight of Sonic standing in front of Silver. The former had crossed his arms but was otherwise standing casually while looking at the other Mobian with a relaxed, if attentive, look. The latter seemed to have lost a majority of his shyness from earlier but still looked a bit nervous standing in front of Sonic.

"So... the future," Sonic said.

"Mhm, yeah," Silver confirmed.

"Huh." Sonic tapped his foot a few times. "So how's it look over there?"

"Oh, um, well... not, uh, not good." Silver's eyes shied away from Sonic's. "Pretty bad, actually."

"Aaand you're here to fix that?"

"Yep! Yeah, I'll, I'm gonna make sure none of that happens, so please don't worry."

"I wasn't?" Sonic saw Sorun enter and shifted his attention to him. And then he made a heavy wince when he saw the slowly fading red mark on Sorun's face. "Eesh. I know that handprint anywhere."

"Hardy har, shut up." Sorun bent down to pick up the blue Emerald. It shifted into Yamato upon contact, after which Sorun stood up. "You know, I got my sword back. I can still turn you monochrome until a new set of blue fur grows back in."

"You can only make that threat once before you sound like a jerk saying it, Sorun."

"What does that tell you about me?" Sorun pulled the sword out and cut a cross through the air. "Silver, come on," he said as the cross folded into a portal. "We're going home."

"Okay!" Silver nodded at Sorun, taking a double-take at the half-faded mark on his face but seemingly shrugging it off, and then turned back to Sonic. "Hey, it was really nice meeting you!"

After giving Sonic a parting wave Silver walked out through the portal. Sonic watched him depart, and then turned to Sorun while quirking an eye ridge upwards.

"So that's your new friend?" Sonic asked.

"Yeah, picked him up from the future."

Sonic shrugged it off. "Alright. Future really that bad?"

"Literally apocalyptic."

He tensed up a bit at hearing that. "But he's gonna make sure that doesn't happen?"

"Yeah, it should be fine. Don't worry about it, Sonic."

"I'm not, I'm not. Just... tryin' to look out for everyone," he coolly replied. "Um, is this something we need to be involved with?"

"Kinda would prefer you didn't actually, so his future knowledge doesn't get messed up," Sorun said. "He actually doesn't have much to begin with, but too many changes could skew things. Really just ignore him and keep doing what you guys do normally and it should work out."

Sonic accepted the answer with a nod. "If you say so. You gonna be alright?"

"I mean, hopefully." Sorun turned towards the portal. "Have a good night."

"Yeah, you too."

As Sorun left through the portal Sorun couldn't help but note he'd actually managed a cordial conversation with Sonic despite all the stress he was undergoing. He took it as a good sign.

The portal hadn't taken the pair into New Mobotropolis. It'd taken them just outside the city proper. In the woods near the wall surrounding the city. Just seeing it brought on an assortment of emotions in Sorun that made him queasy, just seeing those immaculate, off-white walls. And terrified. Because no amount of mental preparation could prepare him for this. Strange to say because it literally became worse the longer he waited. Ideally he'd just rip the band-aid off and go right in.

But at the moment it felt like Sorun's boots were full of concrete and he couldn't help but become completely frozen at seeing those walls and be reminded of what was inside. Who was.

"Wow, so that's the place, huh?" Silver observed. "I'd, well I'd say it looks nice but the, eh, the wall there is kinda... kinda in the way of the view. Sorun, how come we're outside the city and not inside it?"

"I change my mind, Silver," Sorun answered in a level tone. "Let's just live out here."

Silver turned his head to Sorun in confusion. "Huh? For how long?"

"I don't know, forever?"

Silver's expression flattened. "Is this about that girl?" he asked.

When Sorun's head whipped to the side to meet Silver's gaze, his expression tightened with anxiety. "Of course it is, Silver, I'm freaking out here what am I supposed to even say!?" he hissed out.

He took a step back before responding. "Sorun, aren't you overreacting a bit here?" He had the gall to flash Sorun a reassuring smile, like his whole world didn't feel like it was collapsing in on itself at the moment. "From everything you've said about her she sounds like a really understanding person. Won't it all be fine if you just talk with her?"

"... MAN, WHAT WOULD YOU KNOW!? YOU NEVER EVEN MET A GIRL BEFORE IN YOUR ENTIRE LIFE BEFORE YOU STARTED TRAVELING AROUND WITH ME!" Sorun yelled out. "Understand, she'll understand, oh, yeah, she'll understand something alright, she'll understand I'm the worst person in the world and I'll honestly be surprised if she ever decided to look me in the eye again!"

"Uh, so, so she won't understand?"

Visibly deflating, partly out of exhaustion, Sorun ran a hand over his face and turned away from Silver. "I don't know, maybe, she might, it's hard to know what she's thinking most of the time and her being an AI that thinks on a completely different level than us doesn't help."

"... She's an A-what?"

Sorun turned back to Silver in surprise. "I forget to mention that detail? Eh, whatever, it's not important." He waved off Silver's confusion and turned back to the walled city. "I just don't know what I'm supposed to say. Dunno if there even is a right thing to say in this situation. I mean, do I just go for it? Say whatever's on my mind? I'm coming up with nothing but blanks, here, Silver, how'm I supposed to say what's on my mind when I'm getting nothin' but static here?"

"Yeah, I don't know, Sorun." Silver looked up into the night sky. "What I do know is that it's the middle of the night and I'm tired. I want to sleep in a bed. If you don't make up your mind I'm just gonna float us into the city."

Feelings of betrayal tore through Sorun as he faced Silver with an appalled expression. The hedgehog stared back with a bored, somewhat serious look, which Sorun could only take as Silver telling the truth. So he made a mental curse and turned back to the city.

"Alright, fine, we're going," he grumbled out quickly, removing Yamato from its sheath. "I'll teleport us outside my house and just... deal with it in the morning and hope beyond all rational thinking she just doesn't know I came back."

It was a plan that might be in futility, something he realized as he cut a second portal in the air. Seeing as she quite literally had her eyes on the entire city via the security surveillance network. He didn't think even a miracle would allow him and Silver to slip into his house and spend the night under her nose without her catching on. There was a spark of hope there in Sorun that they could, though. That spark that knew, in actuality, it was really hopeless but the reality of the situation was too terrible to face, so it latched onto an unreasonable, false hope.

But yeah, he was pretty sure they'd be able to pull this off.

Walking out of the new portal Sorun was instantly hit with the familiar smells of New Mobotropolis. Certainly smelled nicer than Detroit, that was for sure. Cleaner and fresher. He recognized the section of the residential district he lived in and all the houses next to his. Most of the lights were out due to the time of night, barring a couple, but he was less focused on that and more on the structure standing before them.

His house.

... No, yeah, it was just his house, nothing about it had changed since he left.

"Alright, there it is, go go go go!" Sorun quickly whispered out, gesturing forwards in a rushed manner after swiping the portal closed. Silver turned around to give him an odd look, but the white-furred Mobian stalling only made Sorun gesture more frantically. Silver flinched away from Sorun as a result, and then shook his head as he walked across the small lawn and stopped in front of the front door.

It all went wrong when Silver tried opening the door. With dawning horror Sorun realized he couldn't open the door. Because it seemed beyond all belief to be locked.

"Hey, Sorun, the door's locked," Silver blandly stated as he attempted to turn the door's knob to no avail.

"What!?" Sorun stepped behind Silver and peered over his shoulder to ensure he was telling the truth. Maybe he was just turning the knob the wrong way. But no, when he looked he saw the knob was turning just the barest amount. It was indeed locked. "That-that's impossible! I didn't even know my door had a lock!"

Silver paused in his futile knob-turning and glanced over his shoulder at Sorun with an incredulous look. "How could you not know your door has a lock?"

"It's a nice neighborhood, okay!? I never needed to lock my door!"

"Oh, well, maybe that lady standing behind you can help us out!"

He honestly could have shot him and it would have alarmed Sorun less than the sentence that spilled out of Silver's mouth. He'd frozen, completely, hard enough that it felt like his heart had skipped a beat. In fact it probably did. His hands became clammy and moist, enough that it felt like Yamato would slip out of his grasp. And no matter how hard he tried he couldn't figure out what he was supposed to do.

"Maybe it isn't her," he reasoned with himself. "Maybe it's just someone else. Someone who isn't Nicole decided to stand outside my abandoned house now of all times. Yeah. That's gotta be it. There's no way she managed to catch us this quickly. It's just someone else here for some inexplicable reason."

It had to be. Couldn't be Nicole. Not a chance. All he'd have to do was turn around and confirm his completely rational explanation and he'd see that-

Sorun didn't even managed to turn around all the way. He hadn't even seen her face. All he saw was a single brown and black arm and a bit of her purple dress, and then he turned back forwards at Silver, who currently looked like he didn't know what he was supposed to do, standing there in front of Sorun's door. But as far as Sorun was concerned Silver didn't even exist right now because Nicole was standing behind him and holy fuck he did not know what he was supposed to do.

"Hey, I could really use some advice right now. Yeah, man, I got nothin', you're on your own. MAN, FUCK YOU." Sorun inhaled deeply to calm himself. It didn't work. "Alright okay okay alright alright okay. I got this. I don't got this. Go for it. Go for what? Go for go. Go? Goooo...!"

Fortune favored the bold and the virtuous. Sorun wasn't either of those. He didn't think so, at least. Did it matter? He didn't know. He was just standing there with his back to her like and idiot and he needed to do something but he didn't now what to do. Just turn around and start saying words. Without even thinking, to just go for it. His only chance at salvation was to do this and hope for the best.

"Heeeey, Nicole-" came Sorun's near-casual greeting as he turned to her fully. But he'd cut himself off and froze yet again when he was able to see her fully and see her reaction to seeing him.

He remembered the first time he'd done something like this. When he'd been resurrected from death, and she'd literally tackled him to the ground and had been overcome with so much relief she'd been crying. It was an oddly fond memory of Sorun's. That somebody cared about him so much that that was their reaction to seeing he wasn't dead. He truly didn't think he was the kind of person that warranted that kind of response, yet he'd got it. Because she was just that kind of a person, maybe. He'd been expecting a similar reaction this time around.

This was most assuredly not the same reaction as last time. There wasn't any tackling Sorun to the ground. No tears of relief. None of that. She was just standing there. A few meters away from Sorun. Face completely devoid of all emotion. Completely. She was just staring at Sorun with a completely blank expression, almost robotically. With Nicole that was probably an accurate term.

Sorun had no idea what the hell this meant. His mind whirled and ran with wild theories, but none of them had any substance or grounding with the reality of the situation. And the reality was he was flying blind without a map and had no idea what he was supposed to do in this situation. So much so he just stood there, unsure of what to do as he stared at Nicole, who was only blankly staring back.

Click!

Sorun jumped slightly when he heard that sound, along with a small creak afterwards. He turned around and saw that the door to his home behind Silver had opened. He weakly pointed at the opened entrance while turning back to Nicole, uttering a small, "Uh-"

"The door. For your friend." He didn't like how eerily calm Nicole sounded. He didn't like that at all. "I assume you want the conversation we are about to have to be a private one."

"That'd... be ideal, yeah," Sorun quietly replied. He turned to Silver and made a shooing gesturing at him. "Silver, go. Go in the house. Go."

"Yeah, sure." He awkwardly looked between the pair of them, and then made to enter the house. He only got a single step in before stopping and turning to ask Sorun, "Which room is the guest-?"

"The room at the end of the hall is mine, literally just go into the other bedroom!"

Silver made a rapid nod and retreated into the house, nearly slamming the door behind him. That left Sorun alone with Nicole, a prospect that never before had sounded more terrifying. And as he turned back to her he realized just how far out of his depth he was, and how his mind was just utterly blank with how he was supposed to handle this. So he took to following his own advice and opened up with the first few words that fell onto his tongue.

Unfortunately it turned out to be a poor choice in the end, as he'd opened up by saying the stupidest thing imaginable.

"I can explain-"

"You can explain." Her interruption was made so abruptly Sorun nearly bit his own tongue. "You can explain why you disappeared when they locked you in the Master Emerald. You can explain why you've been away for months. You can explain being gone for such an inordinately extended period as to make all of us think you had perished. You can explain making me think you were gone forever yet again. You can explain all of that."

"Yyyyyyes."

"Then by all means. Explain."

Sorun gulped. Here went everything. "So I went to the future, right, and-"

Nicole turned around. "Good night, Sorun," she said. He genuinely didn't believe she was going to leave it at that, but to his shock she was actually starting to disappear. And it was with panic and dread that he realized she probably actually didn't believe him when he said he went to the future.

"Wait-wait-wait, hold on, I'm being serious!" he yelled out in alarm. He refrained from sighing out in relief when Nicole's body reformed, but he nearly lost his already crumbling composure when she turned around and he saw that slowly darkening expression she was wearing. "I really did go to the future, okay?"

"You truly expect me to believe you being locked inside of the Master Emerald somehow lead to you experiencing something as ludicrous as time travel?"

"What- how is time travel any more unbelievable than all the other stuff that's happened?" an exhausted Sorun asked as he thrusted his hand out to the side. "From the aliens to the crazy genius guy with the robot army to gods to all this Chaos junk that, for all intents and purposes, can literally do anything as far as I can see." He held Yamato up, which at the moment felt like it weighed a million pounds. "You don't even know the things I've been doing with this thing."

Perhaps a poor choice of words, because Nicole's expression was darkening more quickly. He tried backpedaling on his words to try a different approach. "Would I seriously make this up? With this context?"

"..." She glanced away from him, which for all Sorun knew might have been a good sign. "No. You're not that dishonest."

"'That' dishonest?"

"You frequently lie by omission. I overlook it because I trust you have your own reasons." She looked back at him. Her face was still set in a heavy frown, but it wasn't as dark or hostile as it had been before. "But no, you would never lie about something as serious as this."

Sorun wasn't even surprised she knew him that well. "Okay, so... yeah. That's what happened." When her expression didn't change he added, "Nicole, I got back as soon as I could. It's literally only been a week from my perspective. Time travel isn't the most accurate thing."

He noticed some change in her when he said that. It was nearly imperceptible, and her facial expression didn't change in the slightest, but it was there. There way her posture just ever-so-slightly straightened and how her eyes suddenly became just a bit more attentive of him.

"Is that so?" she asked.

"It's... it's so, yeah."

"It's so," she quietly repeated. Her green eyes swept over the yard they were standing in, and then fell back on Sorun's blue eyes. "Sorun, there are a number of things we need to discuss, and a great many of those things I would prefer to speak of in a setting that provides a greater amount of privacy than your front lawn affords."

Sorun tilted his head in a questioning manner. "I, uh..." He pointed his thumb behind him at the house. "We... could talk inside...?"

"No. Not with your friend there." Her eyes glanced down a bit and she grabbed at her arm. "More than that, this is a great deal of information. I need some time to process all this and figure out just precisely what I want to say. And I imagine you're exhausted from your... trip." She looked back at him. "So please just go to sleep. And in the morning come to my servers in the science center. We can talk there."

"Okay? I mean, yeah. That sounds... yeah, sure, yeah, totally. Absolutely. I will, I will do that. Yes." He'd maybe been a bit too quick in agreeing, had barely even thought about it, but he couldn't help it. As far as he was concerned her wanting to talk to him later was the greatest victory he could have asked for given the circumstances, and he'd take what he could get.

He didn't know if that was the reaction Nicole was looking for, though. Or even if she was looking for anything in particular. She just looked conflicted at his answer. "Sorun, please don't take this the wrong way. I really am happy that you're back. Happy beyond words. This is just... a lot. So I need some time."

"Yeah, no, that's... I get it."

"Alright." Nicole's body began to fade away. "Welcome back, Sorun. We'll speak further tomorrow morning."

"Tha-" She disappeared before Sorun could even get the full word out, "-nks... huh." He blinked at the spot where Nicole had disappeared, leaving him alone in front of his house, and thought back on the conversation he just had.

Overall, it could have gone worse. So much worse he'd been genuinely terrified of what was going to happen. He'd expected some kind of verbal assault that would have shredded apart his very being, or even just cold dismissal of his presence. The fact she just wanted to talk... well, he didn't actually know. It spoke volumes either how big of a chance he had at saving this whole mess or how mad she really was at him, and Sorun honestly couldn't tell which reality he was dealing with. Somehow that was even more scary - not knowing anything.

A drawn-out, tired sigh left him, and he slumped his shoulders. Whatever. He'd deal with whatever it was tomorrow morning, and it was only now he realized how right Nicole he was. He was wiped, physically and mentally. He plain doubted he could have a drawn out, highly-likely emotional discussion in this kind of state. Not without screwing something up even further.

So he entered his house, closing the door behind him. He flicked on the nearby light switch and was reminded on just how depressingly barren his house looked. How... blank it all was. He never bothered to decorate in any capacity. Not even so much as a throw rug. It was a dismal sight to look at.

"Christ, I almost forgot I lived like this," he muttered out as he approached the kitchen. He set Yamato down on a nearby counter and dug into his pockets to bring out the only two items he'd manage to save over the course of this entire trip: the space fork he'd stolen from the ARK and the bottle of ketchup he stole from that one guy.

Shaking his head at the souvenirs, he tossed the ketchup in his vacant fridge and tossed the fork on the kitchen counter near where the drawer containing his other utensils were.

Having access to free water out of his faucet again was great. Being able to use his own bathroom again was great, too. But after all that he really just wanted to crash into his own bed and go to sleep. It was bad enough that he was actually excited about the prospect of waking up in his own room knowing he was finally back home.

So he'd trudged into his abysmally barren room, dragging the katana behind him. He shut the door and approached the side of his bed, holding the sword up with both hands. He unsheathed the sword halfway to look at the flat of the blade. Blue eyes briefly shimmered in the sword's reflection as he stared.

"The ability to go to any zone as long as I know the coordinates, huh?" Sorun thought to himself. "They probably still have the numbers to my old home sitting around, so... could I?"

He genuinely didn't know. It was a universe not connected to the multiverse proper they needed seven Chaos Emeralds just to access, but Yamato circumvented a lot of those rules due to its nature. He managed to get back here using it, so Sorun was left wondering if it really was possible. For him to go back to Earth via the same method with Yamato.

But Sorun wasn't sure he wanted to. For sure if he could there would be things he'd want to collect. His gaming PC and other consoles among them. Other pieces of media. Pieces of a lost culture he missed. But the problem with that was that he'd have to go back home and see the ruins. Confront the fact that everything and everyone he knew back then was dead. And he had a hard enough time seeing it the first time without needed to add the image of dead people in the streets as he walked through it. People he would probably know.

"I don't even know if it'd work," Sorun thought as he pushed the sword back in its sheath. "Even if it could, I don't... maybe. Maybe one day. But I'm not ready for that. Probably'll never be."

He set down the sword on the nightstand next to his bed. It transmuted back into the blue Emerald the instant his hand lost contact with its surface, and Sorun was left grimacing a bit. He wasn't sure he wanted a blue nightlight shining right next to his head the entire night. So he picked it up and threw it in the farthest corner of his room so the light didn't hit him as much.

Good enough.

He barely registered his body hitting the bed before he fell asleep.

Chapter 89

A/N- Look, I'll say it as it is. I have a hard time writing the mushy feelgood stuff like what's coming up. Like, straight up. I have to fight myself to get the words out. When it's things like conflicts or fights or people shouting at each other or whatever, I got that, that stuff flows. This? It just doesn't mesh with me.

Recursion Error

Episode 89- The big confession

It was a great feeling for Sorun. Waking up in his own bed, recognizing where he was and realizing he was done . Done with all the world-threatening threats and the time travel and going around to different universes and all the fighting. All that bullshit. Over and done with. He was back home and didn't have to deal with that anymore. He could chill. It was liberating, like he was taking his first breath of fresh air in years, like life itself finally had meaning. He hadn't been happy since he didn't even know but Sorun would daresay that, when he woke up that morning... he was almost happy.

Then he remembered he had to go and talk to Nicole about everything and his mood came crashing down. As per usual.

On the upside he felt refreshed. Between being able to sleep in his own bed and finally being able to use his own shower, mentally, he was probably about as good as he was going to be. He'd be even better if he could get some breakfast, but when Sorun went into his own kitchen that morning to look around he realized somebody had cleaned out his pantry. Probably because he'd been gone for months and any food would have spoiled, but goddamn, it meant he didn't have any food.

He heard a yawn from behind him, and instantly recognized it as Silver's voice. He turned around and saw the hedgehog standing behind Sorun, rubbing at bleary-looking eyes with his stance slightly hunched over.

"Hey Silver," Sorun greeted with a small wave. "I don't have any food here, so yeah, no breakfast."

A disappointed sigh left him. "Aw, really?"

"I haven't been here for months, man, what do you want from me?" Turning around, Sorun opened one of his kitchen drawers. After opening the drawer completely he reached underneath it, where he then proceeded to feel around for the piece of paper taped to the bottom of the drawer. He found it and ripped the paper away, lifting it up. The rows of coins taped to the paper, covering its whole surface, glinted in Sorun's eyes, after which he turned around and gave the paper to a slightly-bewildered Silver.

"Here, do us a favor and go to the market and buy us some food so we don't starve," Sorun instructed. "I, uh... got some stuff I gotta go do."

"... Sorun, what...?" Giving the paper a confused glance, Silver looked up at Sorun and asked, "What is this? Why did you just have that there?"

"Oh, I keep stashes of money hidden throughout the entire house. There's more in little bags behind the light switches if you need it."

"... Why?"

"I'm from Detroit." With how crime-free this city was it was a habit Sorun probably didn't need to practice, but it was just that. A habit. And without many other things connecting him to her Sorun didn't really feel like letting a skill imparted to him by his mother go to waste.

"I don't know what that means, but alright." Shaking his head, Silver accepted the money taped to the paper. "What do you have to go do?"

"Super personal stuff I don't want to talk about."

Silver tilted his head a bit to the side. "So you have to go talk with that girl again?"

He honestly would have preferred getting slapped again over the brutal truth that was in that question, and it made it worse Silver had asked it all innocent-like. Sorun couldn't even think up of a clever comeback for it. Or even any kind of cover for it in order to deny it. Instead Sorun just took a shuddering breath and turned around towards the front door.

"I'm... I'm going," he said, making his way to the front door.

"Okay." He could practically feel Silver wave at his back as he called out to Sorun in a cheery voice, "Hey, good luck with everything!"

Sorun slammed the door behind him.

The only other times in Sorun's life where he felt this tense were times when his life was potentially in danger. Something that'd been happening more in this one year of his life than at any other point in his existence, and something he detested greatly, but it was what it was.

For some reason, beyond any sensible rational, explaining himself to Nicole was bringing about that same feeling of tenseness and dread. He'd gone to the science center, to the room where the servers were. And she'd been waiting for him there. Had simply ushered him into the room, closed the door behind him, and then had him sit in a chair sitting across from a chair she was in so he could simply tell her everything that happened after he left to go fight Enerjak.

Of course he'd told her everything. Almost. Everything from the fight itself to the alternate timeline, the future, him traveling with Silver just to get back to this zone. Some things were left out, course. Threatening Tails' family, the two murders, the robberies, assaulting an old guy. They weren't important details anyways. He gave her everything else that happened, which is what really mattered.

And Nicole just sat there, listening to him attentively and patiently. Part of why this seemed so tense to Sorun, he suspected, was that she wasn't showing much outward emotion or reaction to anything he was saying. Just listening. It'd be easier if he could gauge something out of her, some sign he could read so he could have some idea of what she was feeling, but there was just nothing. He didn't even know if she was doing it on purpose or if it was just something else, and what that something else potentially was Sorun was equally clueless on.

It was all he could do to just explain himself as best he could and hope for the best after.

"... So then he gave us the coordinates and I was able to get us back here with the sword," Sorun finished. "I would have gotten back here sooner but Silver could only be so accurate with his time travel trick. He never had much practice with it. I guess we're lucky we managed to get here and not somewhere way later down the line."

"Yes. I suppose so." Still no outward reaction from Nicole. She was just sitting in that chair, calm as could be, hands clasped together and resting on her lap as she looked at Sorun, who was finding a hard time to meet her gaze.

Eyes drifting to the side a bit, Sorun remarked, "You're, um, taking it well."

"Yes." Well, he was glad they could at least agree on that. "You're quite confident this issue with the future can be resolved by Silver?"

He offered her a shrug. "I mean, he's got a pretty okay PK powerset. Should be able to. Being completely honest with you he's probably in the top five of strongest people on the planet with the stuff I've seen him do."

"I wasn't asking if he was equipped or not, Sorun, I'm asking if you think he can."

To that, all Sorun could give was a sigh and another shrug. "It's tricky, Nicole. We've got hints of what happens, but just that. Hints. So he's gonna stick around and try to fix whatever happens so that future doesn't happen. The fact the Time Stone lets changes in the past affect the future means it's at least guaranteed there's a chance for change." Sorun leaned a bit back in his seat and flipped his hand up. "If it's a question of commitment he's got his whole home and a family on the line with this. Granted a, uh, family he's never met, but he'd really like to. If not letting the whole world be a wasteland wasn't enough."

Nicole looked believing, but not completely satisfied by the answer. "I'm sure, but all the same I can't help but feel concerned. You do realize how troubling this all sounds."

Rubbing a hand through his hair, Sorun said, "I know, Nicole, but there's not a whole lot to do about but wait and deal with it when it comes. Whatever 'it' even is." He blew out and let his hand flop to his side. "So yeah, I'm trusting Silver to handle it. He does that, I send him back home, life goes on. Doesn't have to be more complicated than that."

"You're trying to oversimplify a complex problem."

"'Cause it is simple, I'm not- why are- why are we even talking about this?" Sorun asked, shaking his head. "I don't even wanna talk about the future stuff. I didn't come here to talk about it beyond explaining where I was all this time."

"Then why did you come here?"

"Because you asked!" Sorun exclaimed. When Nicole showed zero visible reaction, he continued with, "I don't even know what's wrong, Nicole. I thought you'd be happy over the fact I wasn't, you know, dead , but ever since I came back you've... I don't even know."

She didn't respond. Not immediately, at least. Her head tilted down so her eyes were at her lap, and Nicole's body became completely still. It carried on over long moments, long enough for Sorun to grow uncomfortable. He was about to say something before she finally spoke.

"You did it again." Somehow those four words had more emotion in them than Sorun had heard out of Nicole since he came back. He hadn't known what to expect, but hearing her sound tired, maybe even frustrated or upset, hadn't even been considered by Sorun. He was taken back by her tone, leaning back in his seat in surprise as he continued looking at her. "You keep doing it."

"I... have no idea what you mean."

Nicole's head snapped up to look at Sorun. He flinched when he saw she actually did look upset now.

"Do you recall," she began, "after that debacle of you stealing Tails' plane in an inebriated stupor-"

"That wasn't a hundred percent my fault-"

"Be. Quiet ."

Sorun closed his mouth and silently waited for Nicole to continue with a nervous expression.

"... I'd aired grievances about how you had been acting. Specifically how you had been treating yourself," she calmly continued. "I understood the issues you had been going through, Sorun, but these... self-destructive tendencies of yours, you apologized and said you would stop them in an attempt to get better. But soon after you decided to undergo what was quite literally a suicide mission against Enerjak, and it is only because of an extraordinary amount of fortune on your part that you're even here for us to discuss it."

Sorun's mouth dropped open a bit in disbelief, and he even flipped his hands up in indignation. "The whole world was at stake and we had zero alternative options. I even gave you a chance to give me another solution before I fully committed."

"But you already did commit to the decision beforehand. You did that knowing full well there were no other options after you had already made up your mind," Nicole argued. "You acted like you barely even needed to think about it."

"Hey, that's not true, I... took a solid couple of days to mull it over," Sorun weakly argued. "Why are we even talking about this?"

"We're talking about it because of that kiss."

And there it was. The one topic Sorun knew beyond a shadow of a doubt was eventually going to come but was doing his damnedest, with little success, to ignore. The same topic that just now made him freeze in his seat the moment it was mentioned, and now he really couldn't look at Nicole, doing his best to maintain eye contact with the floor. Nicole had probably expected him to say something, even waited for over a minute for him to speak. When it became increasingly evident he wouldn't say anything she decided to speak up.

"What are we, Sorun?" she asked him. A simple four-word question he had no idea how to answer.

"Friends. Or so I thought."

Nicole looked taken back by the answer. "We still are, Sorun. I just want to know why you did... that."

"I... I, uh... well, it's..." Sorun's mouth thinned as he glanced off to the side to think. No thoughts resulted from this, so he breathed outwards and looked back at Nicole. "I don't know what you want me to say or even how I'm supposed to say it, Nicole. I don't hang out with you more than anyone else just because you're the only one I like playing video games with," he said. "Don't get me wrong, it's a large factor, just... not, you know. The only one."

"..."

Never before had such a calm, patient stare made Sorun want to break out in a sweat. "Which is to say that... the, the kiss, it, um, may not have, well, not have been as platonic as it implied."

"There were no platonic implications whatsoever in that action, Sorun."

He looked surprised, maybe even a bit affronted, at that. "Wait, seriously? Even though it was on the forehe-"

"You have never once in the entire duration I have known you ever displayed such behavior, Sorun. You, in fact, came off as taking measures to avoid such interaction. With anyone."

"Alright, that's on me," he admitted. After a period of uncomfortable silence Sorun began drumming his fingers on his thigh as he attempted to gather his words. "I don't really have any excuses or anything like that, it's exactly what it looks like," he said. "I can't tell you when I started having those kinds of feelings, I just did. And I never knew what I was supposed to do because I've never felt this way before, and at first it was a combination of me not wanting to do anything with it because I was under the impression I was dying and me thinking I could never actually make it work, after that I was a wreck and trying to pull my life together, and then at the end there with Enerjak I figured I didn't have anything to lose so I just, uh... went for it. Probably shouldn't have but I did 'cause I wasn't really thinking."

Somehow beyond all reasonable belief he'd managed to get the truth out. After this point Sorun didn't know what to expect, how she'd react, if he'd even be leaving this room in one piece. Part of him was in disbelief he'd even managed to get this far and lay it out as cohesively as he could possibly manage in front of Nicole, and more of him was stunned over the fact his nervousness hadn't caused him to pass out yet.

But she wasn't doing anything, and that was what was really weirding Sorun out. For sure she looked surprised, in the way her eyes had widened slightly. But otherwise she was just staring at him, and in what way he was having a hard time parsing together. Contemplation, maybe, or deep consideration. Or maybe she was deciding on which words to use to yell at him.

Yelling never came, though. He was even more shocked when the next words spoke by Nicole had come out as calm as could be. The contents of those words were another matter.

"Sorun," she began, "have you ever wondered why it is I go so far out of my way to spend so much time with you?"

"No, not at all."

Nicole straightened up a bit at that, staring owlishly at Sorun with a bit of confusion laced in her features. "Let me ask something else," she suggested. "Did you, by any chance, wonder why it was during that new years' event we all had why I specifically created a gift for you outside of that gift game we played with everyone else? You exclusively?"

After thinking for a moment, Sorun shook his head. "Nah, nah, not really."

The beginnings of frustration played over Nicole's face, but was quickly subdued. "I was clearly wrong to try subtlety with you," she quietly whispered, and then said more loudly, "Before you came here this morning I talked with Sally. And she told me of that letter you wrote to the newspaper."

He felt a bit of his face flush in embarrassment at hearing one of his deepest secrets revealed. "Okay, didn't think Sally would snitch on me like that, but what does this have to do with-?"

"Do you remember when you were reading her response to your letter in the newspaper that there was a second letter she had responded to?"

Sorun's eyes squinted in concentration. "Uhhh, yeah there was that one other one I remember. Kinda weird though, whoever wrote that one used binary to write out their handle- ohhhh..."

"Yes?"

"Ahh..."

"..."

"... Yeah I still don't know what was up with that-"

"I. Wrote. That. Letter. Sorun."

An audible gasp left Sorun. He felt himself physically recoil against the back of his chair as he stared out at Nicole, whose face looked nearly exasperated with her ears almost folded against her head. "What? No, that doesn't make any sense, why would she- because she's a computer lady , ohhhh, yeah, that makes sense." He blinked once as the implication of what she said hit Sorun. And then he blinked again. "She wrote a letter to a love column?"

He didn't know how to feel about it. He suspected he'd have a better clue if he'd ever bothered to read that other letter but he hadn't been bothered. He was more than a bit surprised she'd go and do something like that, it just didn't seem like her style, but more than that... well, he just really didn't know how to feel about it. The first thing that came to mind was genuine disappointment, and it showed on his face. Nicole seemed confused by it.

"Oh. So, uh... y-you, you wrote that. To her," Sorun muttered out, looking away from her. "Because you're... interested? In someone? In that way?"

"Yes, of course." Her next words came out as cautious. "Why do you seem upset by this?"

"I-I mean I didn't- I never would have done what I did if I knew there was someone else you actually..." Sorun stammered out. He was making such a concerted effort to look away from her, both out of shame and embarrassment, that he missed the way Nicole's ears flattened completely against her head. "I didn't- it's just that you never mentioned-"

"Why would you think it was referring to anybody except you?"

Hearing that sentence, the meaning behind it and how Nicole sounded about as confused as upset at him, was the equivalent of getting hit in the face with a hammer. For how hard and quickly Sorun's head snapped to her he may as well have been hit by a hammer. He would have thought he'd misheard her if it weren't for the way she was looking at him, with patience holding back frustration.

An extraordinary amount of mental effort was put into constructing Sorun's next words. "You... wrote that letter... in reference to me."

"Yes, Sorun, I did. I would have been completely upfront with this much sooner had I known you were going to make this so difficult." A majority of the frustration wore off of Nicole face, being replaced by curiosity when she asked, "Is it really that difficult for you to believe?"

"What do you mean? Of course it is!" Sorun exclaimed, startling Nicole slightly. "I-I-I'm not that likable a person, nobody, no one's ever, I, you, I can't believe anybody would ever..." His hands started to uncontrollably wring together. Heartrate was spiking. Breathing was rapidly increasing as Sorun tried his best to comprehend what he was hearing. "Y-y-y-you really, that doesn't, I can't, I don't understand why would you ever-?"

He nearly jumped when he felt something rest themselves on his hands. They were Nicole's hands, he'd realized. He'd been so confounded by what was happening, his mind in such a haze from it all, he hadn't even seen her get get up from the chair to approach him. He was more focused on her presence alone and not the fact her contact with his hands stopped them from shaking.

"You should be more sure of yourself, Sorun. It's unbecoming of you," Nicole said in a quiet voice. She sounded almost sad. "If I had known you had so little confidence in yourself I truly would have been more straightforward with all of this. That's my fault and I apologize."

The polite thing might have been to pull his hands away. He didn't want to pull them away was the thing. Just having her touch his hands was more calming than he thought possible. "N-no, you shouldn't have to say that," Sorun mumbled out. "I... I just... when did this become a thing?"

Nicole paused for a moment before responding. "It's as you said. I can't point towards a specific point in time these feelings developed. It wasn't as if it was a spontaneous process, Sorun, it just... happened," she said. "I confess that I understand very little of it, but from what I've gathered understanding is somewhat irrelevant in this case." She looked down at their hands. "But in truth I've harbored these feelings for quite some time."

"How long?"

"... Do you remember that conversation we had on the roof of the hospital before-" Nicole froze to momentarily consider her words, "-that mission? The day before you... temporarily expired?"

He did. The memory came with a growing pit in his stomach, but yes, he did remember talking to her the day before he died. The first time. "You said that was just about the house."

"I will freely admit the house was only a small part of what I wanted to discuss." Her expression lowered further. "But then everything happened."

"She felt this way all the way back then?" Sorun looked forwards as he began thinking. He imagined a thought bubble appearing somewhere over his head. "But... if she felt this way before the dying thing, and then I came back, but..."

Gears appeared in the cloud. Sorun's brain churned harder as he fought to remember.

"She wanted to tell me something, but then I told her I was going back, and she got all weird after- ooh, wait..."

And now it was all clear. Why she'd seemed so hesitant on the roof that day. Why she'd been reaching for his hand like that. He'd shut it all down because he thought he'd be gone forever the next day. And then he'd come back, and she'd seemed so happy, like she could finally do something she couldn't because he'd died, but then right before she could tell him he'd... told her he was going to Earth and leaving forever again...

The gears turning in Sorun's thought bubble turned into a picture of a donkey.

"... Man, I'm a jackass."

"You tried to tell me on the roof. But I deflected it because I thought I was going to die," Sorun hollowly stated.

"At the time I had thought you were too preoccupied with current affairs and elected to wait for a more opportune time," she confirmed.

"But then I came back and... told you right to your face I was leaving again. Right before you told me how you felt." He really could have died right there for how he felt. He'd been pretty happy at the time, too. He looked up at her and asked, "Why didn't you say anything?"

"I didn't want to stand between you and your home. And I had no way of knowing you reciprocated my feelings. Even then I doubt I would have said anything knowing how important your home was to you," Nicole answered. "But then everything else happened."

Somehow it was even worse hearing she gave up a chance at potentially being happy just for Sorun's sake, which just reinforced how much of a jackass he was. He didn't deserve someone treating him that decently. Hell, he didn't even deserve someone having feelings for him beyond friendship. It was such an alien experience all he could do was slump back in his chair while continuing to hold onto Nicole's hands like they were lifelines.

"... Nicole, I'm so sorry." Sorun couldn't even muster up the will to look Nicole in the eye. Not after becoming the biggest jackass in the planet to the person he liked most in this whole universe. "You... you didn't deserve any of this happening to you, I shouldn't have- I-I never wanted to hurt-"

Nicole gently squeezed Sorun's hands, calming him down. "I know, Sorun. I don't blame you for anything that happened."

Her words of assurance didn't do much in assuring Sorun, who had so many thoughts and feelings whirling through him he could barely keep track of it all. He had a hard enough time coming to terms that she liked him this deeply. Already he was going through life barely believing he had friends who actually liked him, but something like this was... so, so far beyond Sorun's ability to understand that he just didn't know. How something like this developed, why him of all people, just how much did he screw this up with his actions, how much of this could have been avoided if he said something sooner. Or maybe it would have made it worse? He didn't know.

Not knowing where else to go with this, Sorun heaved out a deep sigh and asked, "So where does this leave us?"

"... Truthfully, Sorun, this is somewhat sudden given everything that has happened," Nicole said. "You were gone for months, I thought you were gone for months, and while you're back now it doesn't make all that time spent grieving just suddenly disappear. Not immediately." She ran a thumb over the top of one of his hands. "I wish it did, though. Because it's not as if these feelings for you have vanished."

So startled from hearing that was Sorun that he'd jolted right out of his chair. The sudden movement made Nicole let go of his hands and step back in surprise at Sorun, who had backed up a few steps from her.

"Y-you mean after after everything I did, you'd... you still...?" He couldn't understand it, couldn't understand her . Why anybody would ever think of him like this when he didn't deserve it. "No, you can't- you're one of the best people in the whole world and I'm one of the worst, you-you'd do so much better with literally anyone else...!"

All Sorun's words served to do was make a sad expression appear on Nicole's face. She took a couple of steps closer to him.

"And, and I'm a mess, Nicole, I'm- I can barely hold it together in high-stress situations, I had to use the sword to cut the stress hormones out out me while I was a Freedom Fighter because I just couldn't do it sometimes, I've been breaking down for months and I-I- I'm a selfish jerk that doesn't deserve-"

For the second time in the duration they'd known each other Nicole decided to go and hug him. He couldn't fathom why. Hell, he could barely even remember the first time. The shock from seeing what happened to his home had been so intense and everything felt so numb that it barely registered in his memory. Just that it happened, but not much beyond that.

This was different. No shock, no worries, head... relatively clear. It felt different this time. Warmer. Safer. Like nothing could ever go wrong as long as she was there, if that made any sense. As if any of this made any sense.

"It's okay, Sorun," she murmured to him. He couldn't find the words to respond, too stunned to even try. "But things like that are why we need to talk." She pulled away from him, keeping her hands on his shoulders as she stared him in the eyes. "Beyond... wounding yourself like that. Which I dearly hope is a practice you put to rest, Sorun."

"N-no, I haven't... not since I died," he quickly told her, slightly panicked. He somewhat wished he hadn't let that part slip. It somehow felt liberating all the same, just getting it out. Less baggage to carry. "I never wanted... I was... I was just in a bad place. That's over. I don't need... need that anymore."

"Good. I won't hear any more of it." It was a tone of voice more firmer than Sorun was used to hearing Nicole speak in. "More than that, Sorun, it's how you treat yourself. I realize sometimes what happens is outside of your control, but other times you can be so reckless. And between you being gone, making me think you were lost forever multiple times over-"

"I know."

"I told you, Sorun, I told you after you woke up wounded from saving our friends and our people I didn't want a repeat of that experience, but... you keep doing it." Her grip on his shoulders tightened and she looked down. "And yes, Sorun, I realize a majority of the time it isn't your fault, I know it. But it's awful, these feelings of grief, always worrying over you and your safety and your health."

Sorun felt a pang of guilt hearing that, knowing everything she was referring to. "It's not as if I wanted to do any of that, Nicole. But I'm done with all that," he said with as sincere a voice as he could. "Really. All the fighting, the high-stakes battles for the world, all of that. I don't want to get involved in any of that; I'd rather leave it to all the others who do want tondo that stuff who actually have the power to do things. I'm fine with just living here in the city with a normal job and life. There's nowhere else in the world I'd rather be."

Where else could he even go? Life was pleasant here in the city. More importantly it was safe. All his friends lived here. Every single thing he cared about in the world was here. Nicole was here, and technically she was the city. It was home. His... new home.

And he didn't need to put himself in danger anymore. Not when there were others more willing and capable. He'd leave it all alone for his sake. And Nicole's too, apparently.

Her grip on his shoulder's lessened. "That is acceptable," She said, voice just a bit lighter. She let go of him and took a few steps back, folding her hands over her lap while looking hesitant, much to Sorun's surprise. "It has been more than I initially bargained for, Sorun, these emotions. Ever since I gained the capacity to recognize them. Even so, I'm... happy, to hear all of that." Her expression changed a bit, to one Sorun didn't recognize. He needed a few moments to piece together that, suddenly, Nicole actually looked shy now. It was as amusing to see as it was perplexing. "This relationship, the one between us. I will wholly admit to not being completely satisfied with it anymore. Not that our friendship hasn't been wonderful, Sorun, however..."

"You want to be more than friends?" It was honestly a miracle he hadn't stuttered that out. Nearly had.

"... I wish to make something like that work, yes," Nicole admitted. "I just think it's perhaps too soon."

"O-oh, yeah, absolutely!" The fact that an actual relationship between them had grown beyond a mere chance was something Sorun felt himself latch onto immediately, even if it wasn't something immediate. He'd take it. He'd take any condition Nicole would offer at this point if it really meant there was a way they could make this work. "I mean 'cause I gotta go and, you know, get my stuff in order. Get settled back in, talk to Honey about my job, you know I've been thinking about doing something with the house now that I've seen it in a new light and I realize it's kinda depressing to look at." Sorun's eyes widened. "Not that you did a bad job making it, it's beautiful, I just never bothered to decorate and you know what I think a rug would really tie the place together."

Nicole smiled a little. Solid progress. "It could do with a bit of color, yes," she agreed. "And I'm still in need of some time to process all this. Though, afterwards...?"

"Yeah, after everything, totally, we should..." Sorun hand began to rapidly scratch the back of his head. "That is to say, you, me, we should, um, want-want to... do you want go on a date later?" And there it was, the make or break question, the all in, the most definitively highest stress-inducing question Sorun had ever asked in his entire goddamn life.

And goddamn, he could have jumped for joy at that bright smile she gave him. "Yes, Sorun, I would very much like to go on a date with you when we're both ready."

"Okay. Alright." Considering he never once thought he'd ever get this far Sorun was at a loss for what he was supposed to say further in that regard. He knew one thing he wanted, though. "Can I get another hug?"

Some bemusement slipped into the heartwarming smile on Nicole's face, but she wordlessly agreed nonetheless and gave him another hug. It was a strange feeling. Normally he'd shrug away from anything like this. Physical affection that actually made him happy.

Or anything happy, really. And even now he'd still avoid it in public, if only for his image.

But... if it was just Nicole, that was okay. She could see this side of him. Only her. Preferably away from public eyes.

He really could get used to this feeling, though.

"Hey, can I get a third one?" Sorun asked after she pulled away from him.

Nicole's response was to lightly and playfully shove at Sorun's shoulder. "No. You'll be spoiled at this rate," she said. "In all seriousness, though, what did you have planned for today? Besides talking with me."

"Oh, right, I gotta go talk with Honey. You know, to make sure I still have a job," Sorun explained. "How's she been, by the way?"

"Her business is still fully operational as far as I am aware."

Sorun blinked. "Okay, but how is she?"

"I do not know, Sorun. I don't know her on a personal level," Nicole answered. "And last I heard she wasn't the most sociable of Mobians."

"Oh, come on, you're exaggerating."

"Sorun, you're the one who told me that."

He felt his brows furrow. Ah, right, he did. "... Well, whatever, I'm sure she's fine," he said. His head perked up as he remembered something. "Oh, yeah, and Virgil, gotta get him back. What happened with my pet?"

"Vanilla and her daughter elected to look after him," she informed him.

"Ah, alright, cool." A brief pause. "Is their own Chao still alright? What was his name? Butter?"

"Cheese, and yes. Why would he not be?"

"I think Virgil just hates Chao who aren't on his level. Or maybe he just doesn't like Cheese in particular. Dunno. Might be that red bowtie." Sorun stroked his chin in thought. "Ah, introducing Silver to him might be rough, too. Virgil might bully him."

The smile Nicole held withered a bit. "You are joking, correct?"

"No, I'm pretty sure he smells weakness. Not that Silver is weak, but for such a strong guy he has so little self-confidence, you know? I tried to help him through it, but sheesh, that guy..."

"Is that right?" Nicole glanced away from Sorun. "That certainly sounds like another I know."

"Hm? What?"

"Nothing." She looked back at him. "If you want I could go and retrieve your pet for you while you take care of the matter of your employment. I know you're busy trying to get organized, what with having just come back."

"Oh! Uh, well, that's..." Sorun quickly coughed into his hand to try and cover for the small blush he felt on his face. And he felt something flutter in his chest, too. Damn heart. "You really don't have to, Nicole-"

"I want to. And it's really no trouble, Sorun." She turned around halfway, raising her arms up as a pair of digital screens appeared before her. "There's a few things I just have to quickly check, first. I'll go right after."

"O-okay. Thanks." He didn't know what else to say to that, or even how to express his gratefulness. All Sorun could do was walk over to the door to the room while keeping his eyes on Nicole. "I'll see you later, right?"

She tore her attention away from the screens to briefly acknowledge him. "Yes, Sorun, I'll still be here for the foreseeable future," she lightly remarked.

"Okay. Just making sure." He opened the door halfway, but stopped when he got a foot out the door. "Uh, bye."

"Goodbye." With their partings given, Nicole returned to her screens. She only managed to focus on them for five seconds before she'd noticed Sorun was still in the doorway, staring at her. "Was there something else?" she asked.

Sorun straightened. "No, um... thanks."

"You already thanked me, Sorun."

"Yeah, I know, but... thanks. Really." He felt more red dust against his cheeks. He ducked his head out of the room before she could see. "Alright, I gotta go, bye."

He couldn't have closed that door behind him fast enough. With his paranoid mind Sorun was worried she might have seen him blushing. Oddly, he didn't find himself caring all that much. Anybody else he would have been enraged, but with her it was... hm. He didn't know. He was still processing the fact she'd agreed to go on a date with him eventually.

Him.

Going on a date with someone.

"Somehow it feels like this is the weirdest thing that's happened to me all year," Sorun thought to himself as he walked away from the server room. He couldn't get over how floaty he currently felt. "Man."

There it was.

Honey's boutique.

Hell on Mobius.

Maybe it was too harsh of Sorun to describe it as such; the work was steady and easy and honestly the economy in New Mobotropolis was good enough that he never had money troubles once he started here. It was mostly its crazy boss that was the issue. His boss that really probably did care more about clothes than people and who might be bipolar. Or just whacked in the head.

Maybe Honey was just an example of what an unstable Mobian looked like, Sorun didn't know. Either that or it was one of those "this person is a genius with really quirky personality traits" type deals. It was hard to say if that was even a thing in this world, because on one hand there was Tails and Rotor, who as far as Sorun was concerned were both completely normal, and then on the flip end there was Eggman. Or maybe people were just too complex to try and fit them in labeled boxes and he was wasting his time trying to figure the crazy yellow cat out.

He got bored with this line of thinking very quickly and opened the front door to the shop.

"'Ey, Honey, I'm back!" Sorun shouted out into the shop. Looked about the same as he remembered - that was to say, populated by so many articles of colorful clothing he couldn't even see the walls behind all the racks, stands, and mannequins. More mannequins than he remembered, actually. There was even one that had more human-looking proportions than Mobian proportions. Actually, the more Sorun looked the more it looked like him in mannequin form.

Where the fuck had she even gotten that?

Eyes squinting, Sorun took a closer look at the mannequin. It was... startlingly similar not just to his proportions, but how he dressed.

Same black boots, same dark blue pants, same black turtleneck shirt. Only thing it didn't have that he did was the dark blue vest and the coat, both of which had been unique gifts.

Sorun looked down at his own vest, frowning slightly. It'd been a nice vest until fucking King Shadow decided to slash the shit out of it during that fight. The coat could at least fix itself because of Nicole's nanite magic, and he was thankful for that, but the shirt and vest were shot and he'd had to carry them around for a week now without any spares. The shirt was one thing; the vest was another since it wasn't as replaceable as the shirt. He'd say it was a lost cause if he didn't know Honey could probably just spit on it and it'd be good as new. Somehow.

There was movement to Sorun's right. He turned to it, his eyes revealing to him a pile of clothes crumpled up in the corner. He wasn't even surprised when he saw Honey's head pop up from the pile, eyes bleary and face half-awake with a sock hanging off her nose.

"... What even?" Sorun asked himself upon seeing the state Honey was in.

"Ugh. Sorun?" Her honey-colored eyes looked far more awake now. "You're here?"

"Wouldn't you know it, turns out humans have nine lives. The darnedest thing, really." He pointed to the clothes pile the cat was in. "'Nother late-night bender? Told ya that you had to watch out for that. Think of your health."

After making an unamused groan, Honey's eyes crossed to look at the sock on her face. She shook her head to get the sock free, and then stood up out of the pile, loose clothing falling down around her. "Egh, of course it's you, nobody else I know sounds as patronizing as you."

He didn't take that as personally as he felt he should of, even as he watched Honey brush the last of the clothing off her black and red dress. "It's actually gotten worse over time," he informed her. "You don't seem so shocked over my sudden resurrection."

"The novelty of it kinda wore off after the first time you pulled this."

"Meh. Fair." He looked to the left and pointed at the mannequin dressed like him. "You want to explain this?"

At first, Honey looked confused by what he was referring to. But then she saw the mannequin he was pointing at, and her eyes went as wide as dinner plates. Before Sorun could say anything further she darted forwards and smacked the mannequin off its pedestal. Which... didn't really do all that much, seeing as Sorun could still see it lying on the ground.

"... I mean I can still see it, Honey, that didn't-"

Honey bent down, picked the mannequin up, and threw it behind the front counter to the shop. Then she spun back to Sorun, hands clasped behind her back with a wide smile. Sorun's expression was flat.

"Okay, you realize you can't get rid of my memory of what I just saw, right?" Sorun asked. "Like, getting the thing out of my line of sight doesn't change the fact I saw it to begin with."

Honey's obviously-fake smile began wavering. "Sorun, it's... you... you were gone a really long time this time."

Sorun gestured out to the counter. "So you made a lookalike of me?" he asked, about as curious as he was disturbed.

"It's not a lookalike," Honey argued, "it's a... it's just something to help remember you," she fumed, stomping around towards the counter. "Because it turns out it's actually nice having someone here regularly to talk at the shop and nobody else really does that and you were gone a long time, Sorun!"

He'd jumped when Honey slammed her hands on the counter. And then she immediately seemed to regret the action, because she took a few steps back behind the counter while sheepishly looking down. Sorun almost hadn't believed what he'd heard, but it'd just come out of the cat's mouth. And he couldn't help but note how endearing it was that she actually cared about him that much, considering up 'til now he thought she only cared about clothes that much. It was almost enough for him to forget the creepy mannequin. And as somebody who liked routine as much as she apparently did he could sympathize.

But Sorun being Sorun, he couldn't help but latch onto the opportunity to make fun of her for it.

"Wow, Honey, it almost sounds like you missed me," he pointed out in an utterly bland tone.

The glove that ended up sailing past Sorun's head was narrowly dodged.

"Did you come here just to mock me?" Honey asked.

"No, I came here because you're my one source of stable income in this world and I wanted to make sure I still have a job," Sorun dryly said.

"Hmph!" She crossed her arms and turned her nose up at him. "I see how it is. No heartfelt greetings, no asking if I've been alright, just straight to what you want. Well, if this is the way you're treating me after just coming back now I have to wonder why I should take you back." Her tone didn't imply she was as mad as her words said, which helped to put Sorun a bit at ease. More teasing than anything else, actually. It made him a bit more confident with his next response.

The pale teen's head turned towards the front window. "Noticed the 'help wanted' sign," he said, referring to the piece of paper taped to the window. "Also noticed it's still there despite the fact I've been gone for months," he continued, turning back to Honey. "So either coincidentally you got fed up with the work overload around the same time I came back and put the sign up recently or literally nobody's been able to hold the job in all the time I've been gone."

Honey's features tightened. Sorun didn't know if that meant she was irritated at him being right or if it was something else. "Nobody else ever taped the boxes shut right like you did."

"... What?"

"Or they don't stack the boxes neat enough, shipping labels are off-center when they tape them to the box-"

"Okay I was a bit OCD with all that, but seriously-?"

"-and a million other little things you did that they do wrong because I got used to how you did things and learned to like to work around it and- and they always look at me weirdly, like I'm weird, when I'm not weird at all," Honey seethed out.

Sorun's face was stone. "I really can't believe that. Can I have my old job back?"

"About that." Hissing through her teeth, Honey grew an awkward expression. "It was actually just yesterday somebody came in about it. Do you know Larry?"

Nope. "Nope. He a lobster?"

"No, a lynx."

"Larry the Lynx?"

"Yeah."

"Nope, not ringing a bell." He was pretty sure he'd remember someone like that.

"Well, he came in asking for the job. I was kind of skeptical about him, but he's actually pretty good at it. At least compared to everyone else. Actually listens when I tell him how to do things," she bitterly added. "Plus, you know, he's seems nice. Bit shy, but also really open and talkative! Unlike other people."

Sorun made an uncompassionate hum. "I see. But you're gonna tell him to hit the road and just hire me back, right?"

Honey grimaced. "I can't just promise someone a job and turn them down the next day because you showed back up, Sorun, it looks bad on me." He held her palms up at Sorun when she saw his face knit in irritation. "Hey, I'd love to have you back here, but I have my integrity to think of, Sorun."

"Yeah, well I got a sword that lets me teleport to anywhere in the world. What's Larry got?"

Her triangle ears going straight up couldn't have made Honey's interest more obvious. "You got that thing back?"

"Mhm, brought a Chaos Emerald back from the future, don't ask about it, seriously," he said when he saw Honey give him an odd look. "What are those mail couriers charging you to carry your stuff all over?"

"The fees are exorbitant ," Honey hissed out. "But, wait..." She blinked as she took on a thinking face. "You know, Sorun, if I just cut out the couriers entirely and just have you handle that whole process-"

"Don't like where this is going, Honey."

"Oh, come on, think about it! Once you have all the locations set up it'd take you, what, five minutes to drop stuff off potentially on another continent? I can drop off all those courier services that are trying to bleed me dry and just hire you to put them everywhere and have Larry deal with the packaging and labels and all that." She looked to the side and began tapping on her chin. "Maybe have him unpack my fabric shipments and other supplies, too. Handle the inventory. Keep him busy so I can just focus on working. Look at that, everyone wins!"

Well, everyone but the couriers, but Sorun didn't comment on that. What he did do was make a hum of contemplation. He was annoyed about the fact this entailed changing what was already a job he liked by giving it to someone else... but then again, this new gig sounded even easier than that. Maybe even let him see some sights, travel a bit. Safely. In safe places. He doubted there was much danger to be found in Station Square. Portals meant he didn't have to worry about travel times. More importantly he got to keep his mailman shtick.

Even further was the fact it gave him an excuse to keep holding onto that Emerald in case Elias or anybody else on the Council of Acorn came asking about it. That alone made the offer enticing.

"... Long as I get the hat back, I guess," Sorun finally sighed out in acceptance. "This Larry guy's on the up-and-up, right? I don't wanna work with a weirdo." Present company excluded, but he'd already grown used to Honey's brand of weird.

She made a so-so gesture with her hand. "He's... nice, like I said. 'Cept that one thing..."

"Ah, here it is."

"He's kinda infamous around town for being a real bad luck magnet. I'm actually surprised you haven't heard of him before because of it; lots of people avoid him because of it."

Sorun's brows furrowed. "Okay, is he just extremely clumsy or does he legitimately have a bad luck power? 'Cause at this point I'll buy it if he does."

Honey shrugged. "Don't really have a clue, but if the rumor mill says he's cursed with bad luck, hey, I guess he's just cursed."

"And... you want him as an employee."

"Not like I keep flammable things around. And I don't really work with what you would call fragile material," Honey said. "But listen, if he gets on board we'll try it out and if it turns out it's not really working out I'll drop him and you can have the old position. You know, in addition to teleporting around to deliver stuff."

"Ah. I get a raise if that happens, right?"

One of Honey's eyes twitched. "A modest raise."

"I dunno, I've been known to stretch the definition of words like 'modest'..."

"We will talk about it if that happens," Honey said to him, sounding like she was straining to get the words out. She evened out a second later, asking, "So was there anything else or was that it?"

"Nah, I don't-" Sorun's head perked up in realization. "Oh, yeah, one more thing. Think you can fix this?"

Honey tilted her head in interest. Interest that was quickly growing into annoyance, annoyance that might have even bordered on anger, when Sorun removed the vest he was wearing and put it on the counter. His incredibly torn vest that Honey was overlooking with a discerning eye and a look that- oh, yeah, she was genuinely angry, her tail only swished around so quickly like it was now when she was upset at something.

Before speaking, she took in a deep breath. "This was a gift," she began, looking up at Sorun. "I poured my soul, sweat, and blood into this. Actual blood, Sorun, because I pricked my finger on a needle working on this because I was running on sleep deprivation."

"You comprehend sleep deprivation?" Sorun asked in surprise. The amount of times he'd known her to work through the night said different.

"Don't get smart with me," Honey snapped. "This was a completely unique piece I never planned on replicating. A genuine Honey original! A charge a fortune for things like this and I don't even offer it to just anyone, but when I give one to you instead of treating it like the priceless treasure it is you let it get ripped up like you threw it in a blender!"

"I practically was in a blender in the fight that caused that," Sorun bit out. "Look, I'm sorry, okay? I'm actually planning on avoiding violence entirely in the future, so it's not like something like this'll ever happen again."

"Oh, so you say, but I swear the moment I turn my back you're getting limbs torn off, or impaled, or whatever even happened to this..."

"It's touching, you know," Sorun dryly remarked. "Knowing you care enough about my wellbeing to treat these very traumatic moments of my life so glibly."

"First off, glibly isn't a word-"

"It super is, what do you mean?"

"It sounds silly so I say it isn't, and second of all you told me you couldn't even feel it when you lost the arm that one time. I was even there! You barely even cared!"

"Yeah, it was still my arm , Honey!"

"You replaced it with a ghost arm! You acted like you liked that arm more than the real one!"

"Because my real arm is wimpy by comparison and the Bringer Claw looked cool- wait, I meant-" Sorun sputtered out, while Honey shot him a smug look. "... Listen, you, I'm not willing to let that last thing go. You can't just go and decide what words exist and what words don't."

"Well, guess what, Sorun. I'm your boss and I say I can."

Sorun breathed in deeply, and then exhaled in defeat. He didn't have a comeback for that. "Can you please just fix the vest?"

Thankfully, Honey nodded. "I can fix it, no problem. Even... try and get some of these spots out I'm pretty sure are bloodstains." She stuck her tongue out at seeing the darkened spots inside the vest, around the tears.

Sorun sheepishly turned to the side. "Yeah, I tried getting those out, but hotel washing machines ain't the best."

"It's fine," Honey said, waving his concerns away. Her eyes turned down to the blue coat. "Since we're on the subject, I gotta ask. Are you still going to wear that coat to work?"

"I wear it forever now, so yeah," he answered.

It almost looked like Honey was visibly wounded when she heard that sentence. "Why?"

"Because Nicole made it, and it reminds me of home." He looked down at the coat. "Why? You don't like it?"

"It's..." Honey hesitantly began, "well... fine. I suppose. Bit garish. Way too much of the primary color without enough contrast. The swirly details are... nice?"

Sorun didn't make an outward reaction. "It's my most prized possession, Honey, so can say you hate it if you want. I'm still wearing it no matter what."

"Alright, well in that case it's hideous," Honey stated with no small amount of relief.

He probably should have been mad at that. He just smiled instead. "Yeah, it's nice being home," he said under his breath.

"Hm?" One of Honey's ears flicked in interest. "What, no snappy comeback? No anger? Nothing?"

"I'm in a good mood. Turns out even I can get those. But thanks for everything Honey, seriously. Could never pay you back for everything you've done."

"Yeah. You can't."

"... I'm quittin' while I'm ahead." He turned his back to Honey, waving behind him at the cat as he made his way towards the door. "See you around, then. I'll come back on the usual schedule."

"Alright, bye." He heard ruffling behind him. "How dare he let this vest get hit so much..." he heard muttered out behind him. He shook his head with a small grin and pushed open the front door.

Sorun left the shop feeling pretty good about himself. Between securing his future and pulling off that miracle with Nicole, he dared to say he was feeling stress-free. A concept Sorun thought didn't even exist.

He was right. It didn't exist. The stress came back when Sorun exited the shop and then nearly ran face-first into a Mobian. The stress came when he realized it was a lynx that most certainly was not Nicole, eyes were blue and not green and the fur was a different, redder shade of brown. And Sorun's first thought upon seeing him was, "Ah, shit, it's Larry."

Coincidentally, Sorun finally learned if being attracted to Nicole would mean he'd begin leaking a mutual likeness towards Mobians who were lynxes. It didn't. He wanted to punch this guy in the face within two seconds of seeing him.

"Huh? What the- OH, hey! It's you!" The-one-who-was-most-definitely-Larry exclaimed with a big, happy smile. "Sorun, hey, I heard you were back! It's great to see you!"

"This fucking guy." Sorun forced himself to maintain a neutral expression. "Hey. You're Larry, right?"

The lynx blinked. "Yeah?" he answered, confused. "What- of course I am. We were neighbors. ARE, again, I guess. You go back to your old house?"

"Yeah...?" Sorun tilted his head far to the right. Neighbors? He didn't recall. "Since when are we neighbors?"

Larry's visible confusion grew. "Since... you know, since we all moved here to the city? And you moved to your house? I wave at you sometimes in the morning!"

Did he? Sorun didn't remember. He remembered in the back of his mind that there definitely was someone who would regularly wave at him in the morning. He couldn't remember if he'd ever actually spoken to that Mobian. He might've, but he never cared enough to remember. Looking back at Larry Sorun tried searching his memory for a face that even vaguely resembled his, but then Nicole's face kept popping up and he kept getting distracted.

He squinted at Larry's face, attempting to think harder.

No, Sorun was pretty sure he'd never met him before in his life. And he had lots of neighbors besides. Waving guy coulda been anyone.

"If you say so, man," Sorun said. He'd play along anyway on the assumption he was telling the truth. Probably was. Seemed earnest. "Heard you're here to steal my job."

He could of sworn he heard glass shatter somewhere when Larry's face shifted from confused to shocked. "What!? No, I would never- er, well I guess- listen I d-didn't know that- nobody else would hire me!" Larry stuttered out, eyes suddenly wide and panicked at the critical glare Sorun was sending him. He made a "eep!" sound when Sorun slinked closer to him, their faces inches apart with Sorun maintaining that blank, staring face.

"Larry. Homie. Listen, I ain't holdin' it against ya," Sorun said, slowly and evenly, with the smallest of upturns on the corners of his mouth. "Desperate for a job, I get it, the market wasn't kind to me, either. Been there. But I smoothed things over with Honey. You and I, guy, we're coworkers now."

"R-really?" Some of the nervousness disappeared from Larry. Some. He still seemed marginally creeped out by Sorun's distance and tone. "You- you talked with her already?"

"You'll have to ask her about the details. I don't feel like explaining it." Sorun leaned to Larry's side, who stepped a bit away from Sorun with a wary expression. "So do you really have a bad luck power?"

Larry looked ten times more uncomfortable the moment the topic was brought up. "I don't think it is? I don't know, I- bad stuff just happens around me, alright, please stop staring at me like that!"

Sorun didn't. "Is that right? Well, it's not an ideal power, but I've seen worse. Like that guy with invisible skin."

"But wouldn't being invisible be cool?"

"No, it was just his skin. His muscles and organs and stuff were still visible."

Larry recoiled. "Ugh! That's awful! Was there really someone like that back where you're from?"

Sorun chuckled and leaned back away from Larry, who seemed to relax at the new distance. "Nah, I got that from a comic," he answered. The shock and horror Larry held was replaced by a small bit of amusement. His stature relaxed a bit more, even if he still seemed off-put by Sorun's presence. "Look, real talk. I managed to keep my job with Honey and I don't really care if you actually do have a power like that. Just don't do something stupid and we're cool."

He seemed surprised, at first. At what, Sorun didn't know, but the male lynx looked surprised at Sorun's words. Like he hadn't expected something he'd said. Words Sorun regretted saying when a warm expression grew on the Mobian's face. "Well, geez, Sorun, thanks. Nobody's ever really said that to m-"

"Bear in mind if Honey has to drop one of us you're on the chopping block, so it doesn't affect me much either way."

"You... yeah, okay." Larry sighed out and deflated a bit. "So, um. It's nice to work with you?" Larry tried, managing a wavering grin as he held a hand up for Sorun to shake.

Sorun looked down at the offered hand. He thought about it for a second.

"I'm going home." He shoved his hands in his pockets, turned around, and started walking away.

"Eh...?" Confused and a bit crestfallen, Larry's hand retreated back to his side as he watched Sorun walk away. "O-okay! So I'll see you around, then!?" he called after Sorun. When the human didn't respond, Larry sighed again and turned to the shop's door. "Yeah, um, we'll see each other again, I guess. Yeah..." he mumbled out as he entered the shop.

His parting words were already forgotten by Sorun by the time he'd gotten far enough away from the shop. "Okay, slight wrinkle, but I guess it doesn't really matter long as La... fuck was his name, Lars?

Yeah. Long as he stays outta my way I don't care all that much." He scratched at the back of his head. "Kinda screws up my routine, though. Kinda liked it when it was just us two at the shop. Bothersome."

Sorun supposed that maybe delivering packages via portals would be a bit more engaging and fun than packaging stuff and messing with labels all day. There'd been a sense of serenity, though, in how calming that work had been, and it bugged him a bit Lars had that job now even if he got a decent substitute. He still wouldn't be pulling for him to keep the job, though. Especially since it meant a potential raise for Sorun.

Maybe he could do something to sabotage him. Blame it on the bad luck so Honey would fire him so things could go back to how they used to be.

Nah, he didn't feel like being that much of a dick, and he didn't need the extra money, anyways. Lars could have his fair shake. Sorun didn't care.

But, these were all matters to consider for later. Right now Sorun had the rest of the day to consider. And as he stopped to take in the sight of the city in front of him, he realized, for once in a long while, he could finally just relax. The thought put a smile on his face.

It was nice being home.

A/N- You know, it really feels like I coulda ended the story right there and picked the rest up in a sequel. Try to break it up a bit since this story's already so long. Not gonna, but just a thought.

Chapter 90

Recursion Error

Episode 90- Worth

Usually the hard choices required people that actually knew what they were doing within the context of these choices. Sorun wasn't one of those people, but at the same time he was the only person in the whole universe in a position to make this choice. It had to go down to him. But how could anybody reasonably make this kind of decision? The kind of choice that broke lesser men?

Sorun made a frustrated sigh and lowered the fan deck of paint colors he was looking at. He didn't know what the hell he was doing. How was he supposed to know which color out of the literal thousands on these things he was supposed to pick for his house? He tried narrowing it down to something blue, but that still left hundreds. The only one he was dead-set on not using was cobalt and its derivatives since it looked too much like Sonic but that still somehow left hundreds more. He didn't even know where the lady running the paint stall in the market was finding all these colors.

In the living room, Silver started screaming. Sorun ignored him and looked back at fan deck.

Eh, cerulean seemed enticing. Maybe too bold, though...

He noticed something materialize besides him. Normally he would have been jumping for joy on the inside and would have warmly greeted Nicole, but Sorun's focus on this task was so intense all he could do was note her presence as he stared at the fan deck.

"Hello, Sor... un?" The screaming drew Nicole's attention and caused her to look from him to the entrance to the living room. "Sorun, why is your houseguest screaming?" she asked.

"I think Virgil's attacking him again. They haven't been getting along," Sorun answered. He flipped through the fan deck.

"SORUN, GET THIS THING OFF OF ME!" came Silver's shrill scream from the living room.

She looked back at Sorun. "Should you go assist him?"

"Probably, yeah."

Nicole waited, patiently looking at Sorun.

Sorun did nothing and continued to look at the fan deck full of paint colors.

"Are you going to assist him?" Nicole finally asked.

"No. Cyan? No, no..."

After a few more moments of waiting, Nicole wordlessly turned around and walked towards the living room. Sorun, meanwhile, continued staring at colors.

"Turquoise? Nah, that's more of a green..."

She had a running hypothesis that the bond shared between Sorun and Virgil had caused something unnatural to form in the Chao's evolution. Humans and Overlanders weren't typically found in the same environment as Chao the way Mobians were, and in Sorun's case he wasn't even of the same world. There was no other explanation Nicole could see for why Sorun's Chao was so atypical compared to all other Chao. Generally speaking Chao were never prone to violence and otherwise friendly. Virgil was not. The new form a Chao took in its evolution was not supposed to detract too far from the Chao's original form. Virgil looked nothing like the Chao he used to be, though Sorun had never seemed surprised by his appearance for whatever reason.

There had to be some cause behind it, but frustratingly Nicole's own data about Chao was sparse. In fact, there were no Mobians in the city that were interested in pursuing research on the species. She would confess she was among them; too many other matters to attend to. So she supposed it would have to remain a mystery.

When she entered the living room, she was greeted to the sight of Silver sitting on the couch, thrashing around and reaching up to his head. Virgil was sitting there, pulling on those strange, standing strands of hair of his. He at least showed enough restraint not to use those blade appendages on his arms. The only person she'd ever witnessed him try to cut with those was Sonic, and she suspected that was just because he knew he couldn't actually hurt him.

Restraint or not, though, this was still unacceptable behavior.

"I would kindly ask you immediately cease this at once, Virgil." The words were gentle. Her tone was not, matching the scolding glare she was sending the Chao. He'd frozen, blue eyes disturbingly similar to Sorun's meeting her own, his demeanor shifting towards looking embarrassed and angered. He released the white hair strands and allowed Nicole to gently pick him up and nestle in the crook of her arm without so much as a struggle. He'd never once been violent with her.

Silver made a relieved sound at his newly-liberated and shook his head. "Ugh, glad that's over," he muttered, and then sent her a grateful look. "Hey, thanks a lot, uh..."

"Nicole."

"Nicole, right. Thanks." He made a small groan and held a hand to his forehead, wincing slightly. "I don't know what's wrong with that thing..."

"What did you do to provoke him?" she inquired.

"I didn't do anything!" Silver exclaimed. "All I did was sit down on the couch next to him, and suddenly he started growling at me! And when I said I was sorry he went ballistic! I don't know why Sorun keeps the little nightmare around, all it does is hiss at me and-"

"Virgil is Sorun's companion and has every right to be living here," Nicole cut in, making Silver freeze mid-sentence. "How long do you plan on staying in Sorun's home?"

A nervous expression grew on Silver's face. "Uh, is- there isn't a problem, is there?" he stuttered out. "Because if there is, um, I'm sorry if I did something-"

"There is no problem."

The nervous expression became somewhat mollified, though Silver didn't look like he completely believed her. "Um, alright. Sorun said I could stay with him for as long as I needed to help fix the future. Hey, speaking of which, what did everyone-?"

"Based on the extremely negligible amount of data you have provided to us, about a nebulous threat you cannot identify in any shape nor even name, set to arrive at a time you have absolutely no indication of, with absolutely no evidence to support your claims other than the words of both Sorun and yourself, of which only one is credible, the Freedom Fighters have elected to follow Sorun's advice and 'let you deal with the future problem' if and when it arrives. They will provide support if available," Nicole informed him. "But at the moment they're occupied handling real, tangible threats putting people's lives at risk."

The white hedgehog didn't seem surprised at the news, but he looked a bit crestfallen all the same. "That's... pretty fair, I guess," he sighed out. "You guys have your own problems, I get that. I just really don't want to mess this up, you know?"

She didn't. Not really. All of the Freedom Fighters were incredibly skeptical of Silver's claims of a desolate future caused by a threat he came back to the past with the explicit reason of stopping. They only remotely believed it because Sorun supported his claims, even if Sorun himself had been sparse on the details.

Green eyes flicked down to Virgil. The Chao decided on sleeping, resting soundly in the crook of the lynx's arm. She softly ran her fingers over the silver, cylindrical horns on his head and looked back up at Silver. "I apologize if I have caused any undue stress, Silver. It wasn't my intention to appear antagonistic to you," she said. "I simply find it odd Sorun would extend such courtesy towards you."

"Odd" was a strong word. Possibly. It was hard to say with Sorun. He had a kind heart, even if he bizarrely refused to admit it. But she'd seen him interact with others, and how he displayed clear biases. How he showed more open inclinations towards those he would consider friends over strangers and neighbors. How he treated her differently than everyone else, how he acted around her. So it simply seemed strange he offered so much to Silver, but many things about him had changed since his return. She had hopes it was a positive sign.

Silver seemed confused by the question. "Why? Sorun's a great guy," Silver said. "He, um, took care of me while we were on our way here. In bigger places full of people and stuff I didn't, er... well, deal with well," he nervously admitted. "We looked out for each other. He's done nothing but look out for me. He's my best friend and I, well, I can't say it to his face but honestly it kind of feels like he's doing too much for me. Even if, you know, he did have the empty room to spare." He grew a bit stiff at the unblinking gaze Nicole was giving him. "Er, ma'am."

"Nicole is fine," she assured him. "You needn't feel this way, Silver. Sorun wouldn't offer so much if he wasn't sure." She made a small pause. "And I feel I must thank you personally. For being there with him to help him find his way home. I'm glad he had someone like you there to help him."

Someone there to help him when she couldn't. Somebody to help guide him back when she hadn't even known where he was. Stuck in this city while he'd been off risking his life against his will just to save everyone once again. Events and variables she knew were outside of her scope of ability to help in any feasible way. Thousands of simulations being ran that told her the events that transpired was the best possible outcome. Entire nights spent reassuring herself it was the best possible conclusion even if it didn't feel like it.

But, of course, Sorun was here now and promised to stop endangering himself. And she believed him, because she knew he genuinely didn't want to be in danger and that he would never commit such an overt lie to her. Things would be fine. More than fine, with how... events between them were progressing. It would be perfect if Silver and his "future issue" weren't the small wrinkle in it all.

"I would just ask that, whatever danger is inherently threatening the future, Silver, that you would handle the brunt of it, whether or not the Freedom Fighters are able to assist," Nicole said. "You're uniquely equipped to deal with the issue, while Sorun is..." Healing. Recovering. Mentally worn. Didn't need to be doing this kind of thing anymore, "... less capable than you, admittedly."

"Hm? Oh, yeah, I know," Silver assured her. "I mean he told me stories about stuff he did and everything, but, uh... I know he's got the weird sword that makes me feel tingly whenever I'm near it, but I'm not even sure Sorun's even good at fighting. I mean, the guy's so nice. I can't see him hurting anyone."

Nicole felt Virgil rustle a bit in her grasp.

"Hey may surprise you," Nicole said, laying a calming hand on the Chao. She made a smile. "But thank you for understanding. Has Sorun told you what the purpose of that deck of colors is? He seems to be struggling on deciding something."

"Oh, yeah, Sorun said he wants to paint the house."

"... Paint?"

He was still looking at that fan deck when Nicole re-entered the kitchen, sleeping Chao in hand. Sorun looked up briefly as she approached and then waved at her. "I have good news, Nicole," he said. "I've narrowed it down between colors C#182 and C#187."

"That's nice." And baffling, because this made absolutely no sense. "Virgil showed hostile behavior towards Silver for sitting next to him. And then he attacked him for apologizing."

Sorun's face wrinkled. "He apologized ?" he asked in a tone implying he thought Silver was foolish for doing something reasonable. "Ugh, that just made it ten times worse. Virgil isn't going to respect him if he keeps acting so timid. He picks on him 'cause he lets him."

"And what would you recommend he do to rectify this?"

"Dude can literally move stuff with his mind. All he has to do is float Virgil around so he can't touch 'im and they'll be chill in no time."

Interesting. He seemed well-versed in what had to be an aberrant mutation of Chao evolution. She filed the information away for later and shifted to a new topic. "Sorun, why are you consulting that fan deck for paint colors?"

"Because there's like a billion and a half choices. I went with cerulean after all but I still can't decide on which type-"

"Sorun, I can have the nanites composing your house change color at will. You don't need to paint it." It wasn't even that hard. It just involved shifting the external structure of the nanites slightly so the light bounced off of them at a different frequency. It'd take all of a second.

The human paused. She witnessed his face go through a series of micro expressions, but it was obvious he was struggling to keep some sort of outburst contained. It took nearly fifteen seconds for him to calm down and take a deep breath before speaking. "Well, uh... it's good to support local businesses, Nicole."

"You never considered I can just change the color." It wasn't a question. It was a factual statement. The way Sorun winced slightly proved it. "Sorun..."

"Alright, I didn't think, but look, I already told the paint stand lady I'd be doing this and I don't wanna flake out on her now that I'm committed. I gotta walk past her stand every time I go to the market to buy food," he said. "Besides! It could be relaxing."

"Relaxing."

"Yeah, you know, painting. The house. Silver said he'd help." Sorun shrunk in on himself slightly, something Nicole immediately picked up on. "I've just never done something like this so I thought hanging around and doing a fun project with a friend would be nice, but I'm sorry if you-"

All of her previous objections were instantly deleted. "No, Sorun, it's completely fine," she assured him with a smile. "I'm sure a small project such as this can be fun." Something relaxing. Something constructive and mentally healthy for him to do. And the house could do with some work, anyways, she'd always regretted never furnishing it beyond the bare essentials. "Though maybe you could at least let me just change the color of the interior? You've never mentioned having experience in this type of work."

Sorun shrugged. "I filled out a coloring book when I was a kid, so I don't imagine it's much different than that."

This wasn't a sentence that inspired confidence in Nicole on Sorun's ability to do this. And sadly, she completely expected it. "Have you at least considered what type of primer to use for the house?"

After shooting her a questioning look, a rather worrying sign, Sorun looked back at the fan deck. "What color is primer? I already told you I'm going with cerulean."

Of course. "I will explain it to you on the way to procure the paint," she promised him. If only because she'd forgone the consideration to just undo his work once he was asleep and just use the nanites for fear of accidentally demeaning him. Even if it would be simpler.

The sacrifices she made for him.

"Alright, if you say so." Sorun put the fan deck down and grabbed a nearby kitchen knife. "But I think this'll be great," Sorun continued, making his way towards a nearby light switch as Nicole watched in curiosity. "There's another person that runs a curio shop that's been trying to get rid of these rugs. Might buy them since he's selling them for super cheap. Thinking of getting some furniture, too."

He put the knife in one of the screws holding the light switch to the wall and began unscrewing it with the knife. Nicole did not know why he was dismantling the light switch. "I can simply create furniture for you," she offered, unable to look away from what Sorun was doing.

"Aw, that's sweet of you, Nicole. Thanks." She didn't know why she felt so delighted to hear Sorun speak to her like that. It almost distracted her from the fact he was pulling the light switch off the wall, letting it hang by its wires. It didn't manage to distract her. "Hey, Antoine still knits, right? He had these really nice coasters at his house and I'm wondering if he'd make me some."

He pulled a jingling bag of coins out of the wall from where he'd dismantled the light switch. She was sure something in her servers short circuited.

"... Sorun, why?" Really the only query she was able to formulate at the sight before her. What else was she supposed to ask? Why would any decent individual store money in their walls?

"Hm?" Sorun looked from the money to Nicole, and then caught her staring at the money. "Oh, it's a stash. I stash things. My mom taught me to in Detroit."

Every single time Sorun mentioned his home Nicole wondered why it was Sorun wished to return there. Beyond the obvious of it being the home of his friends, family, and culture. Because sometimes he would say things like this that would paint that city as some den of debauchery and crime with a worryingly low life expectancy, the kind of conditions that would not be unheard of in the western desert lands such as Sandblast City, and Nicole continued to count it fortunate that Sorun didn't have to live in such a terrible place anymore. Because he truly made it sound like an awful place to live in.

Oddly, that assessment came into conflict with Sorun's own opinion of Detroit, because according to him it had been a wonderful city to live in. Nicole couldn't see how since in that same conversation he'd mentioned a stray bullet had gone through his window during a New Year's Eve event at his home at one point. And that he'd been acquainted with an insane homeless man. The fact there were even homeless there to begin with seemed appalling to her, not to mention the repeated mentions of crimes he had personally witnessed. But somehow, despite all the evidence to the contrary, he always praised the city as a fine place to live in. She suspected a variation of Stockholm Syndrome was to blame.

"Sorun, we have a bank," Nicole informed him, wanting to focus on the important issue of him storing money in his walls like some form of deviant. "I would like for you to start using the bank like a responsible person."

"But-!" He looked like he wanted to protest the request. All Nicole had done in response was give him a small look, something that could barely be called pleading, and he'd shifted his expression completely. From looking like he wanted to deny her to a shy and submissive face. "I-I'll make an account there when I can," he mumbled, looking down. "I'll need to go through the fifty stashes I have around the house at some point."

Nicole's ears flicked. "Fifty?" she repeated, desperately hoping the audio receptors had incorrectly translated that despite knowing there was a near-zero chance of that.

Sorun nodded. "Yeah, behind the light switches, under the drawers, behind the freezer, under the bed, in the hollow spots in the frame of some of the chairs-"

"I think I see," Nicole interrupted. "Sorun, there are no criminals in this city. And even if there were my security countermeasures are more than enough to protect the people living here," she said. "You truly don't need to take measures like this. You know this." She gestured to the hanging light switch. "So why are you going through such ridiculous means of hiding your earnings?"

He nervously crumpled the bag in his hand. "I didn't mean to insult you, Nicole. It's just a habit. From my old home."

"You didn't insult me," she softly replied. "Were robberies something common where you're from?"

"Uh, well, n- I mean not my house personally," Sorun said. "Others, yeah. Neighbors a couple of times."

"And you enjoyed living there?"

"What? Yeah, of course. Detroit was a great place."

She didn't know why he kept saying that when it clearly wasn't true. "You repeatedly have told me that multiple times you witnessed grievous acts of crime being committed in your old city. You told me you saw police officers assaulting a man before arresting him."

"To be fair that guy was a pretty well-known local drug dealer. And he stabbed a cop with a piece of glass."

More conflicting information to his statements. "Did your mother not once ever think to move somewhere else?"

"Move where? Stuff like that was ubiquitous across the whole country. Besides, Detroit was home."

"... I see." Was he just so acclimatized to things of that nature it barely even registered with him? It was a concept Nicole had a difficult time processing, but it did line up with some of his more unusual quirks. How in the early days of being on this planet he'd never shown all that much outward reaction towards Dr. Robotnik's greater atrocities. There'd been disgust, over course, but the shock. He'd never overly displayed it. He'd simply "rolled with it," as Sorun himself would say. She'd wondered if all the various types of media he'd consumed in the past contributed. Now she had to wonder if simply his living conditions had... desensitized him, somehow.

There had to be something there. Perhaps relating to the reason Sorun very noticeably never went into much detail about the history of his planet whenever she inquired, just the broad aspects without specifics.

She cut off that line of thinking. Whatever the case, it was completely irrelevant. He was here now, in her city. Such things didn't need to be a concern for him anymore. But she could accommodate certain habits of his, if it was what he wanted. Within reason.

"I would still like for you to visit the bank," Nicole stated carefully. "But if you truly feel the need to, I will make a safe for you. To store a portion of your earnings. Because I refuse to have you continually dismantle the light switches." She made a small, displeased look. "And on the condition you stop calling it a 'stash'."

Sorun blinked. "Why?"

"I dislike how punkish it sounds."

Rolling his eyes, Sorun said, "Fine, emergency repository."

Nicole brightened up. "Yes, that will suffice wonderfully."

"If it makes you feel better, then sure. Ooh, but can we make it one of those wall safes behind the painting? Always wanted one of those."

She really did want to refuse what was clearly a childish request. But seeing the small twinkle in Sorun's eyes and the way he seemed so excited at the prospect forced Nicole to reluctantly agree. "You may have a concealed wall safe, yes," she assured him. Despite the fact such a thing was unnecessary since no thief would ever be able to get within even a hundred meters of this home. But if it was for Sorun's peace of mind, it was a small price to pay.

"Alright. Things are looking up. 'S this even enough? Never actually asked how much she charged for paint- eh, I'll work it out," Sorun muttered to himself as he put the bag of coins down. He then turned back towards the light switch, putting it back in place and re-screwing the screws with the knife while saying, "This'll all work out, you'll see. I don't see any way this can go wrong."

"No. Of course it won't." Nicole paused. "Perhaps you should allow me to change the interior of the house since you're so adamant on painting the outside."

"Hm?" Sorun turned away from the light switch. "Why?"

"You would have to move all the furniture around," she said, quickly. "This already seems like so much work and I wouldn't want you to overexert yourself." Nor did she want him to make a mess of the interior with what was glaringly obvious a lack of skill in this particular field. But she didn't have the heart to tell him she harbored doubts over his ability to do this, or to even correct what was clearly a misplaced sense of confidence. He had so little of it as it was she didn't want to make him dejected.

Thankfully, it seemed Sorun accepted the excuse she'd provided. "Ah. Alright, I guess that makes sense." He looked down a bit and pulled the fan deck closer to him. "I actually wanted to keep the ceiling white but was thinking about a not-quite-white, kinda lightish-gray color for the walls. So there's like forty options for that, so-"

"I can change it on a whim, Sorun."

"Well in that case I was thinking..."

"Okay this whole primer thing's kinda thrown a wrench in the plan, guys, but I think we can pull this together yet."

Apparently there was this whole thing Sorun didn't know about where you were supposed to coat whatever you were painting with this weird preparatory paint. Which meant they were going to have to go over this house an additional time more than he'd planned for, but it wasn't the biggest deal. The house fortunately wasn't all that big to begin with, at least, and the fact it didn't have any hard edges or corners... maybe helped. Sorun had never done this before so he didn't know.

He looked to his left. Silver didn't have nearly the amount of confidence Sorun had from the hesitant look on his face. Virgil just looked more bored than anything. It was Silver's obvious concern that had Sorun's interest at the moment.

"Sorun, are you really sure we should do this?" Silver asked. "I mean... I mean the house already looks fine the way it is, doesn't it?"

"The house looks the exact same from the outside as every other house around here," Sorun said. "I need to do something that sets it apart from everyone else so I know it's mine. And it'd be nice not to have to count the houses so I know which one's mine." He'd gotten lost on more than one occasion trying to navigate his way back to his own home in the past. Never messed up as much as to go to the wrong house, thankfully, but it'd be a nice improvement all the same.

"Yeah, sure," Silver continued, "but... but can't Nicole just, you know, chance the color? With the nanite stuff?" He looked around a bit. "Where even is she?"

"Oh, she said she'd just change the color of the nanites inside the house so we don't have to paint the inside."

Silver whipped his head back to Sorun, stuttering out, "W- then wh- why are we doing this, then!?"

"Because it's my day off, we're bored with nothing to do, and..." Sorun trailed off with a sigh and hung his shoulders. "Look, man, I don't know, I already bought the paint and everything and I just thought it'd be a fun thing for us to do."

"I... I guess." He seemed to accept the answer, if a bit reluctantly, and bent down to pick up one of the paintbrushes. "Why'd you buy ten paintbrushes, though?" he asked, gesturing to the other nine spread out on the ground in front of them.

Sorun looked up from the brushes at Silver, saying, "Well, I mean, I figured, you know... we could do this a lot faster if you floated a bunch of the brushes around." He rose his fingers up and wiggled them at Silver. "With your mind powers."

The hedgehog opened his mouth a bit and squinted at the gesture, and then shook his head and looked at the brush. "Well, sure, I can do that, but... doesn't that kind of defeat the purpose of what we're doing?"

"I don't feel like spending all day on this." Because it's not like this would take more than a couple of hours. It was just coloring. Sounded easy.

"Well if you were gonna have me do that then why didn't you just buy a hundred brushes? We could have done this way faster."

Sorun blinked in surprise. "You can do that many?"

"Yeah? Why wouldn't I be able to?"

The human teen let out a light breath of surprise at hearing that. He'd underestimated Silver a bit there. "Alright, well I don't want to be the owner of a hundred paint brushes anyways," he muttered out. "'Sides, you know how much a hundred paint brushes cost?"

"No, but I get what you mean." Silver looked down at one of the paint cans. A teal aura appeared over the lid, and then the lid itself detached itself from the can and floated down onto the ground next to it. "How are we doing this?"

"I get a brush, Virgil gets a brush, you get the rest of the brushes."

Silver did a double-take on Sorun. "Your pet's helping with the painting? Why?"

"What, you thought I brought him out here just so he could watch the paint on the house dry?" Sorun asked. "He's got..." He stopped himself and looked at Virgil's arms. "He doesn't have fingers but he can still hold stuff. I dunno how but he can."

"Chao."

Looking back and forth between the two, Silver ended up sighing and shaking his head as eight paintbrushes were telekinetically risen up around him. "Alright, fine. So how do we go about doing this?"

"We take the brushes, we slather them in colorful gunk, and coat the house with the stuff. How hard can it be?"

---

30 minutes later

Half an hour into this project Sorun came to the sobering conclusion that he really should have just asked Nicole to change the color of the house. 'Cause this wasn't fun.

He'd thought there'd be at least an iota of enjoyment to be found in it. A nice day, good weather, small activity for him and his housemates to do. Chance to unwind for once, maybe clear his head a bit while getting the whole gotta-color-the-house thing out of the way. It was his one major hope because he hadn't gone into this actually thinking any of that. He'd only told Nicole all of that because he genuinely didn't consider the fact she could just change the color and made it up on the spot to try and claw back just a shred of his legitimacy. If this were actually an enjoyable process it would have been a flawless plan.

But he was starting to see why Tom Sawyer always foisted off painting a fence to some sucker. Because painting was boring.

By god it was boring.

And to think somehow people on Earth had made a living out of doing this. Madness.

"~Regrets, I've had a few...~ Yeah, I've had a few, alright. Few million's more like." After another brush stroke of this white stuff - the stuff you were supposed to cover whatever you were painting with before you actually painted it for some reason - he failed to repress a groan and looked to the left. Despite having the ability to use eight whole paintbrushes Silver wasn't making a whole lotta progress. Likely due to a lack of enthusiasm, Sorun reckoned, because he looked like he was halfway to falling asleep over there. Sorun couldn't really blame him.

Sorun looked to the right at the lone paintbrush sitting on the ground. Virgil got bored five minutes in and just left.

"Hey, Sorun?" Silver called out. "How much longer 'til we're done with this?"

An unenthused breath left Sorun. "'Til we're done, I guess."

"Well, how long's that gonna take? Because we're not even a quarter of the way done with this yet."

Sorun looked at the house. It honestly seemed like somehow they were making negative progress with how slow this was going. A few uneven streaks of white against the normal, off-white surface of the house. His estimate of this getting done by day's end wasn't looking optimistic. "I ain't gonna lie, Silver. I don't wanna do this anymore."

The white-furred Mobian looked incredibly relieved at that. "Oh, that's great. So we can stop now, right?"

"No, we're too committed. Gotta finish," Sorun mumbled as he slapped the brush back against the house.

"Agh, why!?" Silver cried out in dismay. So much dismay, in fact, the paintbrushes hovering around him dropped to the ground. "We're nowhere near even halfway done with this yet after all this time and you want us done before the sun even sets!? It's no use! So why are we doing this instead of just having Nicole take a single second to change the color!?"

"Because that'd be the easy way. And in any other circumstance I'd totally take the easy way, Silver, but this just happens to be the one where I can't."

"But why ?" Silver groaned out. "Just why , Sorun?"

With a sigh, the arm holding the paintbrush dropped down to Sorun's side. "Because if I quit now and go to Nicole with this then I look like an idiot for not coming to her first with this. And it'll also mean I just bought all these painting supplies for nothing."

"So we're doing this just because of your ego!?"

He didn't even have it in him to refute that. "Look, Silver, it's hard enough dating someone who's superior to you in every conceivable, feasible way imaginable and probably has an IQ with four digits,"

Sorun said with a glum voice. "Like, what do I have compared to that? I got a magic sword I use to deliver mail. That's it. That's my thing. It's not a whole lot."

"We haven't technically gone on that date yet."

There was a loud yelp from Sorun, followed by him spinning around. The paintbrush had been accidentally released in the process and flew off somewhere. And of course the owner of the voice he heard was standing there behind him, with her arms crossed. And with his luck Nicole heard all the words she was never supposed to hear.

She didn't look overly upset, at least. Just standing there, giving him a critical glare. And then her head turned just a few millimeters towards Silver. "Silver, would you mind leaving us for just a bit?" she asked.

"Does that mean I get to stop painting the house?"

"Yes."

"Sorry, Sorun, but I don't want to do this anymore." And with those words said, Silver turned around and made his way towards the front door of the house. Sorun'd be more upset if he didn't know he'd do the exact same thing, but most of his focus was on Nicole right now.

A few tense seconds passed. Sorun nervously tugged at his shirt's collar. "Uh... what's up...?" he tried.

Before responding, Nicole peered over Sorun's shoulder at the mess of uneven streaks painting the wall behind him. And then she looked down at all the paintbrushes Silver had discarded. Finally, she looked at him. "You didn't plan this with fun in mind," she observed.

"... Nah, no, no sane man would. If I'd known ahead of time you could just change the color with a thought I wouldn't have bothered. That was just a lie I made up on the spot," he confessed. With some reluctance, but at this point there was no hiding it. He swore, she always somehow found out.

"But you went along with this anyways." She looked a bit sad and frustrated when Sorun's posture slumped even further. "Sorun, you don't have to try and prove anything to me. You're never not going to be good enough for me to hold you in high regard."

It was something that should have lifted Sorun's spirits right then and there, but he didn't quite believe her. "It's just... frustrating."

Nicole's ears lowered a bit. "You should stop holding yourself to such impossible standards," she said. "By our very own nature we're different. We have different limits and capabilities as a result. That doesn't detract from who you are as a person, Sorun."

"Yeah, but it's always kind of been like this," Sorun muttered, turning towards the streaked wall. "Like, with everyone. And I don't mean just the fact half my friends have cool powers," he admitted, turning back to Nicole. "... Okay, a bit of that, but because Mobians in general are..."

"More physically apt?" Nicole tried in an attempt to be gentle.

"Sure. Yeah. That. Geez, even in my old home it was a problem," Sorun said, trying and failing not to think of a time where his skill with video games was the only thing that'd set him apart in a world full of tall people. Being shunted onto a planet where everyone was physically stronger than him never changed the status quo all that much. "But there's nothing I can do about it, so eventually I stopped worrying about it, but now there's you, and us, and now the whole dynamic's... you know, different, and you're this amazing person that mastered nanite tech and built a whole city and transcribed all the books in the library and the textbooks and stuff and handle all the infrastructure and everything. And I deliver mail."

For better or worse, Nicole had given him an understanding look. "You're not satisfied with your position?"

"No, it's great, I'm just saying that the dichotomy between mail guy and what you do is substantially vast." He glanced over his shoulder at the wall. "So when I screw up something simple like this it... kind of just reminds me of that." The inequity of it. The difference of significance between them. How someone like him really had no business dating someone like her, but somehow that was happening despite the fact Sorun didn't feel like he measured up to an acceptable standard.

The ears on Nicole's head lowered further. "You're not an AI, Sorun. It'd be impossible for anyone not what I am to keep up with the things I do. Even other AI."

"I guess..."

"You 'guess' nothing. It's the simple truth," Nicole said. When Sorun's mood didn't visible improve she stepped closer to him. "None of that even matters, Sorun. All I care for is who you are as a person."

"... Thanks." He wasn't in complete agreement that the content of someone's character was the only sole thing that mattered, but maybe here in a place where most everyone looked different from one another it was different. A moot point. Either that or Sorun was too pragmatically shallow, he didn't really know. But he could drop the matter and just go along with it since the way he was acting was troubling Nicole a bit. The encouraging words helped that along.

The hug she gave him after helped a lot, too. He was almost surprised he wasn't fighting against it, what with being out in the open at the potential exposure of others seeing, but it was something Sorun was growing to care less about.

He tilted his head down a bit. Maybe she was right and it didn't matter. He had her . Somehow. That alone constituted as a win as far as he was concerned, and if him being on the bottom of the food chain didn't bother her in the slightest, then more power to him. He didn't need to be great, anyways. Not in this new life he was making. What he was right now was good enough. Good enough for her, at least. Good enough he managed to hold onto friends. Good enough he was living.

Did he really need to worry about being inadequate when he had all that? Did it even matter? Nicole said it didn't. Sorun... wanted to believe her. Was starting to. The hug was helping.

"I'm also going to shift the color of the house later," she told him. Right when Sorun had almost forgotten about this disaster of a project he'd undergone. He was grateful nevertheless.

"Alright." He peered past her shoulder and at the paint cans lying on the ground. "I don't know what I'm supposed to do with all this paint now."

"One of the teachers at the educational center opened an arts and crafts program for the children. I can simply donate it to them if you want."

"Yeah, sure, kids love blue paint." They broke away from the hug, with Sorun shyly looking down while rubbing at his arm. "So, uh, house is done being remodeled, I guess. Except the rugs. Still waiting on those."

"There's still the furniture," Nicole reminded him.

"Oh, right." Sorun's head perked up. "So are we going with the kind of furniture we have to build, or...?"

She gave him one of those looks , the kind that said he should know better. "I can just create the furniture, Sorun. In fact it would take me longer to design furniture intended to be assembled by hand than to just create the furniture itself."

"Right, yeah, that makes sense," Sorun amended. The brief burst of embarrassment he felt was quickly washed off when he nodded his head towards the house. "Go right now?"

"Yes, let's."

A small hum left Sorun as he stared at the space, fingers arranged into the shape of a rectangle as he considered. It was an empty place at the corner of the living room that wasn't used for anything at all in particular, like much of the house before he decided to furnish it. He never had plans for it originally, like ninety percent of the rest of the house, but now that he decided to fill it with stuff he was trying to decide what to fill it with.

He was considering a bookshelf.

At some point a thought came to Sorun: he was in a new - well, not exactly new at this point, at least relatively speaking - world. None of the literature of his world existed here, unless the Overlanders on the other side of the world had old world books that survived thousands of years in time capsules or something, and even then jury was out on if the material was the same because different worlds, but over here on the Mobian side there was a whole of books written by Mobians he'd never laid eyes on. With the exception of a quantum physics book and Chao book. And only one of those had ever been useful.

Hell, there was even a whole library here, still run by the dalmatian guy. It wasn't the exact same as the one in Knothole, though: Nicole had apparently read a lot of books and indexed them in her memory, so when a new library had to be made with the rest of the city she thankfully had archives to recreate them. Most of them were informational books, though, and she'd hardly had an archive on every book in that library. And he knew some Mobians had gone back after that whole mess to try and salvage what books they could from the library, and surprisingly a large majority of them had actually survived. By some miracle the library hadn't tanked a direct hit from the explosive shells.

There'd still been damage, though. And not every book had survived. And from what Sorun knew pretty much all those books had been copies taken from the original Mobotropolis, when the former kingdom had been a burgeoning society before the original Robotnik screwed it all up. That city was nuclear slag now, the Knothole library was gone, and no one knew if any other copies existed in the world, traded with other villages and such. And if said hypothetical villages were even around anymore outside of the ones people knew about.

But despite all that terribleness and yet another reason to hate Eggman, there was still a library here. Full of books Sorun had never, ever read. More than likely more in Station Square, and that was just a few footsteps away with Yamato. And if he ever got desperate enough for material, well, he doubted he'd have any problems visiting Overlander territory since he was human and looked enough like them. But that was a last resort.

The point was he had options. And before gaming had taken over his life in an attempt to "normalize" himself with his friends and peers, and he found out he was the best at it, books had been a hobby. And here, well... hanging out with friends was nice, but they had their own lives and weren't always available, especially with the Freedom Fighting. Video games with Nicole was always perfect, but even she wasn't free all the time and he couldn't coast on just a single hobby.

Books were... something he could do.

"Alright, that's it!"

Lethargically, Sorun turned his head around. He was greeted to the sight of Silver standing there, chairs in hand, staring forwards angrily at the floating Chao surrounded in a teal aura in front of him. "I've tried to be patient with you, but I've had it!" a frustrated-sounding Silver yelled. "No more!"

Virgil looked incredibly calm for being levitated off the ground against his will. He even seemed confused, blinking his eyes a few times and looking down at the ground. He struggled a bit in an attempt to try and get out of the field, but quickly gave up when he realized it was hopeless. And then he just went back to staring at Silver.

"Okay," the hedgehog slowly began, "now don't attack me again, alright? I'm letting you go now."

The teal aura dissipated. The v-shaped wings at the Chao's back kept him aloft in place, eyes still examining Silver, who seemed equally puzzled at the examination he was being given. And then the Chao moved forwards, startling Silver a bit, and then a lot when Virgil got close to him.

And then he froze in complete confusion when Virgil settled on the top of his head. And just stayed there.

"..." Sorun turned back to the empty corner. How big a bookshelf was he thinking about here?

"What just happened? What is this?" he heard Silver ask behind him. "Sorun, what is this?"

"You should have just floated him around with your powers way sooner so he'd respect you. Coulda solved this problem in five seconds," was the only response Sorun chose to give. Maybe something medium-sized? Or large? He had time and space. Hm...

"But why is he-!?"

"I dunno, he does what he wants." It wasn't like he was out to be some kind of book collector. Or maybe he would be eventually? Shit, if he ever got the nerve to figure out if Yamato really could get him to Earth and did so to scavenge for cool stuff he should probably bring some books back. Some Arthur Clarke, maybe some Jules Verne... he wondered if Mobius had any good science fiction lying around?

"I don't want him sleeping on me like this," Silver complained. Virgil didn't seem to care so much since his response was to roll over on Silver's head.

Sorun made a frustrated whine. "Silver, I don't know, chuck him through the window or something if you care that much."

"You had better not be considering breaking something!" a voice called out from the kitchen.

Sorun flinched at Nicole's voice and then whirled towards the white Mobian, bookshelf all but forgotten. "Silver, Silver don't break any windows, for god's sake don't break anything!" He didn't want to imagine what she'd do if that happened. Even imagining Nicole scowling at Sorun over a broken window was too much to contemplate. It was such a terrifying thought, in fact, that Sorun had rushed past Silver and towards the kitchen, ignoring the lost look the hedgehog had on his face as he looked up at the top of his head.

He'd rushed so fast he nearly stumbled into the kitchen. Nicole was there, staring at him, halfway done with putting down a candelabra of all things on the dining table. The table that had a cloth covering it now to give the room some color. A cloth that looked like it was worth more than Sorun's whole net worth in this town.

No, seriously, she didn't have to go so far out of her way on it. She embroidered the edge of the blue cloth with a spiraling green and purple helix pattern. And that candelabra looked too shiny for Sorun's comfort. Even the chairs he used to have that looked like they came straight out of a bulk warehouse somewhere were these elegant wooden things now, with filigree carvings and everything. He knew with the nanites it didn't really matter , at least in terms of raw resources, but there had to be some time investment on her part to make it look like this.

Ah, she was still giving him that warning glare of hers, and Sorun only now realized he should be standing really straight right now. Standing so straight at attention any drill sergeant would weep tears of pride. He did so.

"You had better not be planning on vandalizing your windows," Nicole said as she set the candelabra down, never taking her green eyes off him. She'd done it so softly there'd been no noise, and yet to Sorun's ears it still sounded like an explosion went off somehow, and he stood even straighter to the point his spine was protesting.

"I was not," he tried. "You must have heard wrong."

She didn't looked impressed with the attempt. "I don't mishear."

"Yet another shining example of why you're so perfect."

Instead of looking flattered at the compliment Nicole made a small, tired smile and turned to the candelabra to adjust it. "Just please don't do anything to damage your home. I worked very hard on it."

He could have pointed out a lot of things. How she almost definitely had archives of every single thing she'd ever made with the nanites and, if something did get damaged, she could just dissolve whatever was broke back into nanites and restructure it in an instant using the archives. Wasn't like the nanites were lost. Fixing damaged things was trivial for her. But Sorun had gone down this route before and it never ended well so instead he just nodded along.

"Of course, Nicole, I would never do anything to besmirch your hard work," Sorun assured her with as honest a voice he could muster. Maybe there was some nervousness tinged in it. She couldn't prove it.

She made a small, accepting hum. "I'll take your word for it. I trust everything is to your liking?"

It was actually too much for his middle-class Detroit city boy brain to comprehend. From the perfect paintjobs on the wall that perfectly mixed the whites and grays in a way that weren't too harsh on the eyes to the furnishings, while not looking like something that belonged in the castle at the center of the city, still looked like something out Sorun's purview, it really was too much. He was worried she'd start turning his utensils gold.

These were all concerns that would damn him if he actually spoke of them so he just nodded along. "They are, once more, perfect. Because you're a perfect person who likes to do everything perfectly like the perfect perfectionist you are."

Now she actually was looking abashed. "I would call it far from perfect, Sorun, but I do my best." She ran a finger along the top of the table. "And while I can substantially approve the aesthetics, it doesn't change the fact that this is still empty." She looked up and past the doorway. "Somewhat. Have those two finally gotten along? Silver isn't screaming anymore."

"Yeah, it's all great," Sorun assured her. "And, uh, well, the house is still kind of new, you know? You say it's empty, I say it's just a bunch of space for memories. Like photos or souvenirs or somethin', I dunno. But it won't be this way forever."

It was logic Sorun was pulling out of his ass because he didn't know what else to say to ease her worries. Apparently he couldn't have said a more right thing to her, because she looked satisfied with the answer. More than satisfied, even. Like she was completely at peace with the answer. He gave himself a mental pat on the back for saying such a right thing.

"Memories. Yes." Her smile grew wider. "You're right. There's time to fill the house out."

"Yeah, 'zactly. I was already thinking of putting a bookshelf up in the living room."

Nicole's ears perked up in interest. "A bookshelf?"

"Y-yeah. For readin'." He had to turn away from her, being unable to withstand that overly proud look she was giving him. Like staring into the sun, he swore. "Might take up reading just, you know, to do something in my off time."

"I'm glad." He didn't know why she had to sound so relieved over the fact on top of sounding so happy. It wasn't even that big a deal; in fact Sorun couldn't think of a smaller deal than he was thinking of getting books. "You were thinking of placing it in that empty corner of the living room, yes?" she continued, making to move past Sorun. "Allow me a moment to-"

A startled Sorun held up a hand to stop Nicole's advance. She sent him a puzzled look as he began to talk. "Nicole, you, you really don't gotta. Seriously. You've arguably done too much as it is." It was getting to a point where Sorun really was getting uncomfortable with how much she was helping out. He'd been okay with a few pieces of furniture, but now it was getting out of hand. He just didn't want to bother her, but she was practically jumping at the opportunity to just give him a bookshelf of all things. It was weird.

Stubbornly, she gently lowered Sorun's arm down. "Nonsense, Sorun, it's no issue."

"Nicole, seriously-"

"The bookshelf is already made, Sorun. My body doesn't physically need to be in the room."

Sorun blew out an exasperated sound at hearing that. "I mean... I was just gonna ask the carpenter guy in the market to make me one so I could buy it off him, but sure."

"..." Nicole tilted her head a bit. "That's the second time today you've mentioned wanting to support a local business."

"We all live in the same city, what, I'm not allowed to try and get people to like me?"

"No, of course not. But you never seemed to care too much about that."

"Not much, I guess." Well, maybe a little. Just a little.

"Then what is the issue?" Nicole asked him. "You wanted me to help furnish your house. That includes creating furniture. I would think a bookshelf constitutes as furniture, yet you're protesting now when you haven't previously on anything else. What changed?"

"It's just..." Not finding the words immediately, Sorun blew out a sigh, waved his hand, and let it fall and slap against his thigh. "You've just been doing an obscene amount for me. Like, a lot. This is a lot, Nicole," Sorun said to her. "Would you have put this much effort into remodeling a house if anyone else asked?"

It didn't even take Nicole a second to consider her answer. "Generally, no. It's one thing to ask for a small change or two, but otherwise I've my own duties managing the city occupying me. And more than that I don't want to interfere too much in the lives of others and have them grow too dependent on me, especially for trivialities such as what you're implying."

He rose an eyebrow up at her, already seeing the discrepancies with that statement. "But... you'll do exactly that for me. You are currently doing that for me, right now, as we speak." He pointed at the candelabra at the center of the dining room table. "I'm pretty sure that's silver, Nicole."

"Just because it has the same luster doesn't make it silver, it's merely shifting the nanites' structure to-"

"Okay, this is exactly what I'm talking about."

"It's not as if I'm extending special privileges to you," Nicole denied, much too quickly for Sorun to actually believe her. "If you made an outrageous request such as to make your home as big as the castle I would outright refuse. I made all the houses have the same sizes and dimensions to be fair."

"And yet you literally just made me a bookshelf. Like that. I wasn't even asking you to make me one, I just mentioned wanting one and you gave me one on the spot." This was one of those few rare occasions where it was Nicole looking away from Sorun, with a guilty expression of all things. Usually he was the one doing that. He would have taken a picture if he had a camera. Sorun doubted something as rare or magical would ever happen again. "Nicole..."

"... Maybe I am biased towards you some small amount," she hesitantly admitted. "I want to. It's not hurting anyone helping you more than I'd help most others."

"Hurts the carpenter," Sorun mumbled out. When Nicole looked back at him, he said, "I get it looks bad if you go too far, and I appreciate you going this far for me. And I'm not being facetious when I say that, like, seriously . Thank you for all this. And... well, I don't especially mind the extra attention since we're... y'know." He glanced away anc rubbed at the back of his neck. "But you really don't have to do everything for me. This's all enough."

It wasn't even the small hit to his pride for being showered with free stuff, because that was long since shot to oblivion. It was more people talked, and he didn't want her going too far for his sake due to Sorun worrying how people would react to that. Because Nicole was already something that pretty much had omnipotent ability within the city, and he felt like her coloring the house alone was toeing the line a bit. It was a lot of responsibility she had to shoulder, and he didn't envy her for that, even if she managed it all just fine.

Maybe he was just being a bit paranoid with it, though. More than likely people would acknowledge it for all of a second and move on with their lives without caring all that much. Because Mobians. And he respected her for wanting to keep things fair for everyone, and trusted her not to go too far, but that didn't stop Sorun from wondering how much of that bias towards him was skewing that mindset. Certainly not enough to be genuinely problematic; he gave her more than enough credit to do something like that.

But he still worried for her. Probably over nothing. Likely over nothing, actually. And it did feel a bit scummy getting this much free stuff from her when she likely wouldn't do this for anyone else if they asked.

Nicole looked like she came to the same conclusions he did when she looked back at him. "A few pieces of furniture and some color isn't an outright abuse of my privileges as the steward and administrator of the city, Sorun," she said. "Nonetheless... maybe you're right. I apologize if I overstepped, Sorun."

"No, no you didn't. And I get it's super complicated trying to balance all this for you, and I mean really it's not like you ever have to do anything after this anyway so a one-off doesn't seem like that big a deal-"

"And I suppose you're correct in that depriving a local business with work would be unfair, even as a favor to you," Nicole continued. Sorun froze on the spot, while the lynx had given him a grateful nod. "Thank you for sharing your concerns with me, Sorun. The bookshelf has already been disassembled."

No words. Just Sorun, standing there frozen, mouth slightly agape. Still as a statue. Even after Nicole walked up to him, gave him a brief hug, and walked away. He hadn't moved a muscle at all as he came to grips with the fact he just lost out on a free bookshelf for opening his mouth.

And then he fell to his knees, realizing he probably just deprived himself of getting free furniture for the rest of his life. Because he had to open his mouth and be a good person. Because he had to go and punch a gift horse in the mouth in the spirit of fairness. The will to scream in outrage was nonexistent as he collapsed entirely.

"Why am I so stupid...?" Sorun wondered to himself as he curled into a ball on the kitchen floor.

A/N- By now it's pretty obvious this is the "cool down and get settled" part of the story, and to be honest not a lot's really going on. I had this planned way back along with most everything else, but what I have planned now for this is admittedly a lot shorter than what I was initially going through in my notebook of ideas. Like, I was considering a chapter where Sorun goes back to school to try and get a formal education but decided to axe it since he seems pretty content with the mailman gig. A lot of it's due to length. Story's long enough and I'm not gonna lie to you guys, I just wanna get past this arc to get to the cool stuff later on. Like Earth. Full disclosure somewhere down the line there is going to be an "Earth arc" of sorts where it's revealed what actually happened over there, like I'm not shelving that and just leaving it unexplained, but we gotta get there first and there's a ton more between there and here.

It's also getting kind of hard to keep coming up with new titles for every chapter. With the exception of the really special chapters I plan out I don't really have a name prepared for these in advance and just make it up on the spot. Half the time it's right before I post a chapter and proofread it and everything and just come up with something at the last minute, and it's because of that I don't think I'll ever top "Air cancel the fat man". There is one chapter I'm dying to get out, one of the few I have titled in advance. It's simply called "Freedom".

But that's way down the line.

Chapter 91

A/N- You can see all my thoughts for this whole thing on the other end of the chapter here.

Recursion Error

Episode 91- DATE

The delivery job turned out to be pretty great.

Sure, Sorun'd had reservations about it at first, even if he hadn't made them all that vocal. Delivering stuff with Yamato meant traveling outside the city. The safe city he was supposed to stay in because it was safe, preferably forever. But, in reality, Eggman didn't have a stranglehold on the world anymore since he and all his forces were all concentrated in a single, burnt-out city of rubble on the other side of the continent, continually locked down by the Freedom Fighters. So for all intents and purposes things were safe everywhere else. And hell, with portals Sorun didn't even need to worry about traveling. It was just in instant walk-in to any destination.

The traveling was nice, even if the visits were brief just to drop off Honey's deliveries or bring stuff back. He got to see things. Station Square was a nice enough sight when it wasn't embroiled in guerilla warfare. The people were nice enough and if he squinted enough it almost reminded him of Detroit, except shinier. He probably would have chosen to live there after all if his home and friends weren't already here.

It was a nice job overall.

He emerged from the portal in the middle of Honey's shop. His right hand held a sword that at this point in his life was little more than a fast travel item, and by now Sorun was completely okay with that. He held a book in his left hand, something he'd taken a detour to get from a book shop he'd seen outside the window to the post office. They had a great selection there, nothing like the library in New Mobotropolis.

Sorun stared down at the book in contemplation. He'd like to start reading it tonight, but, well, he'd already made plans...

"There'll be another time," he mumbled to himself as he closed the portal behind him. Yamato dissolved and reformed into the blue Emerald, and he looked up after depositing his GREAT DELIVERER hat on his personal employee-only hat hook hanging on the wall.

At him.

The guy standing across from him.

The one holding the box.

The other guy that worked at Honey's.

The lynx guy.

... Sorun couldn't remember his name.

"Hey, Lance," Sorun greeted with a wave. The lynx's face fell a bit in annoyance.

"It's- it's Larry, Sorun," he corrected. "Larry. This is the third time."

"... Third?" Sorun repeated, surprised. He'd forgotten his name three times? Couldn't be. His memory wasn't that terrible, was it? Nah, no way. "You must be miscounting," he told him, completely sure of himself and in a voice that was a hundred percent confident.

"I really haven't."

"Honestly, it's insulting, Larson," he continued, ignoring the lynx entirely. "Truly. That you would ever assume I'm as contemptable as to forget the name of my fellow man, coworker, and neighbor. It'd be downright shameful," Sorun told him, though for some reason it was making Larry's mouth drop open in disbelief. "Persons such as that are truly debased."

The lynx Mobian's eyes narrowed at Sorun in part suspicion and part incredulity. "Are... you're messing with me, aren't you?"

"That's really up for you to decide." Sorun's eyes flashed with mischief. The other male coworker didn't look approving of it.

"You know what, whatever," the lynx huffed, hefting the box he was carrying. "I got enough to deal with-"

"LARRY!" a voice screeched from the other end of the shop, causing both males to flinch. "WHERE ARE THOSE MATERIALS I ASKED FOR!? I'M RUNNING BEHIND SCHEDULE HERE!"

"C-coming, ma'm!" Larry shouted out, before slumping and making a pitiful sound. "That woman's a speed demon, I swear. She makes clothes faster than I can bring cloth to make them and I still have to pack away everything she makes after this. She's a slave driver."

"Yeah. I've been there. Just do what I used to do and write with two hands at once on all the shipping labels," Sorun suggested.

Larry blinked in surprise. "I-I can only write with the right hand."

"... Really? You ought to fix that." Idly, Sorun began tossing the Emerald up and down while looking at Larry with a bland expression. "In other news, Station Square is really great this time of year."

Larry's expression became extremely twisted in consternation at the human's friendly but uncaring tone, though he tried to remain friendly-looking while doing a poor job of it. "Is that right?"

"Yeah, they even have this nice little café there. You believe they take Mobian currency, too? The guys over there are really progressive." Up and down the Emerald went in Sorun's hand. "This job is really great, man, I'm basically being paid to travel and all I gotta do is carry some boxes back and forth."

The strain on the Mobian's face became more pronounced. "I really bet. Must be nice, having such a convenient power. Whereas mine is anything but."

"Ah, well, maybe it'll evolve into something cool and marketable if you just die a couple times like I did and come back," Sorun suggested in a lighthearted tone, making Larry's body jolt a bit. "Or you could join the Freedom Fighters and they'd just drop you behind enemy lines for your power to just passively disrupt everything."

"I think I'm good. And, uh, believe it or not but Sonic kinda did something like that. Once, like, years back when we were kids. There was this incident and it was this whole thing and- ah, you wouldn't care," he said. The Mobian's eyes trained themselves onto Sorun, silently looking for any sign that his words provoked something in the human, even the barest amount of interest.

To his disappointment the only thing in Sorun's eyes was complete disinterest. "You're not wrong," he agreed.

"... Okay, well, good talk, Sorun, but I really gotta get this stuff to Honey." Larry turned around, making a miserable sound as he began trudging towards the other end of the shop. "I swear, my bad luck let me have this job just because of the people I'd be working with..." he mumbled under his breath as he walked out of sight.

"What a downer," Sorun thought as he watched Larry trail off. He felt the smallest compulsion to pursue the matter, but quickly realized he didn't care at all, so much so that the memory of the encounter was already fading due to how little Sorun regarded it. He blinked a few times and looked down, realizing he was holding a book.

Ah, right, he'd bought a book. He would have liked to get into it, but he had that date...

The bookshelf was a quaint little thing, a thing Sorun had to buy because he'd been an idiot and convinced Nicole that there should be a cap on how much free furniture he should get, but it'd been another point towards supporting the community so he didn't let it bother him too much. The collection was sparse. Mostly because it only had a single book in it right now, the one he'd just bought, and he hadn't even read it yet. But one day. When he had some free time and nobody to spend it with for whatever reason.

'Til then he had important matters to attend to. Which was, Sorun and Nicole had finally settled on a date for the date. Which happened to be today. In fact, it was in... Sorun glanced at the clock hanging on the wall. Which he'd also bought.

Oh. Gee willikers. Ten minutes from now.

Sorun found himself biting his bottom lip. He thought he'd be excited for this, but in truth, he was just plain nervous. Anxious to the point of passing out, actually. He had zero experience with this kind of thing, and he didn't know what they were supposed to do beyond just having fun. He did know it didn't entail video games, because that was something they always did and dates were suppose to be special. And since this was the first date it had to be extra special. So no video games.

That was a bad thing since that was practically all Sorun was good at.

"I shoulda made plans," Sorun lamented. He should have the moment they'd agreed on the date, and it didn't help Nicole hadn't discussed it further with him before disappearing off to go do whatever she did all day. The whole managing the city thing. But he'd been too lazy, or too nervous to think properly, he didn't know and quite possibly it was a combination of these two things. Work had been a nice distraction but that was done and this was now and right now was-

Sorun's head snapped back at the clock. He'd been pacing back and forth stressing about this and suddenly he only had a minute left.

In a scream of panic, Sorun ran to the front door and opened it. At the same time, the exact same moment the clock hands moved to five o'clock, she appeared in front of him, same as always, not looking the least bit as panicked as Sorun was, who tried maintaining a neutral appearance but on the inside was screaming because all he'd done to prepare for this date was take a shower and that was it.

That and that they were seriously doing this. That this was happening. And Sorun had no idea what happened from here.

Instead of greeting him, Nicole's first reaction was to look down a bit at Sorun's body. She regarded his torso for all of a second and then looked back up at him. "You're wearing that to our date?" she asked. Sorun flinched at the question, but relaxed when she didn't sound upset. Just perplexed.

In response, he looked down at the blue coat he was wearing. "Yeah?" he voiced, sounding a bit confused as he looked back up at her. "I always wear this. You made it."

She looked a bit surprised at hearing that. And then actually looked away, appearing almost bashful from the reasoning. "That's very flattering," she mumbled, "but you truly don't have to wear it for every occasion."

And now Sorun looked confused. "But you wear the same thing every day," Sorun pointed out. "In fact all of our friends wear the same thing every day. Actually, does... does anyone ever actually change clothes here?"

Sorun's brows furrowed in thought. It just occurred to him, but had he ever seen anyone he knew here wear something different? Now that he thought about it Honey wore that exact same black and red dress every time he saw her. Sally always had that same vest. Antoine always had that same jacket. He remembered Amy buying dresses that were completely identical to the one she always wore despite her argument to the contrary. No, now that he thought about it nobody ever changed clothing.

And then Sorun looked down at his own blue coat he wore every day and realized he was guilty of the exact same thing.

"Dear god. I'm turning native."

"You've a fair point." Nicole's voice broke Sorun out of his horror and made him refocus in on her. "But for your information I've been working towards developing an alternate set of clothes for my own avatar body. Maybe you're satisfied wearing the same coat every day, but I'd like a change."

"Oh, really? You don't like the...?" Sorun trailed off when he looked at what Nicole wore. If he was honest with himself he didn't even know what to call what it was she was wearing. A dress made of purple wrappings? Was there a word for something like that? Was "dress" even a satisfying word for what she wore? "Outfit?" he tried saying, lacking a better descriptor.

Nicole shook her head. "No, I do. I'd just like something different for every once in a while."

"Oh." Fair enough, he supposed. "What is it, then?"

"That would be telling." She sent Sorun a teasing smile, causing him to roll his eyes. "And I'm still trying to get it just right," she then admitted. "But I incorporated a heavy amount of purple into it."

"You like purple, huh?"

"It's one of my more favored colors."

"Ah, okay." Sorun gave her a questioning look. "If you like purple so much how come you didn't give yourself purple fur?"

For some reason she laughed at that. "I'm afraid that would have looked too out of place. After all, there has never once been a recorded instance of a purple lynx Mobian."

Sorun blinked twice in confusion. "I've literally seen a giant purple cat man."

"Cats are not synonymous with lynxes, Sorun. There's a fundamental difference between the two species."

"... Alright, so! This date, huh?" Sorun quickly asked, loudly clapping his hands together. He stepped forwards next to Nicole while pointing his body in the direction that lead away from the house. "What, uh, what do we got planned, what are we doing, what's going on?"

"Well... we've some options." Nicole turned around and stepped next to him as they began to walk away. "There's a game to be played at the sports arena later on that I know a number of people are attending to see. Alternatively I know of a performance at the theater that's also being planned. I'm not too partial to either, so you can decide."

Before Sorun could respond he felt movement near his hand. He glanced down and saw, with some embarrassment, that Nicole had interlocked their fingers together, without even acknowledging it. He didn't fight against it, feeling the contact to be surprisingly welcome, but it'd been sudden and unexpected enough that he'd still been startled by it. And along with that was the acknowledgement they'd be seen in town like this.

He found himself looking away from Nicole in further embarrassment. It was a thought he could barely stand, people seeing him like this, but he'd put up with it for her sake since this is what she apparently wanted. He still found himself brushing his dark hair over his face to try and hide as much of his blush as possible. He counted it fortunate his hair finally grew long enough to stretch past his face that such a thing was possible now. Provided it wasn't a windy day.

As if the world itself was out to spite Sorun, a nearby gust of wind lightly rustled his coat and blew some of his hair back.

Ignoring the world's indolence, Sorun thought on Nicole's proposal. Sports or theater. Tactically speaking it was more viable options than he could have ever dared dreamed of, but he didn't need long to consider. He was never much of a sports guy, but a theater? Well, that was a whole other thing entirely. He didn't even know they had a theater here but now he was feeling eager to go just to see it.

"Well, since it's on the table I never have partook in Mobian theater," Sorun said, grinning a bit. "I'll expect great things. A thought-provoking narrative that'll have me reeling for whole weeks."

Nicole lightly shook her head in amusement. "I'm sure they won't disappoint you," she assured him, smiling all the while. "Come along. The theater's this way."

She pulled him forwards, leading the way while still holding his hand.

For Nicole's sake he put up with it.

For Nicole's sake Sorun resisted the unbearable urge to groan out loudly and proclaim how boring this was.

For Nicole's sake he kept his thoughts of wanting to do literally anything else but this to himself as he slumped back in his seat.

When she had told him it was a show at a "theater", Sorun had assumed movies. He hadn't seen movies in near a year now, and the thought of a Mobian movie intrigued him to no end. So he'd jumped at the prospect.

But apparently here the term "theater" was a bit more traditional than Sorun had been suspecting. Because it was apparently theater in the literal sense. As in a theatrical performance. A play. Not a movie.

People here liked plays apparently.

Unfortunately for Sorun he didn't like them.

He could respect the art form, if nothing else, but that was all he could say about plays. And he could try to to appreciate this play in particular if it weren't for the fact it was a romantic story about some woman embroiled in the middle of a love triangle, and with how much of this Sorun had seen in shows back on Earth he saw every plot twist and turn coming a mile away. Predictable story elements. Story stings that offered no surprise. Not a single interesting thing to be seen because Sorun had seen it all before.

Didn't help that a lot of the Mobians playing the characters weren't all that good. The main actress was actually pretty alright, but with the exception of a couple more besides her it was ech.

With a slow motion, Sorun swiveled his head to look at the seat on his left. Unlike himself, who was dying on the inside at seeing this, Nicole was absolutely engrossed in the play, practically leaning forwards in her seat and focusing on the performance with every fiber of her virtual being. Which, at any other time would have been adorable and endearing to see. But Sorun's soul was shriveling up by the second here.

He was tempted to ask how much longer this play would go on for, but he didn't want to risk incurring Nicole's wrath at interrupting the play. Or even worse, imply in any way that he wasn't enjoying the play and accidentally sour the date. So he suffered in silence, if only for her sake.

Didn't stop him from watching the play with the most braindead expression humanly possible.

"You didn't enjoy the play."

"Whaaa...? Nah, no way, wha-what ever gave you such an assumption?" It was when they were exiting the theater - pfft, theater, right - when that observation, and it was an observation due to the lack of an inflection making it sound like a question, was thrown at Sorun.

He hadn't even seen it coming. There they'd been, locked in hand because Nicole was starting to make it a habit, with the AI herself practically beaming. She'd enjoyed the play, at least, which Sorun supposed was all that really mattered. And he would have liked to have left it at that before she threw that curveball at him.

Evidently his attempt at deflecting the accusation didn't work, because now Nicole was affixing him with a knowing look. "You looked like you were trying to fall asleep through most of the performance," she pointed out to him. She didn't look to be beaming anymore.

"Big emphasis at try. Sleepin' through that woulda been a mercy," Sorun mumbled out, giving up on trying to deny the accusation. But all that did was make Nicole frown and cause Sorun to panic slightly at the sight. "What? The plot wasn't good."

"I thought it was sufficiently entertaining."

"It was just 'Romeo and Juliet' but... like, worse. Which in itself is a pretty big achievement because 'Romeo and Juliet' was already pretty bad," Sorun said. "'Least I thought so, anyway, but it was all the rage back in my old home. 'Oh, but it's a classic about fleeting, forbidden love and totally not a couple idiot kids doing stupid stuff for the sake of a fleeting crush.' And this version didn't even have a cool sword fight. And nobody died at the end."

Nicole gave him a quizzical glare. "I would think nobody dying in the end would be a highlight of the story."

"But then where's the stakes? The suspense? The drama? It's completely boring if everything works out for the protagonists and they get to ride out into the sunset arms in hand to live happily ever after. No thought-provoking narrative, no sense of realism that could immerse me in the plot, every single twist was being telegraphed from a mile away with nothin' creative going for it, it just- I didn't feel all that immersed in the narrative, Nicole, and frankly it wasn't that exciting."

"... Sorun, it was a children's play," Nicole reminded him, sounding dumbfounded at his take on the play.

"Yeah, and those kids couldn't act to save their lives." His standards hadn't been that high when he saw that it was a bunch of kids performing the play, but they hadn't been nearly that low. He swore half of them could barely remember their lines, stuttering out the words like their brains were overheating just trying to assemble the letters together in their minds.

Nicole shook her head. Whether it was in amusement or disbelief he couldn't tell. "So this play of yours was a popular one in your own home, then? Who died at the end?"

"Oh, both the protagonists. Nobody got a happy ending."

"What lesson is there to be taken in a romance story where the main love interests die?"

"I dunno, stupid kids do stupid things?" Sorun shrugged. "Why, why was this the play we went to, anyways? Why a kids' play?"

"Because the New Mobotropolis School of Performing Arts has a very diverse number of acting groups and they were the ones scheduled to be performing today," she answered, and then asked, "You really didn't like it?"

"It was..." Sorun rose his hand that wasn't being grasped in front of him, made a sighing sound and let it flop back to his side. "I mean, you seen as much media as I have from back on Earth and suddenly ya got all this experience and less and less stuff stops exciting you. I'm holding out that literature can still surprise me, I bought this book from Station Square, but that play. Ech." He shook his head.

"I see..." It took a second for Nicole to speak again. "Sorun, I wanted this to be something we could both enjoy. For the sake of the date."

Stumbling a bit at her words, Sorun quickly responded with, "I-I mean it wasn't like it was completely unenjoy-" He stopped dead when Nicole gave him a flat look. "By that I mean you were there and it made it bearable," he quickly corrected. "I didn't have an awful time. So. Yeah."

"... Well, at the very least it was something to talk about," she said. "And the date isn't over yet."

"Hey, if you just wanted to find somewhere quiet to talk we could just do that," Sorun suggested.

"We talk frequently. I was under the impression a date was supposed to offer a change to our normal routine and interactions."

"Yeah, but, like, you know. Talking about date stuff instead of regular stuff."

She gave him an inquisitive look. "And what does 'date stuff' entail?" she questioned.

At that, Sorun released a breath and looked away, shyly rubbing at the back of his head. "You know, uh... feelings. And stuff," he mumbled out. It felt like a struggle just to get those words out it was so embarrassing, and as the seconds passed Sorun began to slowly regret ever brining this up. He wasn't sure how he'd get through a talk about feelings at this rate if it was this hard saying just this much.

"Okay, then." And once again Sorun ends up shooting himself in the foot, because Nicole looked agreeing to the idea. "We'll find somewhere private to talk."

One of these days he'd learn to keep his mouth shut. It wasn't this day.

"..."

In the awkward silence Sorun found himself clicking clicking his tongue while quietly tapping on his legs. When Nicole had said somewhere "private" he assumed something like his house. Or a soundproof room somewhere. The park. The server room in the science center. Something like that.

He was somewhat right with the last assumption, except Nicole picked the roof of the place. Just teleported the both of them there and made a pair of chairs for them to sit down in. Wasn't exactly conventional, but at the same time it was far enough from being weird that Sorun didn't think much on it and just went with it, with him sitting in one chair and Nicole sitting in the one next to him.

Wasn't a bad view, at least. It was a nice view of the city, and the sky was bathed in hues of blues, reds, and oranges with the sun approaching sunset. At any other time he'd go as far as to call it a surreal sight, but the situation of him being in the middle of his first every date was fraying his nerves too much to appreciate the scenery.

Encapsulating his feelings to other people just wasn't something he did. It wasn't something almost anyone did where he came from. With her, it was... easier, somewhat, Sorun would readily admit it, but that didn't detract from the difficulty in not only finding the words to say, but to just try and figure out what he was feeling in the first place. It was ultimately feelings of nervousness over this whole thing and the joy that somehow, in defiance of all belief, he'd pulled off making it this far with her that were so well-blended together that Sorun was coming up with blanks on what to do, and was really holding out hope that Nicole would start talking soon so he could just piggyback off that.

Path of least resistance and all that.

"This is nice," Nicole announced from besides Sorun, looking out to the sunset-bathed city in front of them.

Sorun internally winced. That conversation starter didn't give him much to work with. After a few moments of breakneck thought, the best response he could give her was a solid "Yeah."

"'Yeah,' he says." She at least sounded a bit amused, which Sorun took as a good sign. "I went through all this trouble to set us up with this venue and the best response you can muster is 'yeah', is it?"

Okay, he could work with this. "Well, uh... yeah." When he glanced over at Nicole he caught her covering a smile with the back of her hand. "I don't know, I would have tried booking us a reservation at that one really fancy restaurant, but, er, you don't eat. And I figured it woulda been really weird to have a date where I'm eating and you're kind of just watching so I figured dinner dates were just, like, not a thing we would do."

The hand dropped away from Nicole's mouth. The smile faded. "I could just make virtual food and pretend to eat alongside you," she offered.

Sorun made a nervous laugh. "No, that's, that's fine. Really." He didn't even know whether to call that endearing or not. "There's more to dates than eating. I'm pretty sure."

"Yes, like speaking. As you've proposed," Nicole pointed out. "Though the talking, I feel, hasn't differed from how we normally talk."

"I mean, I was under the impression this was the part where we, uh, just said stuff to get to know each other better." He waited for Nicole to respond, but all she was doing was waiting for Sorun to continue, making him anxious as he glanced away a bit. "Not that I'm asking you to bare your soul to me or anything, but, um..."

Slightly, Sorun went a bit limp in his seat. Even he could see this was going nowhere, and the embarrassment from letting this continue was outweighing the nervousness preventing him from asking the question he really wanted to ask. So he went and asked it.

"So why me?" Sorun asked, looking back at Nicole. "I'm glad we're doing this, I really am, it's just that... well I imagine you probably process time a bit differently than other people, being an AI an' all, but even so compared to everyone else I knew you for the shortest amount of time. Barely two-thirds of a year. So why?"

The question seemed to catch Nicole a bit off guard, as she gave him a somewhat surprised look. Nevertheless, she did take a small bit of time to process the question before answering him. "You are the only one who's ever expressed a romantic interest with me," she said.

"Sure," Sorun hesitantly agree, "but so did you. So why me and no one else?"

This caused Nicole to pause significantly longer than she had the first time, even going as far as to look down a bit as she thought over the answer. Eventually she looked back up and began speaking again. "I never did tell you how I came to be here, did I?"

"Something about a pod? I dunno, Rotor told me a bit way back."

"That's accurate, yes. I'd arrived in that same handheld that used to house me." She looked ahead towards the city. It was one of those rare moments where Sorun saw such an introspective look on Nicole's face as she spoke, speaking quietly with a somewhat subdued expression. "I don't know where I came from. I was supposed to; there are old memory files that indicated signs pointing towards me having been sent with a specific purpose in mind, but they're blank, as if whoever designed me wiped them at the last minute before sending me for whatever reason. Whether they changed their mind or something went wrong for whoever and wherever is a complete mystery I doubt will ever be solved."

"Oh. Er..." Sorun was already growing a bit uncomfortable, and sad at the same time for her sake. "Y-you really don't have to do this if you don't want-"

She immediately waved off his concerns with a small smile. "It's alright, Sorun. It's completely irrelevant at this point and doesn't matter all that much." The smile slowly began to drop off as she continued. "But it was the others that found me in that pod, yes. They were children at the time, not even teenagers. It was early on in Robotnik's campaign, and, naturally, they regarded my sudden and unexplainable arrival with suspicion and my word of assisting them with a heavy amount of skepticism. With good reason," she added. "Autonomous machines were not regarded kindly. I recall Sonic didn't have an ounce of trust in me and wanted to destroy me immediately."

"Slap Sonic later, got it," Sorun thought to himself as he nodded along to Nicole's words.

The lynx gave him a knowing look. "I know that look, Sorun. Please don't hold Sonic in regard for the past. It was a long time ago and we've been friends for years since then."

"Look? What look?" Sorun coyly replied, though Nicole didn't look convinced in the slightest. "I wasn't planning anything malicious whatsoever, buuut I suppose if you can be the bigger person and find it in your heart to forgive him then I can let it slide, too..."

"Yes, Sorun, I in fact can. Even if he did sometimes shake the handheld a bit too roughly during some missions."

"..."

"Sorun."

"He'd never guess it was me that egged the window to his bedroom you made look like his head for some reason."

"He would assume you immediately, but that is besides the point. You're not allowed to be a vandal." A beat passed. "And it was an artistic choice."

"Fiiiine," he sighed out, and then rolled his hand at her. "So you were saying?"

"Right, my initial meeting with the Freedom Fighters," she continued. "Sally, for reasons that were her own, decided to take a chance on me and ingratiated me into the group, and I became the companion she traveled with. And as it happened having an AI with functions higher than anything Robotnik could ever produce turned out to be a boon," she said with no small hint of pride to her voice or face. Sorun didn't comment on it but still grinned a bit in amusement. "Though, as you've probably surmised, those were my early days of existence, during which I wasn't as... expressive as I am now."

"I was more wondering why you decided to tell this story when I asked a question. Not that I'm not appreciative of it," Sorun quickly added, "but it's a bit weird."

"It pertains to the answer, I promise. Just let me get there."

Sorun nodded. "Alright. But didn't you tell me once that you didn't even used to have emotions?"

"You did remember," Nicole commented, a bit quietly. "But yes, you're right," she continued. "Though my abilities as an AI were unprecedented and I was far from a mindless drone, I was... for a lack of a better descriptor, my personality was in its infancy."

She paused, remaining quiet for a bit while Sorun silently watched on. She lifted her legs and pressed her knees against her chest while resting her arms up on top while gazing out at the city.

"Even with my intelligence I wasn't much better than a machine back then," Nicole quietly admitted. "My entire world was nothing but interpreting streams of data, hacking technology, manipulating functions in other machines, sorting through and memorizing data files. Colorless. Shapeless. Nothing but information. The only glimpse of the real world I ever received was when somebody talked to me. But as limiting as that was, even then it was something. Time passed, and I started to grow more and more expressive as my personality developed, but it was never enough , and the longer it went on and the more I grew the more I knew I was missing something, but I never knew what. I was yearning for something that, at the time, was completely incomprehensible to me and could never figure out what it was no matter how much consideration I put into the issue."

"And... then the body swap thing with Sally happened, and you got to walk around in the shoes of a living person for a bit," Sorun guessed.

"Yes," she confirmed. "It was admittedly overwhelming at the time, being bombarded with so many sights and senses I'd never experienced before in such a short time, but in the end I believe it's what I needed." She looked away from the city and at Sorun. "So many things changed after that. When I attained that perspective. Even in the digital world I began interpreting data as having shapes and colors. More than that, I'd... learned to truly feel, through her, in that one moment. And it's been progressing from there since." Her legs lowered back to the roof as she continued to Sorun, "Emotions have undoubtably been the most challenging aspect of life I've encountered. Never remaining static, always changing, new emotions sprouting up at new experiences. I would never trade them for anything else even if they prove frustrating at times, but I'll confess to wishing to be able to understand my own and others' emotions more than I usually do."

Sorun blew a lock of hair out of his face and sat back in his chair. "Well, we organics barely even understand emotions even though we invented 'em, so I don't know what you hope to do about it."

Nicole actually laughed at what Sorun thought was a bad joke. "Perhaps that is for the best. I think the mystery adds some charm to it." She paused for a bit. "But in short, that's how I became who I am. That and, of course, creating a body so I can interact with the real world proper. I was admittedly hesitant of letting others seeing it at first for fear of what they'd think or if I'd made a mistake with it somewhere, but Sonic was actually the first one to see it when he was visiting the digital world during a small emergency. I was extremely relieved when he accepted the form immediately." She closed her eyes and smiled at the memory. "He had a great very many compliments for it, in fact. It was almost unusual how receptive he was towards me after seeing the body I'd crafted."

For a single frame of time, barely even a single millisecond, Sorun's irises flashed green, and a few, barely perceptible blue sparks flickered around his face before his eyes returned to a solid blue. It was an event that went unnoticed by the both of them as Nicole reopened her eyes to continue addressing Sorun.

"Even so... nobody ever referred to me as a person back then when we'd first met, and people were slow to trust. Even in recent years new acquaintances never saw me as a person but just as another machine. It was a sentiment shared by many of the citizens here, actually, though I suspect using the nanites to craft them a new city relieved them of these notions," she added with a small smile. She focused completely on Sorun, and the smile began to drop as she gave him a curious look. "But... you never did," she said, almost sounding confused.

Sorun tilted his head a bit. "I'm not sure what you mean."

"You were... somewhat volatile back then," Nicole carefully said. Sorun winced a bit and flipped his palms up in a sign of reluctantly agreeing with her. "I realize now you had much more on your mind than what we all thought, the threat of perishing under the power of the Chaos Emeralds, stranded on an alien world and pressured to fight in a war that wasn't yours. You were very brash and dismissive of others, and I was there in the handheld when you first arrived and shouted at Tails for what he did-" Sorun made a heavy wince in regret as Nicole spoke, "-and I tried my best to be considerate of your circumstances, but you were giving off a rather poor impression regardless."

"... To be fair I was having a really rough week," Sorun said in an attempt to bring some levity to the conversation.

"I'm aware," she assured him. "Sally wanted to introduce me all because she was worried for your mental health and thought playing those games with me of all things would help you some." Her face grew a bit sly. "Evidently she was more right than she knew."

Sorun mirrored her expression and leaned his head up at the sky, covering his face with a hand in amusement. "Little bit, yeah," he agreed.

"But to my original point," Nicole continued as Sorun sat back normally, "you only ever called me an AI in describing what I was, not who I was." She looked down a bit. "And you'd said all those things, during that botched mission inside that head we decided to undergo. It was a shock to hear such words from someone that barely knew me and yet put so much stock into me being my own person and not a machine, and... well, I suppose that's where my feelings with you started to develop, though I hadn't known at the time."

Startled, Sorun jumped back in his seat. "Geez, it was that early?" Sorun muttered, more to himself than Nicole. The lynx still heard him and her ears perked up as a response.

"Thereabouts, yes," she confirmed. "When was it for you?"

Rubbing the back of his neck, Sorun nervously answered, "Uhm... I couldn't tell ya an exact point, it just sorta... happened. Like, not instantly, over time, but I don't know when it solidified into a genuine crush, uh... when we got to this city, maybe? Bit before that?" He shyly looked down to avoid her inquisitive eyes. "To be honest I wanted to say something back then, but I thought I was gonna die soon so I didn't wanna risk more damage. And I legitimately thought I had no shot with you, still amazed we're actually doing this."

"Well, despite numerous difficulties it's seemed to have worked out for the best," Nicole laughed out. And then she asked with a serious tone, "But why did you regard me so highly despite knowing so little? Why put so much faith in an AI?"

That was a loaded question and a half. One that made Sorun lean back in thought, arms crossed as he pondered the question, Nicole silently watching on. It felt like it took him a whole minute to come up with something before he chose to answer her.

"... I'm pretty biased," Sorun decided on. "My planet wasn't besieged by killer robots, so a lot more people were open to the idea. Granted, before everything ended over there we never managed to develop AI near anything this zone has got," he explained. "Ironically the closest we ever got was video game AIs and chatbots with predictable speech patterns. Nothing truly sapient, not like you. Even all those dimestore Badnik AIs Robotnik churned out were more impressive." He leaned forwards in his seat, hands clasped together as he gave Nicole a serious look. "But humanity was fascinated with the idea of creating artificial life, for lots of reasons that were up for debate. To see if we could, or to maybe just alleviate the loneliness humanity felt since, well, Earth wasn't like Mobius. There were humans and that was it. Not even aliens."

Nicole nodded along, listening intently and leaning forwards to be right in front of Sorun.

"The fascination was enough that there were tons of pieces of media made all about AI and the question, with all their various plots and stories revolving around AI and how free they were, AI rights, other various plots."

"A majority of them were video games, weren't they?" Nicole asked in a dry voice.

"Hey, 'NieR: Automata' was a good game, okay?" Sorun said, though he didn't rebuke the claim. "... Alright, yeah, lots of 'em were games, and they always made a really flattering picture for AI. Some of the coolest and most supportive characters in all of gaming fiction were all AIs. Like 9S, or Bladewolf, or Cortana, or EDI, or ED-E, or BT, or GLaDOS- that's not a good example, forget that last one," he choked out, making Nicole tilt her head at him. "But there were a tons of books and movies, too, some shows, you get the picture. I was always into AI." Sorun glanced up a bit. "Wasn't a universal interest, though, 'cause there were a lot of people that thought AI would be evil and wanna wipe out all humanity. But you're cool so I guess they were wrong. Oh, except all the AI Eggman programs are pretty evil, I guess. Hm." He looked back down at Nicole. "You're not planning on wiping out all life on the planet, are you?"

"Not presently, no."

It took a few seconds for Sorun to register those words, but after they did he did a double-take at Nicole while staring with wide eyes. She managed to keep up a completely serious expression for all of ten seconds before a small grin broke out on her face.

"Just kidding."

"Ah, good, 'cause-"

"The plans have been in motion for some time now."

"Gah-!" With that, Sorun had fallen backwards out of his seat entirely and fell onto the roof. Nicole laughed at his expense, though instead of being mad Sorun just rolled his eyes and sat back in the chair while folding his arms in mock anger. "Alright, fine, very funny. Was about to start callin' you SHODAN there. Sheesh."

"Well, you make it easy." It was hard for Sorun to resist the urge to stick his tongue out at Nicole when she said that. "You never talk that much about Earth culture like this."

For very good reason. "It's... well, I don't, no." Sorun glanced away from Nicole and at the city. "You know, I keep thinking about that time you said I lie by omission a lot just by not telling you stuff sometimes."

"Do you not?" Nicole asked. "Despite how much you've told me of your past and the life you used to live in your own home I know shockingly little of what life was like there. You never say much."

"... I don't ever really want to," Sorun admitted, causing some surprise to bloom on Nicole's face. "It's the past. It's irrelevant, like yours. Dunno why I need to bring it up."

"But it was your past. Your culture. I would think you'd want to remember it."

"I remember the good parts and try my best to forget the bad parts. It's the bad parts I don't talk about," Sorun said. "Look, Nicole, things were just different over there. And it doesn't do anybody any good bringing up stuff that happened on Earth here; people got enough to deal with considering all the Robotnik stuff. It's unnecessary baggage." By that Sorun really meant he didn't want to inadvertently traumatize someone by bringing up the worser points points of human nature and history. It was a lie, maybe, but honestly Sorun was completely fine with that. He doubted others really cared anyway how much he kept to himself. People here had their own lives and histories to deal with, after all. "There just isn't a good reason to bring it up, Nicole. Ever. It's not out of disrespect for you or anyone else. It's really just stuff I'd rather leave buried."

"It... truly was that bad?"

It hurt a bit hearing Nicole's voice be so down. "Some stuff was better off being erased along with everything else over there. I don't want to speak of it further." He looked up and did his best at offering Nicole a reassuring smile. "But hey, this is supposed to be a date. Rather not spend it reminiscing about a bunch of pointless stuff."

Nicole instantly straightened up, looking a bit sheepish as she nodded in agreement. "Yes, I suppose that's true. I'll trust your judgement on the matter." She fidgeted around a bit. "I... I was wondering, since we were on the subject. Why me, of all people?"

"Huh?" Sorun flinched back a bit in surprise. "Uh, you wanna know that?"

"Of course I do. I told you my reason, didn't I?" she shyly responded. "I'm curious myself, I'll have you know."

"Ah, yeah, I guess..." It was fair enough, even if Sorun didn't want to acknowledge it. He doubted his words would be as pretty as Nicole's on the matter, but he'd give it his best shot anyway. "Well, the AI part was never really a factor for me, just that you were you, and, uh... I guess it started with... well, video games."

There was a moment where Sorun was sure Nicole would say something sarcastic at that, even closing his eyes and waiting for it, but nothing ever came. When he opened his eyes he saw her waiting for him to continue, even if she did look a bit mystified at the explanation. He took it as a sign to keep going.

"The truth of the matter is there wasn't a whole lot I could do in my old home. 'Cause of physical limitations and general disinterest and all that," Sorun truthfully admitted. "Video games were my thing. And I was good at them. I was internationally ranked in a lot of competitive circles, actually, but that's a whole 'nother story entirely," he admitted, causing Nicole's eyes to go wide. "Even won some tournaments. Maybe coulda gone pro when I turned eighteen in a couple years, but that's a bygone dream now." He shook his head. "But discounting all of that I legitimately loved video games. They were my thing. It was what I latched onto here during my stint with the Freedom Fighters so I didn't go insane." Sorun looked up at the sky and smiled at the memory. "And oh, man, Nicole when I played with everyone and compared our levels of skill I realized all too quick..." His smile instantly dropped into a frown. "That everyone was terrible at video games and I remained at the peak apex of skill among all other gamers."

Nicole went completely motionless, smile frozen and eyes still wide. And then she blinked a bit, the smile somewhat becoming withered and forced. "That's... somewhat harsh, don't you think?"

"No, it's true, none of them were good," Sorun said, in a tone that was a bit too bright for Nicole to bear, so her ears lowered as she listened even as she maintained that detached smile. "There was no challenge, no skill, no sense of accomplishment, I'd argue it was a waste of time if it wasn't served asserting my dominance in the digital landscape. But you!" Sorun used both hands to point at Nicole in an exaggerated manner, making Nicole jump at the sudden movement. "With you I'm pushed to do my absolute best! And I even lose half the time! You know how great that is?"

"It's extremely impressive," Nicole hesitantly admitted, "but perhaps you're putting too much stock into the significance of games of all things in our relationship, Sorun?"

"Well, I didn't mean to imply that- I mean that wasn't-" A slightly troubled expression crossed Sorun's face, after which he grimaced and shook his head. "Actually, yeah, you're right I'm probably going too deep with this." He cleared his throat before attempting to try again. "What I mean to say is... video games are important to me, and back there I had people that could actually challenge me. Here it's just you, and when we're playing it's... kinda like I'm back there, you know? Everything feels normal for a bit. It's always like that with you."

Nicole's expression softened at the same time her ears lowered down. It was at the way Sorun's voice had gone quieter, and the way his eyes were continually flicking at her own eyes and the ground, like he was uncomfortable or struggling to say something. But on the other hand it was rare she that she heard him speak this directly and with things so personally. She would find it touching if it didn't feel so out of place for him.

For Sorun it truly was a struggle, doing this. A thing he was never supposed to do with anyone, that he never wanted to do. Looking so vulnerable like this, in front of someone. Anyone else he would have flied into a rage in a desperate attempt at shaking that impression off, but with Nicole it felt... fine? Maybe that's how it was supposed to work in a relationship like this. He didn't find himself minding it too much; it was nice sharing, for some reason. So he kept going for it.

"I wouldn't go as far as to say I outright hated everyone back then in the early days, but... I hadn't really been fond of anyone, either," Sorun admitted. "I latched onto you because you were the only person I could connect to. You were really just that: my one friend. The person I could hang out with and pretend things were alright for a little bit. But you were always nice, and really supportive, and for some reason you actually laughed at some of the stuff I said sometimes, and to be completely honest I would've fallen apart if you weren't there for me, and..." He rose a hand in the air and let it fall limply into his lap. "I can't point out when it happened, it just did. That eventually I started to feel like I didn't want us to be just friends, but a combination of fear of rejection and impending doom kept me from saying anything, and after that whole mess, I... really, really wasn't in a good place.

"But you were there. All the time. I don't even know if I'd be here if it weren't for you," Sorun mumbled out. By now Nicole had transitioned out of her own chair just to sit next to Sorun while gazing at him with a sympathetic look. "I just... really like you, 'cause of all the things you did for me." He shuffled a bit more, fighting to get the words out. "I'm not used to this kind of thing. You're the only one who gets to see me like this, okay? Nobody else," he said in a meek voice.

She didn't look like she knew how to respond to him when he said that. Puzzled, but somehow understanding at the same time, so she'd put a reassuring hand over his while doing her best to respond.

"I... very much appreciate how trusting and open you are with me," she carefully said, "but you don't have to make it so that you're only so open exclusively to me-"

"Yes I do."

She seemed taken back by how quickly Sorun rebuked her. "I think the others would be assured by-"

"Others aren't you." Sorun moved his hand around to intertwine his fingers with her; more of an unconscious reflex to reassure himself more than anything else, and something that barely rose to Sorun's mind. "Does it really matter so much?"

It wasn't something he was willing to budge on. Nicole was a special exception; a special everything, really. Friends were friends and he'd always be more open and friendly with them than anyone else, and Sorun figured that was normal. But it was one thing being open and friendly and another appearing this vulnerable in front of someone when it was just the two of them alone. Not that he didn't trust the others, but because it was a level of trust he only wanted Nicole to have. Because it helped represent what they had between themselves.

Sorun tried explaining as much, in not so much a concise matter and with a bit of nervous stuttering on his part. Nicole had listened intently through the whole thing, even during the parts where he'd had to pause and work up the nerve to continue, because this thing on a whole felt embarrassing to admit, borderline mortifying, it felt, but it was something Sorun wanted said even if it was at the cost of great difficulty. And throughout the whole time that confused, but understanding look Nicole held never wavered, though she did look less and less confused as it became clear what Sorun meant.

Maybe it was just confusion because of where he was. Maybe people here were just more open with feelings naturally and he appeared strange never wanting to project so much of himself. Consequence of differing cultures, maybe, or probably it was just because of who he was. An answer didn't really matter since in the end it was still what Sorun wanted. Just for her and only her to see him like this, if only because he felt she deserved it and the relationship probably wouldn't survive otherwise.

"You make it sound like you're scared of opening up like this in front of anyone else," Nicole had pointed out in a gentle voice.

"I'm not," he quickly denied. "I've just never done this before. It's normal from where I'm from."

All at once some new form of comprehension alit in Nicole's eyes, like she'd finally found the answer to some intricate puzzle she'd been stuck on. She made a small laugh, like she was amused by something silly, and then stood up while pulling Sorun along with her. "Fine, Sorun, that's fair enough," she decided, "but you're always open to changing your mind."

"Doubt I will. Doubt it. Heavily," Sorun said, rolling his eyes away from Nicole. He looked towards the horizon and saw the sun was nearly setting. "So anyways, with all that awkward stuff out of the way, umm, can-can we, I dunno, take a walk? Somewhere? It's getting dark and the roof-"

"Is an immediate safety hazard, yes, I agree," Nicole immediately said.

"I wasn't gonna say a safety hazard of all-" And then there was a flash of light, and suddenly the two of them had went from standing on the roof to standing on the sidewalk in front of the science center, "-things... you know, it's rude teleporting people without warning them," he pointed out, looking back at Nicole.

She guiltily smiled at him. "It's the most expedient method," she offered, though she amended herself when Sorun kept staring. "I'll warn in advance of future teleports. So, the park, then?"

Things got progressively easier when they started to stray away from the talks of feelings, what Sorun considered to be the most difficult subject to encroach humanly possible and always took active steps to avoid unless with Nicole. Maybe down the line it'd get easier - a miracle Sorun wasn't holding out for. Or maybe such heavy feelings talks would never occur again - Sorun held a large amount of hope out for that miracle.

Fortunately for now it was a subject successfully broached and concluded, so to his immense relief they'd managed to talk about other things as they... strolled through a park, holding hands. Sorun was thankful it was freshly nighttime and there weren't many people out at this time to see. The shame of it would-

---

Why would there be a shame in it?

It was a question that just now popped into Sorun's mind, as the two of them were walking along while Nicole spoke of something. "Is there anything to... I mean it's a consensual relationship we're both pretty committed to, I don't see why... no, there shouldn't be, but this is embarrassing. Why is it embarrassing?" Sorun asked himself. "I guess it doesn't really look like 'me' acting so... this with Nicole, with the handholding and all, when I already built up this image that doesn't even fit with... does anyone even care about that image? Do I ? Why do I have to worry about preserving some static thing if it gets in the way of this? Why should doing anything beyond what I want matter?"

Maybe Nicole was right and he was being a bit silly with how he was handling the "openness" side of things on his part, something he felt she really only went along with because it was easier on his part. And he had a sneaking suspicion she figured he didn't have the mental constitution to keep up a mental shell forever now that the relationship was picking away at it.

She was probably right. The longer this went on the more Sorun realized how exhausting it was. But saying so much in front of her felt like admitting she was right. So maybe over time he'd... relax, somewhat, around the others. A bit more and more over time. Never as much as around Nicole; she deserved a special place. But in a place where his worries were near-nonexistent now with such accepting people Sorun found less and less reasons to bother.

But again, this was a revelation that could never be said to Nicole. Because it would prove her right and she'd be the automatic winner. If he had it his way he'd follow her suggestion without ever openly acknowledging it.

Unless... she just noticed one day he was slowly doing just that, and he knew, knew , she would never verbally acknowledge it, but even worse give him that knowing "I told you so" smirk. And Sorun dreaded this was, quite possibly, an inevitable course.

"... Maybe she wins after all," Sorun decided with a mental shrug as they continued walking along. He looked upwards at the park, the trees the small pond nearby. Things that looked so authentic he never would have suspected they were completely artificial and completely comprised of however many trillions of quadrillions of nanites or whatever ridiculous number it surely was. Something that probably required scientific notation. But that was for Nicole and her completely alien ability to comprehend math to figure out.

They passed by a patch of flowers next to the path they were walking. Nicole had stopped to look at them, so Sorun was forced to stop alongside her. He glanced at the lynx, staring down at the flowers with the same look of pride and joy a parent would give their kid for winning a spelling competition, which forced Sorun to look down at those very same flowers.

A patch of pink something-or-others, Sorun deduced. Certainly authentic-looking. And... certainly flowers. Yes indeedy.

"Isn't it kind of a waste of space, making a big park like this?" Sorun wondered, looking up from the fake flowers and at Nicole. "The city only has so much space and you can't really expand outwards."

She waved his concern off. "It's not all that much," Nicole assured him. "But more importantly is that all Mobians have a deep affinity to nature. I didn't want anyone to feel alienated living here without something such as this. It's the same reason I put so many trees everywhere."

"I mean, sure, but the city's in the middle of a forest. I can walk out the front door and see nothing but nature. We aren't exactly disconnected from nature here."

"It looks nice and the people like it, so I feel vindicated in my choice."

"Alright, alright..." His gaze traveled back down to the pink flowers. "The flowers look kinda weird. In the way the petals are all angular and everything."

"Those 'angular flowers' are a popular breed I read about in a botany book that I copied."

Sorun winced. Both at the slightly incensed tone Nicole took and upon realizing he may have inadvertently just insulted her. Fears that were confirmed when he looked back up at Nicole and caught her giving him a narrow-eyed glare. His mind raced to think up a solution to reconcile this and sprang at the first thought that came to mind. "You... you're very pretty?"

Nicole looked more startled by that claim than Sorun had ever seen her before. And by some miracle it seemed to work , because she'd made a small, abashed smile while turning away, earlier glare all but evaporated.

"Oh, well... I suppose flowers aren't for everybody, and... well, that's very nice of you to say," she mumbled out, so flustered Sorun couldn't believe it.

"Oh man. I can get away with anything now." Dumbstruck, Sorun looked down at his own hands, like his own palms held the answer to infinite power somewhere in their creases. Like the universe itself no longer held any mysteries because Sorun himself had just figured out the ultimate solution to getting out of trouble: just compliment Nicole on something. The possibilities were endless.

Unfortunately it didn't seem like it was to be, because when Nicole caught Sorun staring at his hands with an awestruck expression she frowned upon immediately realizing what he just did. And then Sorun noticed her staring, immediately realizing ultimate power had slipped through his fingers and he'd been caught in the act. As a result he was shoved - playfully, with so little force that a gentle breeze would've carried more force behind it.

With the utmost maturity afforded to him, Sorun grinned and leaned backwards. The path they were on was on the edge of a small hill, one that he was leaning towards while waving his arms in an exaggerated manner. Nicole looked concerned at Sorun's sake for the movements, and then realization and panic when one of his arms shot out and grabbed one of her wrists with the intent to drag her with him.

"Oh, Nicole, how could you, I can't believe you'd do such a thing...!" Sorun cried out with a false, nearly smug-sounding voice as his body leaned further and further back.

"No, Sorun, no no no don't SorRUN-!"

Despite her protests, there hadn't been resistance to Sorun's pulling. There may have even been the slightest hint of amusement to her voice if he focused in hard enough, past all the panic. Whatever the case was, they'd both ended up falling, rolling down the hill while tumbling over themselves. This continued all the way to the bottom of the hill, stopping with Sorun on his back and Nicole on top of him, both laughing with mirthful looks on their faces.

It was a happy moment, something that'd Sorun had lacked for so long it nearly felt foreign, but still good. To just laugh at something stupid. But the laughter started to quickly die out for the both of them when they realized the position they were in, after which the two shared a blank expression. And then after a quick scramble they ended up sitting on the ground shoulder-to-shoulder, embarrassed looks on both of their faces as they stared off into the nearby pond reflecting the moon and stars in the sky.

"Um, uh, yeah, so-" Sorun began.

"Yes, tha- I didn't- that-" Nicole replied.

"It's... yeah."

"Agreed."

"For sure." Sorun didn't know what just happened and he suspected Nicole didn't, either. "I haven't messed up on this date yet, have I?"

From the corner of his eyes he saw Nicole make a small smile as she stared out at the pond. "No, Sorun, I've been enjoying our time together," she said, making Sorun so relieved he felt half his weight just disappear. "I'll freely confess to always being somewhat envious of watching people enjoy their lives, so being out here with you, doing this and... living , I suppose, has been... it's..." She grew quiet for a bit, and her hand slid over the ground to rest atop Sorun's. "It's really all I wanted was the opportunity to do this."

"That and the whole 'liberate the planet from the crazy guy so our friends can stop fighting' thing, right?"

"Yes, but I felt it too obvious to mention." She turned her head a bit to look at Sorun. "I just wanted to thank you. For doing this with me. Being with me, I mean. Which is to say... no, that isn't right..."

Suddenly looking flustered, Nicole looked down and away. "What I mean to say is you're always doing these things with me to help me experience what I've been missing for so long. So thank you."

"... Should be me thanking you," Sorun mumbled out. "Sooo... does this mean I'm allowed to call you my girlfriend, or...?"

Nicole's head whipped towards him with a surprised look. "You were allowed the moment we agreed on going on this date, were you not?"

Sorun blinked. "Is that how it works?"

"I assume?" She didn't sound so sure herself, eyes squinting a bit in concentration briefly. And then she shook her head. "It doesn't matter. We're in a mutually established relationship now. The girlfriend and boyfriend labels are warranted."

"Okay." So that was it. About as official as Sorun could see it being made official. As in he was officially in a relationship now, and...well, he didn't know how to feel about that. It was so shocking in fact he didn't feel much of anything. Bewildered to a point beyond bewilderment to simple acceptance. "Um, so we can kiss and stuff?" It was a second later Sorun realized what he just said. If he still had the Bringer Claws one of them probably would have punched him in the face.

Worryingly, Nicole's face displayed a hefty amount of apprehension at the prospect. "Ah. That."

Well, now Sorun was feeling something. A heavy amount of disappointment and panic was what he felt. "You don't want to?" It was translation for, "Was I too forward and asked too early and/or what did I do to screw it up this quickly?"

The answer wasn't either of those, but it was still something Sorun didn't know how to process. "It just seems so unsanitary."

"D... bu..." It was levels of confusion Sorun didn't even know was possible that were generated by that response, and he was sure it showed on his face from the way Nicole was looking at him. "But you don't even have an organic body, what do you have to worry about!?" he whined out.

Pouting, Nicole crossed her arms and turned her torso away. "I don't see how a couple locking mouths together is supposed to prove their feelings towards one another, despite how much it's been lauded. Mouths were not even designed for this function. I fail to see the point."

The half of Sorun that wanted to argue was beaten into the ground by the feral side of Sorun that desperately didn't want to come off as pushy and told him to just respect her position on the matter. Even if he really didn't want to because he'd admittedly been looking forwards to it. It was beat harder by Sorun's other side. "Yeah, okay, that's fine," he said, clear dejection in his voice as he slumped a bit where he sat.

One of Nicole's ears flicked at Sorun's voice, and she turned back around to look at him. She seemed a bit taken back at the disappointed look he held, and after a few seconds of personal deliberation she said, "Oh, fine. Come here."

"Huh?" Sorun's brain shorted out a bit, following him hearing that and feeling Nicole grab the collar of his coat. It stopped working altogether when she leaned forwards and pulled him towards her at the same time to press their mouths together. Truthfully he was so out of it due to sheer shock he didn't even remember what was going on during the kiss. Just the feeling of his heart thumping at about a trillion beats an attosecond and the mental picture of a mental version of himself jumping up and down, arms flung up while screeching in victory.

His face felt like it was on fire, too. From all the blushing. But the good kind of fire.

The jumping, screaming Sorun in his head collapsed and started crying when Nicole broke away from the kiss. He couldn't imagine what his own face like. Stunned and stupid, probably. To the point fancier, more sophisticated words couldn't be used in place of stupid, like dumbfounded or gobsmacked. Just stupid.

By contrast, Nicole looked... almost perplexed. The same kind of perplexed look a scientist would get when they just discovered something never before seen under a microscope, along with the air of seeming to like something. Maybe from looking at his face. She was paying a lot of attention to it for some reason.

She liked something , apparently, because she grabbed him again and went in for another kiss.

The mental image of Sorun in Sorun's head jumped back up like the little caveman he was and started screeching again. Yelling and laughing, pointing up at the metaphorical sky with both hands while screaming at the world itself, "Fuck off, I win. There's nothing you can ever do to take this from me because I did it ." Because this was quite possibly the highest achievement Sorun had ever accomplished for himself.

With this in mind suddenly Sorun remembered his muscles were capable of locomotive function and he moved his head a bit to try and do something to make the process better for the both of them. To his immense disappointment she'd already began pulling away again by that time, apparently satisfied with the second kiss. The disappointment was world-shattering when her tongue left his mouth, which was the point he realized she actually went for that kind of kiss and he hadn't even realized until it was over twice over. He took a bit of solace in the fact there'd be another time to enjoy it.

Also she thankfully hadn't made her tongue have spikes on it like normal cats. He was worried about that.

"... I take it back. The kissing is necessary," Nicole decided in a matter-of-fact tone after they broke away. "Thank you for... that."

Sorun didn't know if a proper response to that even existed but he decided to go for it anyways. "Y-yeah, sure." He noticed something odd in his mouth. The volume of liquids in there was higher than he was accustomed to, and he recoiled a small bit when he realized why. "What is... why is there spit in my mouth?" Sorun asked, holding a hand up to his mouth. "Why do you have spit?"

The look Nicole sent him couldn't have possibly looked more confused at the question.

"Wait, it's gone." And like that the added volume of saliva in Sorun's mouth just vanished, like it hadn't even been there to begin with. It'd left behind a faint cooling sensation that... well, if Sorun was being perfectly honest was almost pleasant, but he was too bewildered to think on it. "What just happened?"

"What... what is the answer you're looking for here, Sorun?" Nicole tried, seemingly lost at what was being asked of her.

"I mean, I just didn't... I... I'm asking how that's possible," Sorun stammered. "Like, I don't understand how you have liquid in your mouth."

Some of the confusion on Nicole's face was alleviated in understanding. "Ah, that. This body is a hardlight projection, Sorun. With an emphasis on the word 'hard'. As in this is a physical construct able to completely and fully interact with the world," she explained. "And as such I wanted it to be as accurate to a real-life body as physically possible. So there were many functions added in that, while they may be ultimately superfluous in function, act to simulate this as a living body as perfectly as possible. So yes, I added in a separate function for my body to produce fluids. It disappears a short while after being separate from the main body." She started twiddling her fingers together and glanced away. "I hadn't thought you'd be so surprised. Since you've seen me cry."

... Right, he had, Sorun had realized with a small feeling of awkwardness accompanying the thought. He remembered being intrigued at the sight of her producing tears at the time, but there'd been so much going on then that he'd brushed it off and forgotten the matter, it seemed. But admittedly even with Nicole's explanation the answer went a bit over Sorun's head. Really the whole science behind the nanites and how Nicole got this hardlight stuff to work to be so realistic went over his head, and he was always happy to shrug it off and tell himself that him understanding didn't really matter as long as Nicole did and could make it work. So if she could make hyper-realistic stuff like this work for her, then hey, more power to her.

Of course by this point Sorun realized his reaction to his first ever kiss with someone was asking why she had spit. The resulting cringe would have knocked out lesser men - Sorun was proud to report he only almost succumbed to it completely.

"I am... so sorry I asked that. Like, after... uh... man, I'm stupid," Sorun mumbled, covering his face in embarrassment. He saw the pond past his fingers and briefly considered drowning himself to escape.

By some miracle Nicole giggled besides him. "Oh, it's fine, Sorun, I wasn't offended in any way. Just off-put slightly from how you worded that." Her next words came out a bit pensive and hesitant, almost nervous. "And... I trust it was, erm, enjoyable for you as it was for me?"

It was actually so enjoyable Sorun's mind couldn't even comprehend it. Literally. The only comprehensible parts had been the white noise of bliss and the longing sensation that told Sorun he needed more of it. But all that was secondary to the fact she apparently enjoyed it, and for all Sorun cared that one thing alone trumped everything else. That she liked it. Liked him .

"... It was the best," Sorun shyly admitted. It was a statement so embarrassing to say he couldn't find it in himself to face Nicole after saying it, but he could practically feel her beaming besides him.

"I'm glad." She shuffled closer besides him, though they were already sitting so close together that the most she managed was to brush the sides of their bodies together, and she'd looped an arm around one of his own. "Admittedly, Sorun, I was surprised. Verily so." Her voice grew a bit softer. "Back then, when I'd accidentally swapped bodies with Sally, there'd been a moment when I'd laid eyes on Sonic, and her body had relayed a certain feeling. It was a peculiar emotion I'd never been able to replicate until I felt something similar when we kissed."

Sorun looked over when he felt a weight settle on his shoulder, and saw Nicole resting her head on him. "Only similar?" he questioned.

"Mhm. It doesn't hurt. Their relationship had always been somewhat tumultuous," she mumbled out in answer. "I don't know what the emotion means nor particularly care. I liked it for some reason. I demand we repeat the act as frequently as desired. Daily if possible."

Again with the blushing. Sorun was thankful Nicole wasn't in a position to see it. "Sure. We can do that," he shyly mumbled out. "I'm glad you liked it."

"Yes, well, you made a rather humorous face, too. That alone warrants enough reason."

All at once the blush evaporated and Sorun frowned. Joking or not, that was a sentence that demanded retribution. He immediately began searching for a medium to channel his revenge and found it right there. At the bottom of Nicole's legs.

Feet. Completely uncovered, perfectly vulnerable toes patterned in black and brown fur. With toes noticeably larger and more bulbous than a human's toes, but that was besides the point. For some reason Nicole chose this form to walk around barefoot. She was about to regret that decision.

"Tell me again how you managed to make your hologram body able to feel things," Sorun requested, in a gentle and curious voice that was completely opposite of the mischievous grin he held as he subtlety reached forwards with the arm Nicole hadn't taken hostage of with her body.

Her head perked up off his shoulder at hearing the question, and when she responded she sounded almost eager to speak of it. "I'm glad you asked! It's actually a nano-lattice of pressure sensory strips integrated into the surface of my body, minus the clothes. It was admittedly largely based on data extrapolated from my time in an organic body, plus study of biological nervous systems, but after a painstaking amount of time I managed to calibrate the sensors to send the proper sensations based on the type of stimulation given, and I'm proud to say it's a system that confers roughly a ninety-nine-point-nine-six percent accuracy to a normal Mobian's sensory input-"

When his arm reached far enough Sorun poked one of Nicole's toes.

The reaction was almost comical. Her body had gone completely straight, ears somehow even straighter than that, as Nicole detached herself from Sorun's body with a wide, surprised smile and even wider eyes. And her whole leg had flinched so hardly it'd nearly risen a whole ninety degrees in the air before flopping back down on the ground. Sorun himself would have laughed if the sight hadn't been so unexpected, so all he could do was blink in surprise and look at Nicole.

"Sorun... that's a very sensitive area," Nicole said, and began to look apprehensive when the mischievous grin Sorun had on began to grow. "I-I request that you do not-"

"Oh, we are far, far beyond that point," Sorun rebuked. He'd already leaned to the side and shifted his body so he was in a better position, with two hands raised.

Nicole looked nearly panicked and scooched back a bit. "No, wait, Sorun please think about-!"

His fingers began assaulting her feet with reckless abandon. Rubbing the soles - or pads, whatever those incredibly soft things under her feet and toes were - of her feet, slipping and rubbing between the toes, intermingling with bouts of him lightly feathering his fingers over whatever he felt was soft and vulnerable on her feet. For Nicole's part Sorun had never, ever heard her laugh as hard as he was hearing her now. It was a sound that was as musical as it was comical to his ears, which just spurned him to go further. Even just seeing her laughing, having fallen on her back while wriggling around and feeling her legs flinch and kick in his hands, and just how adorable the sight was just renewed his tickling fervor.

But never let it be said Sorun wasn't merciful, because he did eventually stop. After what might have been a minute. Or two. He'd had so much fun with it he didn't even know, but after a bit he'd begun to take pity on Nicole and stopped. Being what she was Nicole didn't outright breath except to keep up appearances, and it was a rare occurrence that she did something like sigh since for her it was a conscious effort that needed to be made to project her current mood. So to some her laughter dying out so quickly without her breathing in so heavily may have been eerie, but to Sorun it wasn't even a factor when he flopped down on his back so he was lying right besides her. There was still a large smile on Nicole's face as she swiveled her head to look at him, after which her hand softly slapped itself on top of his chest, where it chose to rest.

"You're incorrigible," was the only response she gave him. "I'm adding shoes to the new outfit."

Sorun just smiled wide and interlaced his fingers behind his head. "If you really wanted it to stop, you could have just teleported away. Admit it."

"No. Never." Her hand left his chest and reached behind his head to take one of his hands. He let her steal half of his makeshift bio-pillow and embrace it before letting the two hands rest on the ground between them. The smiles both held turned more easy and relaxed as they stared up into the night sky. A corona of deep blues, blacks, and purples hovering over the two amidst an expanse of infinite lights dotting the surface of the sky.

He'd said it once, and he'd say it again. The night sky here was stunning compared to Detroit standards where one would be lucky to catch a few stars in the sky.

"The stars are beautiful tonight," Nicole idly commented.

Though he agreed, the need for conflict to produce more words from her than if he just simply agreed compelled Sorun. "Eh. 'S just a bunch of burning plasma a billion miles away. I can see that just by staring at the sun."

"Please do not disrespect the plasma, Sorun. It is impolite," Nicole playfully chided. "Also do not stare at the sun. I will be upset." That one didn't sound playful.

The laugh he made was way more nervous than Sorun would have liked. "I-I won't," he semi-promised. He made a mental note to never tell her about the time he and his friends on Earth dared each other to see which one could stare at the sun the longest. "So, the date-?"

"The date was wonderful , Sorun." Something about hearing that, from how honest and happy, genuinely happy, Nicole sounded saying that, it did something to Sorun. Like his heart itself felt lighter; hearing that felt freeing, and Sorun couldn't explain why. Maybe that he'd managed to do this without screwing something up, that it was an accomplishment that he hadn't screwed up, but he wasn't even sure he cared about that aspect of it. He was pretty sure he was still stuck on the part where he was amazed someone actually decided to be his girlfriend.

That was still a weird word for Sorun to toss around his head and be able to associate it seriously with someone. Didn't feel real, almost, but here she was. Lying besides him on the grass and holding his hand. That someone cared enough about him to do this.

Just... happy. That's all he could really feel about this. Truly, genuinely happy. There'd been a time in his life he'd seriously believed he'd never feel that way again. Now that he did it was almost overwhelming. Happy he'd made it this far and happy that she was happy. He was almost conflicted over what aspect he was happiest over, which Sorun supposed was a good problem to have. A happy sort of problem.

"I was really scared I'd mess up at some point here. I'm happy something didn't go wrong for once," Sorun confessed to her. He made a small yawn. "I'm... happy in general. With this. And you."

"Hm?" Nicole propped herself up on her elbows and turned to look down at Sorun. "You seem tired," she noted.

Was he? Upon further examination Sorun realized, yes, he was. In fact it was only now he realized how far his eyelids had been drooping. He'd been so relaxed around Nicole Sorun hadn't even noticed it. "Oh, well, you know, it was a long day and the date was so much fun I guess it kinda, eh... took it out of me." Sorun moved his hand to rub against one of his eyes and realized with mild surprise it was taking serious effort just to lift his arm. He really was tired.

Nicole shook her head. "There's no need to apologize. It is rather late out, and the evening has been, well... eventful." She glanced away with a shy smile. "Rolling down that hill probably didn't help matters."

"Hey, the hill was fun," Sorun lightheartedly argued. He sat upwards and attempted to stand up to his feet. He accomplished this - but then stumbled a bit when a wave of exhaustion hit him; he really must have been tired if it was hitting him this badly. Nicole look startled at the motion and quickly moved behind him to brace his body with her arms. Not that he thought he would have actually fallen, but... he appreciated it, regardless. Since it got her arms on him.

"You don't seem awake enough to walk back home unassisted." Her voice and the look in Nicole's eyes didn't seem overly concerned with Sorun's current state. More analytical than anything else, though there was a touch of tenderness behind her demeanor that Sorun wouldn't mind getting used to. Though she'd hesitated with saying the next thing. "I could... carry you. If you wanted."

Yes, he deeply desired that. No, they couldn't do that because someone might see. "Someone might see," he tiredly protested.

She gave him a flat, but patient, look. "I can instantly transport us to your home."

"Silver might see."

"He's likely in bed at this hour."

"Virgil might see."

"I don't think your pet will overly care that much, Sorun," she stated in exasperation. "Are you truly that concerned about your pet with a single word in his vocabulary seeing me carry you?"

Not really, now that he thought about it. Mostly because she was right in that he couldn't talk and spread the secret. Part of Sorun still felt like protesting the matter, but, if he was being honest with himself, he really didn't feel like walking all the way back home this tired. And he actually did want her to carry him. And if the risk of seeing someone was mitigated to being a non-issue, well... at the end of the day she was smarter and knew better, so who was he to argue with Nicole's advice?

Screw it. He wanted to be carried.

"If you so insist." He went completely limp in Nicole's grasp - Sorun was mildly surprised that a sudden lack of tension in his body hadn't made Nicole herself budge in the slightest. "Just straight to my room."

"Yes. I've been running too long, myself, come to think of it. I may need to retire for the night shortly after you." Once again Sorun was mildly surprised when Nicole lifted his whole body up with both arms without looking the slightest bit inhibited. He'd have to remember to ask her one day what kind of strength rating a hardlight body actually had. "But otherwise, yes, I'll take you straight home. Because I know you get embarrassed showing affection around others."

He crossed his arms and pouted as his legs dangled off of one of Nicole's arms. "Do not," he denied.

"It's alright, Sorun. I know." It was hard to tell if she was being kind or teasing with that comment. Sorun was both too tired and liked her too much to care, so he settled with just shuffling into a more comfortable position as he was carried off by her.

He'd nodded off and drifted into sleep before she'd even managed to place him in his own bed. It was the first night he could remember actually falling asleep while being happy.

A/N- Alright, this is it. This right here is the mushiest, most sappiest chapter this entire story will ever have, so take it in while you all can 'cause I'm not doing this again. Thing was a nightmare to get out.

Anyways, onto a little behind the scenes commentary on this whole thing.

So full-stop I didn't plan a romance while making this story. In fact I went into planning this story without wanting to do any kind of romance at all for various reasons. It wasn't a main focus, people kind of get turned away by that if it's advertised out the gate, I plain just didn't want to. Lots of reasons. I was ready to go through this whole story without even so much as a mention of romance and almost did.

Of course, obviously, I changed my mind. And it was the most last minute change in the world, too, because I'd already posted chapters of the story while still under the impression I wasn't going for a romance side-plot here. It was halfway through writing chapter 19 that I'd paused and started considering the two. "Well, Sorun's this weirdo guy in a terrible situation that'd latch onto pretty much anything for stability, he likes games, she likes games, Sorun's a huge gamer nerd that'd probably be super interested in AIs, she'd probably appreciate hanging around a guy with unique views on AIs, there's a bit of chemistry there, I dunno, let's run with it and see what happens." That was pretty much my thought process during the whole thing. I didn't set anything in stone at the time but I kind of pushed things around here and there to test it out and see if it'd work out in future chapters and, uh... yeah, then this happened.

100% it was the latest possible change I could have ever done, and I admit it was a huge risk that even still I'm not completely confident was the right move to make. But it looks to be going great in my eyes and the reviews have had a positive reception towards it, so I guess it's going good? Which if that's the case then I dunno, maybe I cracked how you make a good romance side-plot in stories. You go into the story without planning for a romance and just let it develop if one does. Probably worked here.

And at the end of the day, even if it doesn't work out, the late entry of a romantic interest doesn't really change anything. The story beats are gonna be the exact same, the ending hasn't changed, nothing's really been knocked off course or have had to be re-planned because of this new addition, and honestly it might have even helped in a lot of areas previously in the story. Plus I get to do a couple of fun things later on in regards to this, some of which the people who read the comic probably see coming, and if ya know ya know. But otherwise, yeah. It's a thing now.

Chapter 92

A/N- Alright these questions have kind of piled up and a lot of them are just from guest accounts so we'll just answer 'em here since I can't do it direct.

"What's the deal with the hallucinatory Sorun-double that Sorun sees sometimes?"

I get it's weird that got introduced and Sorun had zero reaction and just rolled with it like it was nothing new, but this is one of those "it'll make sense later when it's retroactively explained" deals. Even then I still haven't completely settled on whether to go with that or just call it a case of "the stress from dying made Sorun slightly cracked in the head".

"Is the Rubrum guy working for you?"

Working for me? Author-person? I don't really give spoilers like that, but in this case I feel it's safe to say, no, I'm not going that meta with it.

"Why is the story called Recursion Error?"

We'll get there. I will say that chapters 11 and 83 both have segments that shift to first person in the perspective of an unnamed character, and in both instances it's the same person. It's the only hint I'll give.

"Lemons?"

Ha ha, no. Never. Absolutely not.

"Are you gonna go to IDW?"

Nah, I'm trying to focus on Archie exclusively.

"Shorts?"

Story's long enough as it is without padding in more filler.

"Will insert character here ever show up?"

Already said I'm not answering questions like this.

"Will insert story event here happen?"

See answer to question above.

Recursion Error

Episode 92- The worst detective that ever detected: that guy

By and large Sorun greatly disliked the diner that Sonic's uncle Chuck ran. Cleverly named Chuck's Diner.

He didn't have anything against the man personally. In that same vein of thinking Sorun didn't really have anything for him, either. Seemed like a good guy but that was pretty much the extent of their relationship: he was some guy Sorun knew and had a couple conversations with in the entire duration he'd been on this planet. That was it.

Normally that'd be the end of it, except for the fact that fast food wasn't really a concept here, so Chuck's Diner was about the closest experience Sorun could get unless he went outside the city to Overlander territory or Station Square. Fine enough, he liked diners anyways, except for the part where he sold those god-awful chili dogs as some sort of grand staple. And Sorun could ignore that if it weren't for the fact the man didn't sell french fries, which made Sorun question the diner's legitimacy.

Could have been worse; at least he didn't have to live in a world completely deprived of fries. That being said nobody in New Mobotropolis sold them, but fortunately he'd found a small little family-owned grocery store in Station Square that sold bags of the things. And they were actually pretty great, much to Sorun's delight. So that problem was solved. Didn't change the fact Chuck's Dinger was a sham as far as Sorun was concerned. And normally this wouldn't be a problem, except for the fact Silver wanted to talk to him about something and wanted to eat out. So here they were eating lunch at what may be the last place Sorun wanted to eat lunch somewhere at.

The milkshakes were pretty banger, though, Sorun'd give Chuck that much.

"You know what astounds me to no end? Almost every single Sonic we ran into during that big multiverse jaunt we did made a reference to eating these things," Sorun said in a voice full of disdain as he looked down at the paper plate containing the offense in question. The dreaded chili dog. Because Silver wanted to try one and Chuck threw in another on the house for Sorun 'cause Chuck was just that swell a guy. "It means his addiction to these things is so strong it transcended universal boundaries. I don't understand it."

Silver stared at Sorun from the other side of the outdoor round table they were sitting in, cancer in a bun in-hand and halfway to his mouth, but he'd froze when he heard Sorun talk. "Sorun, it's just a hotdog," he said, blankly and with a bit of disbelief.

"It's a statement," Sorun denied.

"S-statement? For what?"

"Look, it's simple math," Sorun began. "Sonic likes these things. Ergo I can't be seen eating them because otherwise it associates me with him, because the guy's so popular everyone knows he has an addiction to these things. He hogged a whole category of food, don't you see that?"

"... What is this conversation? What does any of this even mean, Sorun?"

"Look, I just don't like them, alright?" Sorun said as he pushed the chili dog towards Silver. "More'n that I actually just don't like how they taste."

"Well, I think you're crazy, 'cause these things are great," Silver proclaimed. He ate the hotdog, much to Sorun's disgust. And he even seemed like he was enjoying it, which was even more sickening to his eyes. There had to be something going on with Mobian hedgehog tastebuds that was different from everyone else; there just had to be. Sorun wouldn't except any other answer. "Hey, where does the meat for these things come from, anyway?" Silver asked after swallowing that thing.

"Silver, I've been asking myself that question ever since I got here," Sorun honestly answered. He held his hand out, extending three fingers while counting down and tapping them with the finger on the other hand. "I've got it narrowed down to it either being cloned meat, synthetic, plant-based meat, or there's a Mobini meat industry I'm unaware of and somehow haven't noticed yet. Don't really see how that last one's possible; there's not a meat processing plant anywhere and there's not really a whole lotta foot traffic coming through the city for it to be delivered, and this was true for Knothole, too, so either Chuck is personally going out into the woods to hunt and bring Mobini back to turn them into hotdogs or something's up."

"You really think so?"

"Here's the thing: I know back in Knothole Rotor and a few other Mobians used to set traps in a nearby river for fish. There's still a few people that do that here, I think. I know for a fact Mobians eating Mobini is a real thing, it has to be if they eat wild fish, but I haven't seen it . But the meat's gotta come from somewhere," Sorun reasoned in a somewhat lost, confused tone. "So either I've just missed it this whole time or it's fake meat. Or, I dunno, maybe Mobians are just cannibals." He glanced up at Silver. "Did you ever eat any other Mobians for survival in your time, Silver? Honest question."

"No!" With how appalled and shocked Silver looked he had to be telling the truth. "I never even saw any other Mobians other than Master and Edmund! And even then I wouldn't have! I ate fish and vegetables and fruit, and whatever else Master ever made!"

"Alright, fair enough." Back to square one. Sorun hummed, holding his chin in thought, but after a few more seconds he sighed and threw his hands up in defeat. "Eh, whatever, it's too hard a mystery for me to bother. I give up."

Silver reared back in his seat in surprise. "You're giving up just like that!? We could just ask someone!"

"Man, I got enough mysteries to worry about. How Tails uses his tails like a helicopter without wringing the flesh and twisting them right off, the mysterious red guy, where Amy keeps her hammer. I suspect magic hammerspace because it's punny and something this world would totally do just to irritate me."

"Whoa, wait, back up a bit," Silver requested, shaking his hands at Sorun. "'Mysterious red guy?' What's up with that?"

"Oh, yeah, there's a weird guy dressed in red running around that Shadow told me about that knows impossible information." Sorun's lips thinned in thought. He clasped his hands and glanced down in thought. "Come to think of it, Sonic in the future said that by now that guy killed Eggman. That should have happened by now, but it didn't, which... makes me suspect that whoever that guy is he's aware of the time stuff I did if he was able to choose not to do it this time. He set up that last Chaos Emerald for me to get, too, according to Shadow, so... I kinda wonder if he set up other stuff. Hm."

Silver stared. "Sorun, this sounds like the most important thing you've told me so far. Why am I only hearing this now?"

"Because I'm retired, man, and I just don't care," Sorun breathed out as he leaned back tiredly in his seat. "I mean, should I be concerned some weirdo's running around doing stuff behind the scenes? Probably, man, but it's just not my business anymore and I don't wanna think about it. I'm a courier. I only wanna worry about courier things. Everyone else can deal with it if it ever becomes a problem."

"That's..." Silver sighed, and began rubbing at his eyes. "Okay, if you say so. I doubt some guy you've never even met is the traitor so I'll just ignore that for now."

There was a loud slap! sound as Sorun palmed his own face. "You're still going on about the traitor thing?"

"According to the journal-"

"Oh, the journal, the most credible piece of information this universe has ever seen," Sorun dryly remarked. He was given a flat glare by Silver as he slid back in the chair, raising his arms in the air while shouting, "Lawd, praise be! Praise be the all-knowing journal in its vague and uninformative glory!"

"Sorun, this is serious!"

"And I seriously refuse to entertain the notion one of the Freedom Fighters is a traitor," Sorun replied in a serious tone as he pulled the chair back up to the table. "I'll buy brainwashing or evil clone, but not one of them actually betraying everyone else. But brainwashing or an evil clone is more a spontaneous thing we'll just have to react to instead of something we can prepare for. And by we I mean you. 'Cause I'm not actually fighting when push comes to shove."

"Yeah, I know." Silver crossed his arms with a disgruntled expression. "Nicole asked me to try and convince you to sit out the heavy stuff like this."

"She would," Sorun muttered off to the side before turning back to Silver. "Well, I don't need much convincing. But, uh, you know, it's not like I'm leavin' you out to dry or anything. I'll be there. You know... on the sidelines. Offering moral support." He gently waved his right hand back and forth. "Wave a li'l flag that says 'Go Silver!' if I find one."

Silver chuckled a bit. "Well, thanks for that." His face turned serious. "But with something this big I don't want to just 'react' to it, Sorun. We need to be sure and get on this right now. There's too much at stake."

Waving a hand, Sorun said, "Sure, but you have absolutely zero starting points on this. There's no leads. There's nothing. How're you gonna 'get on' nothing?"

"Sure there's a starting point. The Freedom Fighters."

"Eh?"

"We ask them," he elaborated at Sorun's confusion. "You know, like, um, like a detective! We ask them all about this and, hey, if one of them really is the traitor maybe they'll slip up and we'll learn something! And I know," he said quickly when he saw Sorun open his mouth, "I know we've been keeping the traitor quiet from the others because you thought telling them wasn't a good idea, but I don't have any other ideas on what to do."

Sorun closed his mouth, and then spoke plainly after a few quiet moments. "... Silver, as much as I wanna go around accusing my friends of wanting to betray everything they stand for, wouldn't you know it I just don't want to go and do that." He breathed in heavily, and while his outward appearance seemed calm and bored he couldn't help but feel a bit irritated and just a tiny bit angry with Silver's assertions. He thought it was a fair enough reaction hearing one of his friends being accused of ending the world with no proof. "It's a stupid plan and you're wrong. Think of something else."

"But Sorun-!"

The anger rose up a bit as Sorun leaned across the table. "Okay, let's run down the list since you're so insistent on this. Let's play 'which one of my friends wants to end the world'." He started counting off his fingers, slamming the digits together so hard a loud smack! sound was heard. Silver jumped in his seat at the noise. "Sonic? Certainly has the power for it, but while that guy irritates me he is, at the same time, quite literally the last guy I would ever expect to end the world. Too pure of heart." Another smack as he slammed his finger down on another finger. "Sally? Don't see it. I swear she loves her people more than she loves herself, so I don't see her rallying an army to roll over the world." Another finger, another smack. "Tails? Sure, I'll admit it, you can never underestimate a genius. I don't think there's a single person in this whole world that'll make that mistake 'cause of Eggman. He could probably actually do it if he set his mind to it, but the problem here, Silver, is that I don't know many happy eleven-year-olds with a loving family that wanna end the world ." Every single name listed off by Sorun was punctuated by increasingly loud and meaty smacks on his finger. "Rotor? Same boat as Tails, but he's a crippled politician now, not an evil mastermind. Amy? What's a girl with a hammer gonna do, get real. Bunnie? A single cyborg, c'mon, not a lotta destructive potential there. Antoine? Antoine ? Antoine !?"

That last name was said alongside Sorun slapping his whole hands together in a frenzied manner. Silver was flinching back with each smack, eventually crying out, "Okay, I get it!" when Sorun wouldn't stop doing it. He did so, sighing and leaning back in his seat and then taking a large breath in an attempt to calm himself down. It didn't help all that much.

"My point is," Sorun continued after his breath, "nobody, not a single one of them, is a guilty culprit 'cause there is no guilty culprit, Silver. Not unless it's a evil clone or brainwash situation, which is the third time I've said it in this conversation alone but for some reason you're refusing to see it that way."

"I'm not leaving the possibility out," he denied, "I'm... look, the wording in that journal was really specific, okay? I'm not saying you're wrong; I'm just saying something like that wasn't mentioned and I really feel like it would have been if that was the case." Silver sat back in his own seat, arms crossed and eyes furrowed in concentration. "And you left out Nicole," he noted.

There was utter silence between the pair of them. Silver kept staring on silently, while a surprised looked bloomed on Sorun's stunned face, not believing he just heard Silver say that. The kind of stunned silence where one just sat there wondering if they really had just heard what they just heard with an almost dazed expression.

And then he started laughing. A low, dry laugh with no amusement behind it, with Sorun covering his incredibly small smile with his left hand while bowing his head forwards and shaking it. The combination of his fingers covering his face and hair obscuring him hid his eyes briefly flickering between blue and green colors through the laughter. Silver himself began shuffling around in an uncomfortable manner on his seat, looking half frustrated at Sorun and half concerned at his behavior.

In an instant, it all stopped. Sorun's head straightened up completely with a flat, unamused expression, blue eyes glaring into Silver's yellow. His hand flopped back down to his side. When Sorun spoke he sounded more than a bit miffed, with no indication he'd just been laughing.

"Silver, buddy, I like you. I really do. But you really can't go around trying to accuse someone's girlfriend of wanting to end the world. People don't appreciate things like that."

"Sorun, you know I don't want to." There was an intensity in Sorun's gaze that made Silver avert his own eyes away from him. He didn't want it to show on the outside how much it unsettled him; how quickly Sorun shifted from one mood to the next with no warning or indication. He'd never seen Sorun wear such a cold expression but it unnerved him greatly. "It's the end of the world here. You saw what it's like in the future. I'm trying to make it so that billions of people don't die and you're acting so... so... dismissal of it when I'm just trying to do my best," he said in a frustrated tone. "I only have one shot at this, so sorry if I'm just trying to be sure here."

Tentatively, Silver looked back at Sorun. He was still glaring at him coldly, but then he'd sighed, and just like that, like someone snapping their fingers, he turned back to his normal, bored expression and lazily laid back in his chair. "There's still the whole red eyes thing. Which gives even more credence to my clone or brainwashing theory. Since nobody in the Freedom Fighters have red eyes."

"Yeah, true," Silver admitted, settling in easier to his seat. "Kind of wish we'd brought that journal with us; we really could have used a third set of eyes."

"Oh, yeah." Sorun perked up a bit in realization. "What happened with that?"

"I left it where I found it before we left the future."

Oh, cool, their one piece of physical evidence. Lost to them forever. Sorun rolled his head up at the sky. "Well, that was shortsighted of you."

Silver huffed a frustrated breath. "Yeah, I know, Sorun, but that's part of why I need to go around asking people about the traitor because I got nothing else , okay?"

"... You're gonna get punched in the face, dude, I swear," Sorun sighed out, rubbing a hand over his face. "Which is impressive because I really thought nobody could... eh, Sally would," Sorun mumbled out, absentmindedly holding a hand to his cheek while glancing away. "I wouldn't bug her with this. Really don't bug anyone with this but especially not her."

"Kinda have to bug everyone with this, Sorun."

"Then it's been nice knowing your face." Sorun rolled his head back down to look past Silver's shoulder. He saw a blotch of familiar color at another table at the other end of the area full of tables in front of the diner, with the owner of that color seemingly eating lunch. She didn't seem to have noticed them, too focused on the food in front of her. "Hey, look, there's your first victim over there, Amy," Sorun pointed out, making Silver turn around. "Bubbly, cute as a button, will actually assault you if you go through with this. Go get 'er!"

He'd said that last part with a burst of mock joy while pumping his closed fists up and down. It didn't seem to encourage Silver in the slightest, who turned back to Sorun with a very hesitant, bordering-on-scared, look.

"You'll help me out, though, right?"

"Pfft. As if. I'm not shooting my social status in the foot with this," Sorun scoffed out. He waved a hand in Amy's direction. "But please, by all means. Go! Detect away!"

Silver didn't depart with a goodbye of any kind. He merely stood up out of the chair, shaking his head while mumbling something under his breath as he turned around to approach Amy. Sorun watched them converse briefly from a distance. And then he saw Amy get upset at something Silver said. And with a completely straight and unflappable expression Sorun watched as Amy got out of her chair, physically picked Silver up, and carried him all the way towards the trashcan that just happened to be nearby where Sorun was sitting. And then she slam dunked Silver into the trashcan.

"RUDE!" Amy screamed out at the trashcan. And then she kicked it, causing it to tip over and for Silver and a bunch of trash to spill out. She huffed, crossing her arms and turning towards Sorun's with with a displeased look. "I don't know why you're friends with that guy, Sorun," she muttered out as she angrily stomped away.

"Nice seein' you, too, Amy," Sorun called out as he waved at her back. And then he looked down at Silver, lying flat on the ground and with his face pressed against it in misery. "Man, you're really lucky. I thought for sure she was gonna hit you with the hammer. I'm pretty sure she can swing that thing faster than you can think."

With the rest of his body motionless, Silver picked his head up off the ground to look at Sorun, trash falling off his head. "You could help out, you know!" he yelled out.

"..." Sorun grabbed the milkshake sitting next to him and drank out through the straw. "And deprive you of this educational experience?" he asked, sitting the shake back down. "You wanna go to the castle now since you're dead-set on continuing this folly?"

"Why? Who's at the castle?"

"I think Sally lives there." Sorun's expression became a bit clouded. "She lives there, right? Yeah, she lives there. Right." He focused back on Silver, who was giving him an odd look. "Also Elias invited me to lunch and the only thing I had here was a milkshake. I'm starving. So we might as well kill two birds with one stone."

"Uh... alright," he said, pushing up off the ground and standing up, brushing some of the loose trash off of him. "So we're going to talk to her?"

Sorun shook his head. " You're going to talk to her, against my strong recommendations. Alternatively we could just go home and avoid all this foolishness once I'm done with lunch. Play some video games. I'll make some french fries, how about that?"

"Sorun. I have to do this." It would have been easier to take that steely expression of Silver's more seriously if he still didn't have some loose trash clinging to him.

Sensing the hedgehog's resolve and realizing his totally right argument was being ignored, Sorun sighed and pushed himself out from his chair. "Alright, but we're gonna need to stop for some ice along the way."

It was somewhat of a mystery to Sorun's eyes why Elias considered him a friend. They talked sometimes. Sometimes Elias even went out of his way to talk to Sorun. And while that surely rose their relationship just slightly above the level of mutual acquaintances, Sorun still found it odd, because he would have considered being a king and having a wife and step-kid before he was even twenty-five was already a lot on his plate. Somehow he found enough free time to squeeze Sorun in between all that.

Maybe it was all that personal introspection he'd done with Elias during Sorun's low points. Something that might have enkindled some sense of friendship in Elias' eyes when, to Sorun, it was just him venting and indulging in Elias' whims whenever he wanted to talk. Or maybe he just didn't have a lot of guy friends; Sorun certainly never saw any. Then again he didn't exactly follow the guy around, so who knew?

Either way free food was free food, and Elias was easy to tease, so Sorun went with it. And it was an excuse to get Silver to Sally. More importantly it was an excuse to get him there while Sorun could be in an entirely separate room from what was undoubtably a disaster in progress, but hey, that was Silver's problem, not Sorun's.

"Oh, my. Inviting me for lunch, Elias? Again?" It wasn't even in the castle's dining room; it was on a balcony outcropping from one of the castle's rooms that gave them a view of the city. It was all the more ammunition for Sorun to use, his body having been turned away, a hand covering his mouth in feigned embarrassment. "I truly appreciate the gesture, Elias, but we really must stop meeting like this. We're already in established relationships. What would Nicole think? Or your wife? Scandalous."

On the other side of the table Elias made a strained chuckle that sounded both nervous and weary. "Ah, yes, Sorun, that... that joke surely hasn't grown old yet. I can hardly see how a simple rendezvous between friends can be construed as anything other than us having lunch together."

It would have been easy to point out the venue they were currently eating at, all alone like this, and the fact he used the word "rendezvous", but Sorun decided he'd tortured the poor guy enough and dropped it, turning back to Elias while draping his arm over the velvet-lined chair that probably cost more than Honey paid him in a year. "Hey, what's a little teasing between friends?" he lightly remarked.

Elias made a withering sigh, but still smiled all the same. "And even after I had the cook specifically put enough sugar in your tea that I'm confident I could have just bought maple syrup and you wouldn't have noticed. Just for you," he lamented, eyes focusing down on the cup sitting in front of Sorun. "I still can't comprehend how you stand to drink such a thing."

"I mean, hey, if it can't disintegrate your teeth then what's the point?"

"... I worry for your health sometimes, Sorun." The worst part was Elias sounded sincere when he said that.

"'S fine, I got a magic rock back home that regenerates me if I want. So, you know, really hoping I never need my wisdom teeth taken out. 'Cause they'll grow back if I use that again." Sorun absentmindedly tapped the table. "Lotta... lotta stuff grew back with the white hair I had. Some of which I'm too embarrassed to talk about."

"Okay?" Elias shot him a confused look, but then quickly shook it off and gestured to the small item sitting on the table next to Sorun. "And what purpose does an ice pack serve?"

"Oh, I need that for later."

"Why, pray tell?" He only sounded a little worried.

"Eh, don't worry about it."

Elias' confusion didn't fade at all, though he made a bemused chuckle and shook his head. "You're so confusing sometimes, Sorun," he said, looking down and poking a fork at the plate of whatever was served to them. A lotta green and cuts of meat that Sorun had no idea of its origin and was even more confused on where it came from in the first place. He remembered hearing the meal's name but it was one of those fancy names he was pretty sure was made up and he forgot it instantly.

Meat was good, though. If only he knew where the hell it came from.

"Well, in any event I just wanted to check in on you," Elias informed him. "I hear you've settled in well."

"You hear things about me, huh?" Sorun commented.

"You are a direct friend of my sister. And one of the council members," he reminded him.

"Fair," Sorun conceded. "But ain't this still a bit much? Inviting me out like this? You could've just popped by my house and said 'hi' or something."

Elias made a pensive face. "Perhaps, but I don't have many friends outside of family I get to do this often with. If I made you uncomfortable in any way-"

"Nah, nah, it's... it's nice, this is nice." Alright, maybe Sorun read too far into thinking there was something wrong with inviting someone to lunch. He'd made worse mistakes. "I'm just not really used to this. Things like this. Nobody ever invited me to things before." He drank the syrupy concoction in a cup near him. It calmed his nerves down more than he thought it would.

"Oh!" Elias' ears perked up and he made an understanding hum. "But, you have been doing well, correct?"

"Oh, yeah, totally," Sorun told him, finally feeling comfortable to talk about something. Because when was talking about how his life wasn't in shambles anymore not great? "The house is looking great, the job is pretty steady, city's nice, people are nice, french fry supply's secure, relationship's going good..." He had to glance away when a light blush crept on his face. "Place would be paradise if the games from my old home were here. So here's hoping the Steam servers survived the apocalypse if I ever decide to find and rip all the data out of them." He'd probably have to ask Nicole or Tails to make him something that could actually do that. Even then he was still pensive on the idea seeing as there were a lot of games from Earth with a lot of stuff in them he didn't actually want people here to see. And yet he still wanted to play them again. It was a frustrating conundrum.

Elias' eyes blinked a few times, seemingly not understanding what Sorun just said. "Steam... servers?" he replied, sounding unsure. "Your people had servers that stored steam? How does that even work?"

He couldn't help it. He'd been too slow in stifling the laughter before some slipped through, but Sorun hadn't been able to help it. "Y-yeah, man, all the steam was stored on those things."

Elias made a pout. "I feel as if you're laughing at something at my expense but I can't place what."

Just barely managing to contain his laughter, Sorun waved a hand and assured him with, "No, not at all, you're right on the money. Servers full of steam, pft ..."

"Hmf..." The pouty look stayed on Elias' face, and he turned away in light frustration when he wasn't able to understand what Sorun was not-so-subtly laughing at. The pout went away when a somber question seemed to come to him. "So, from the way you phrased all of that... I assume you're planning on returning there eventually?"

Well that killed Sorun's mood really quickly. The laughter died off right there and made Sorun blink in surprise at Elias. Both for posing that question and for looking kind of sad at it. "I mean, uh... been thinking about it, yeah. Not permanently or anything. I just wanted to grab stuff to bring back here."

The explanation made Elias sag in relief and caused a smile to grow, and it made Sorun wonder if the squirrel was actually thinking he was planning on retiring to his dead, barren wasteland of a world. It seemed like an absurd idea but Sorun didn't know how else to explain that look. "What, you thought I wanted to move back there?"

"Oh, not at all!" Elias instantly denied, shaking his head. "I care for the wellbeing of every citizen here, physical or otherwise, so when you said you wanted to return I thought you hadn't yet, well... adjusted, as it were..."

Ah. Yeah, Sorun would be tripping up on his words, too, if he were trying this. "I think it's more one of those things you learn to live with than get over. But everyone's been helping me with that. Things are fine now." He tried his best to put some levity into the situation by giving Elias a small, reassuring grin. "Not like I was going there for a funeral dirge or anything. Just wanted some cool stuff. Or at least to see if my old PC is still there, 'cause I got a lot of Steam stuff in there..."

"Ah, okay. That's good to hear," Elias said, seemingly happy with the response, or that Sorun seemed to be doing well. And then he'd put on a questioning frown. "But answer me honestly, because I'm struggling to wrap my head around why you keep mentioning steam. Do you mean to say you had steam-powered computers?"

Nope, that'd been the last straw. Sorun couldn't control it when he burst out laughing, keeling over on the table while banging it with his fist. This only seemed to send Elias into deeper distress, because for whatever reason he seemed desperate to unravel the mystery of what Steam was.

"Sorun, I'm serious! What is it!?" Elias asked in a playful whine. Sorun wasn't even sure he wanted to tell him if it made him to continue to give hilarious guesses like that. "It's a simple question, you could at least be courteous and answer! I had lunch brought to you! Sorun!"

"Ah-ha-ha! Y-yeah," Sorun laughed out, tears prickling the edges of his eyes as he waved a finger around in a circle. "My computer was steam-powered and there was a little hamster that ran around on a wheel to boost the power. I had to dangle a nut on a little string every time I wanted to use it."

The best part was he bought it. For like a single second Elias' eyes shone in wonder before his expression darkened upon seeing Sorun laugh even harder at it. "That's not true at all! Sorun, tell me! I'm your king, I order you!"

"You can't order me!" Sorun laughed out. "I'm technically more royal than you!"

Elias sputtered out at that. "Th-that's preposterous! How!? In what way!?"

"Ahhh, think about it, Elias." The laughter calmed down as Sorun's smile turned sly. "I'm the sole surviving member of the dominant species on the planet I'm from. And seeing as humans were the only sapient species able to lay claim, that, by default, puts me as the inheritor of the whole planet." He leaned back to look out at the city view. "Your territory consists of, what, this city and everything the forest touches? 'Bout half of what the US used to inhabit? I got a whole planet's worth of land and ocean, buddy. If you really think about it I conquered more land than Eggman ever did and I didn't even have to lift a finger."

For the first second Elias sat there, looking absolutely baffled at the claim. In the next second the baffled expression was replaced by a smug look, which instantly had Sorun wary. "I hardly think there are many who will put stock in a vast amount of land you solely have access to, Sorun."

The smile dropped off Sorun's face when he realized Elias was right. "Wait, hold on, I didn't think this through-"

"Furthermore," he continued, a sly smile growing on his face that mimicked the one Sorun had a minute prior, "you signed off any rights of ruling on sovereign authority when you decided to live here and pay taxes to the Republic. It's a sign of fealty."

"That's a rule ?"

"Last but not least... those lands of yours have no people in them. And I hardly think anyone will pledge themselves to somebody who carries packages around for a living."

It was a statement said in jest, but it still made Sorun blow out in a petulant manner and sit back in his chair, arms crossed. "Alright, fine, I don't have any people or actual authority. I still got resources and stuff over there," he bitterly mumbled.

"Which, again, people would have to go through you just to access. And nobody is particularly hurting for resources at the moment." A small frown formed on Elias' face. "Which... actually begs the question, now that I think about it. Can you actually access your old home using that sword?" he asked. "I was lead to believe it was notoriously difficult. The others needed all seven Chaos Emeralds just to briefly open an entranceway there."

"I think I can?" The way Sorun said that and the way he was looking down in thought didn't make it seem that he was so sure, because in reality he wasn't. "I haven't actually tested it. Been, um... too nervous to."

"Well if you don't even know-"

"I've..." Sorun cut himself off with a deep sigh, and then looked back up at Elias. "I just haven't had much reason to work up the nerve. Things here have just been working out so well, you know? Job, relationship, other things. I took up reading again."

The squirrel perked up, looking genuinely happy at that. "Oh, that's good!"

"Yeah, but going back there? Uh, I might. One day. Still deciding."

Elias nodded. "That's quite understandable. I don't think you should be pressured by-"

A knock on the faraway door to the room was heard, making Elias straighten and Sorun to twitch his eyes to the door. "Ah, sorry about that," Elias quickly apologized as he sat up from the table. "There was a, er, issue earlier this morning and we lost a lot of paperwork. Some of the councilors said they'd come by later on with some documents I need to re-sign."

Sorun blinked in curiosity. "What happened?"

"Councilman Rotor decided the paper shredder was 'running too slow' and elected to modify it for our convenience." Elias' eyes squinted into a displeased look as he excused himself from the table. "On an unrelated note we no longer have a paper shredder. The guards had to destroy the last one after they caught it."

"W-what?"

"Speaking of which I would very much consider it a personal favor if you procured a new paper shredder for us the next time you go to Station Square, Sorun. I'd reimburse you, of course."

"Sure...?" That seemed to be the end of the matter as Elias had left the table and went to the door. Sorun was barely managing on running through the words Elias said to him and decided halfway through that he was better off not looking into it. And it was right at that moment Elias decided to return back to the table with a somewhat embarrassed smile on his face. "Yes?"

"Right, hello, Sorun. Um, somewhat of a bluster on my part, I didn't think of bringing a pen to eat and I need to sign these documents.

You wouldn't happen to...?" he trailed off in a hopeful voice. It was hard not to notice Elias was putting a lot of effort towards not looking at the impatient Mobian woman standing behind him with a large sheaf of papers in her hands.

Sorun gave him a regretful look and flopped his hands up. "Sorry, man. Left it at home."

Elias made a hiss. "Okay. Alright, that's quite fine." He glanced over his shoulder towards the back of the room. "I think I might have something lying around here. Miss Prower if you'll just excuse me for a moment..."

"Aw, don't tell me that's Tails' mom." With a remarkable amount of willpower Sorun managed to keep a straight and bored face on as he watched Elias leave him behind to the woman standing on the other side of the table. Lethargically, Sorun turned his head towards her. "Aw, don't tell me he left me alone with her. What if she starts talking?"

He was already worried due to the fact she was dressed more professionally than any other Mobian he'd ever seen. Didn't much look like Tails with the brown fur, auburn and all; really the only relation he saw were the eyes and that she was a fox, too, and even then he only knew she was a fox because of her last name; it being the same as Tails' somewhat cinched that. What really made him worried was, at one point in time in a past conversation, Elias made a comment that she didn't like Sorun so much because he "caused her son stress", as if getting pulled into an alternate dimension wasn't stressful for him. He didn't think the time he threatened to beat her husband's face in with an IV pole for inciting a revolution helped her opinion of him.

Maybe it never came up at dinner.

"Hey." A harmless greeting and a little wave by Sorun. That had to be construed as friendly, right? "We haven't met, I'm Sorun."

"Hello." Sky blue eyes that were the same as her son's were worryingly glaring at him. "Yes, my son spoke of you plenty. As did my husband about a conversation you two once shared."

Damn, it came up. "Um... okay." He clicked his tongue and rapped his fingers against the table. "Pretty tense atmosphere you're projecting there, huh?"

"I wouldn't go that far," she denied. "I would just rather be somewhere else right now that isn't in your direct presence."

Wow, well, if she was going to go right out the gate and say it suddenly Sorun felt a lot less awkward and more... relieved? It was strange to feel that way but at the same time it felt like a breath of fresh air to act honestly when Sorun stopped nervously tapping on the table, shifting his hand into a fist to rest his head against as he matched the fox's glare with a bored stare of his own.

"Don't gotta outright say you don't like me," he teased in a blank tone, face unamused. "What have I ever done to you?"

Her expression subtlety tightened. "Nothing directly. I'm sure you're a very upstanding individual." She sure didn't sound like she believed that. "It doesn't change the fact that, during your first month in this world, my son had trouble sleeping due to the guilt he felt over your circumstances and you constantly reminding him of the matter didn't help."

Sorun breathed in deeply. "Alright, I see," he breathed out, eyebrows raised as he glanced down. "Jerk move of me, yeah. I wasn't in a good state of mind back then." He glanced back up at Rosemary. "You're a good mother, looking after your son like that. Everyone should have a great mother like you. I had a great mother like you. Too bad I was never able to say goodbye to her since, you know, your son kidnapped me in the middle of a grocery store. She'd dead now. Glad Tails has such an upstanding mother to support him, though. Good for him. Really."

The words themselves were friendly, but they were delivered with such a dry, bland tone that they could be construed as anything but. The lack of subtlety was something Rosemary obviously picked up on from the quiet crinkling sound of her fingers digging into the stack of papers she was holding, but otherwise she was keeping up a professional face.

"I found a pen!" The tense silence between the two was broken by Elias, who stepped into the conversation while holding up a pen in a victorious manner. It didn't do anything to break the staring match Sorun and Rosemary were having, making Elias appear visibly nervous as he turned to the fox woman. "If I could just take these, councilwoman..."

It took some tugging, but eventually Elias managed to free the papers from Rosemary's grip. He immediately set to work on setting the papers down on the table so he could sign them. He was working unusually fast as the two continued to glare at one another.

"King Elias," Ms. Prower began in an icy tone, "I have to question the decision to allow a private citizen of the Republic, who, regardless of past affiliations, is not a member of the royal military nor even a Freedom Fighter anymore, to remain in possession of an object of great importance such as a Chaos Emerald when it was agreed such objects of power that can prove to be a danger in the wrong hands were to be guarded under lock and key."

Sorun almost laughed at the audacity. "Would you consider the one I'm currently possessing to be in 'the wrong hands', councilwoman Prower?" Sorun asked her in a tone mixed in sarcasm and innocence.

"I would argue I am reasonably justified in my concerns. You have displayed a multitude of questionable choices that call to question your character, with one of your more egregious actions being to crash my son's beloved airplane on a deserted island in the middle of the ocean while inebriated."

"I believe that was ruled as an accident."

"You're an unstable individual, Mr. Sorun, and I don't believe someone such as you should be the one safeguarding one of the seven Chaos Emeralds."

Elias' scribbling turned noticeably feverish. Sorun's eyes darted to him for a second and then went back to Rosemary.

"Well, that's the thing, ain't it? The one I have isn't one of the 'seven' Emeralds. It's an eighth one I fluked into existence via time travel, so I don't see it as being part of the set since I made it," Sorun argued. "Technically doesn't even exist to people who don't know about it. It's mine."

"Regardless it is identical in both form and function to Chaos Emeralds, and there are many who see those Emeralds as objects of danger due to their potential uses," Rosemary coldly responded. "It's a dangerous item that deserves to be in a vault, not your house."

"Hey, my kitchen sink is very secure, what are you talking about?"

Elias made a small groan and visibly withered at Sorun's remark; Rosemary rankled at it. "King Elias, with respect, surely you agree something as dangerous as a Chaos Emerald needs to be protected for the safety of the people, and not left in the care of him ?" she snapped, gesturing towards Sorun.

The king looked very uncomfortable at the question and bent his body to be closer to the papers he was signing, as if he were attempting to sink into the papers themselves. "I'm rather busy at the moment-"

"You're really doing this?" Sorun asked, utterly ignoring Elias as he spoke to the councilwoman. "Really? Because you don't like me?"

"This isn't about you; it's about the people of New Mobotropolis and every citizen under the protection of the Republic of Acorn."

"And wouldn't you know it, but I just happen to be one of those citizens," Sorun shot back. "And believe it or not I'm financially dependent on that Emerald because of the portal ability my special sword has. I'd argue it's a lifeline to Honey's business because of how lucrative it's been. You're gonna take that away over something as paper-thin as safety?"

"'Paper-thin.'" The way she repeated that almost made her sound disgusted at Sorun. By now Elias was writing so fast Sorun wondered if the signatures would even be legible. "The government is supposed to trust that you , an individual of dubious ability, is capable of protecting the Chaos Emerald from a hypothetical third party that could potentially attempt to take it from you for the purpose of nefarious deeds against the Republic's interests? Especially when you're using that thing to teleport all around the world, well outside of our protection? If, say, Dr. Robotnik or someone under his employ were to move against you, we're to trust you'd handle it appropriately and not lose the Emerald to someone who wants to use it against us?"

"Does he even know I'm alive?"

" Irrelevant , Mr. Sorun. You surely see the issue here."

To be fair, she had a good point. It was actually one of the few things left Sorun was paranoid over: someone attempting to try and take the Chaos Emerald from him. Which, on its own, was a fair enough assessment; things were practically weapons of mass destruction in the hands of people who knew how to use them. He was somewhat confident if someone did try he'd make it out fine, and it wasn't as if he advertised his possession of it outside of the city so chances were low something like that would ever happen, but... well, at the end of the day it was an item that could be stolen very easily from Sorun if he wasn't quick enough, and without powers he was quite possibly the slowest being on the planet. It was something he tried not to think about. The fact he'd gotten so far without issue helped to quell those thoughts. But he would begrudgingly admit having him carry around something as important and dangerous as a Chaos Emerald may be, admittedly, alarming.

But Sorun didn't care. The Emerald was his; it belonged to him and nobody else. It wouldn't even exist if it weren't for him. It was his power. His . Nobody was taking it from him.

When Sorun spoke next, his voice was low and derisive. "Well, councilwoman Prower... if you really want the Chaos Emerald so badly, you're certainly welcome to try and take it from me."

She balked at him. "If you are implying what I think you are implying then I warn you-!"

"Ah, there, done!" Elias frantically announced, haphazardly throwing the pen over his shoulder to the back of the room while holding up the sheaf of papers. He then immediately thrust them into Rosemary's arms, quickly saying, "Councilwoman Prower I understand your concerns, and while they are justified I think Sorun has proved through numerous past valorous actions that he is more than responsible enough to looking after the Chaos Emerald."

The councilwoman took the papers offered, though her angered expression didn't look like she agreed in the slightest. "You cannot seriously-!"

"I would think," Elias interrupted, handing her the papers, "that a bit of trust is warranted after all he's done for us. And it's bad practice to be seizing property without just cause."

Though she accepted the papers, one of Rosemary's eyes was visibly twitching. "We're considering Chaos Emeralds personal property now?"

"It's a special case, Rosemary," Elias sighed out. "Can you please just let it go?"

She opened her mouth, and then closed it, her face set in a deep scowl. She looked like she wanted to argue the point more, but then decided against after making a short sigh. "Thank you for the signatures. Good day to you, Elias." The fox didn't even bother to glance Sorun's way as she turned around to storm out of the room. Neither of them missed how hard the door was closed behind her, with Elias jumping a bit from the loud slam.

"... Well, she seemed nice," Sorun remarked, grinning wryly as he glanced over at Elias. The king made a loud groan and slumped down in the nearest chair, head in his hands as Sorun continued with, "Really an upstanding woman. I can see why people voted for her. Really great scolding voice."

Elias looked up at Sorun, and then groaned at seeing Sorun's grinning face before sinking his own back into his hands. "You enjoy needling people," he accused.

Sorun made a mocking gasp. "I do not ! And even if I did, can you blame me? Humans thrive off conflict. I need it."

"That's not a healthy mindset."

"Well, really, every sapient species needs conflict to avoid stagnation, so if you think about it Mobians aren't an exception-"

"Not a single word you just said excuses you antagonizing her," Elias groaned out as he let his hands slap against the table. "'You're certainly welcome to try and take it?' What did you even mean by that!? Were you planning on actually fighting guards if they were sent to your home to confiscate it!?"

"... Would I be allowed to?"

"No! No you wouldn't!"

"Ah, hm. Oh." Sorun sat back in his seat and rubbed his chin in thought. Would he have actually gone that far? Maybe even go to the lengths of cutting himself and stuffing the Emerald in his body just so he could use Devil's Body to fight them off? Tenable idea, except for the fact it'd probably get him thrown in jail. Or kicked out of the city. And with that realization Sorun made a sigh and the grin dropped off his face. "On second thought if you'da just asked Nicole to demand it off me I'd've given it up," he answered truthfully.

Elias looked a bit relieved at that. Not much, but a little. "It's admittedly a bit of a hot topic, you and that Chaos Emerald, Sorun."

"Oh, don't tell you people have debates over it," Sorun groaned out.

"It's a somewhat touchy subject between the councilors. Myself and councilors Chuck and Rotor try to speak in favor of you. Councilor Prower... well, you just heard her stance on the matter. And the other three councilors are otherwise indifferent on the subject," Elias informed him. "It's not an issue I would take too seriously, Sorun. Though, since we're already discussing your use of that Emerald..."

"Hm? Oh, no." Sorun could spot the look of someone getting ready to ask someone something a mile away. "No no no, Elias, do not tell me you dragged me all the way to lunch just to ask me to do favors for you using Yamato."

To his credit the king looked a bit offended at the insinuation. "No, of course not! Why, to even suggest I had some ulterior motive beyond just inviting a friend out to lunch... I'm almost hurt by the notion." Elias darted his eyes to the side and turned away a bit. "That being said the Republic is a major world power and we are required to keep in constant communication with the other world powers, namely the president of Station Square and the Overlander representatives. Usually video conferences are suitable enough but now and again there are official documents that need to be physically delivered all around. And the normal couriers try to be expedient, but, quite honestly, a large majority of the time matters get stalled because of how long those papers take to get to others and we've been looking for a quicker means." His face wrinkled a bit. "And a less expensive one."

Sorun tilted his head back in surprise. "Okay, seriously, how much are those couriers charging that both you and Honey are complaining about them?"

"A bloody fortune," Elias muttered out in contempt, shaking his head and then looking at Sorun. "I don't blame them since they're quite literally carrying packages past whole continents, but... well... you're here."

"I already got a job," Sorun protested, raising his hands up. "Honey'll kill me if I quit. I'm too convenient."

"That's a bit of a morbid jest-"

"'Cause it ain't one!"

Elias momentarily winced at the shrill cry. "Truth or not, I'm not asking you to quit your job! Just to take five minutes out of your day to teleport somewhere to deliver important documents to foreign government officials!"

The offer calmed Sorun down somewhat, and he lowered his hands. "Okay, so... once in a while I just get a letter from you in the mail and I gotta take it somewhere? That it?"

Elias shook his head. "Oh, no, these aren't the type of papers I can simply mail. They'd be hand-delivered to you by a guard."

"Dude..." Sorun groaned out, rubbing at his face.

"You'd be doing your Republic a valuable service," Elias attempted, flashing Sorun with a winning smile full of bright teeth. And damn him and his charisma, but it was working because Sorun was starting to consider it. "More than that it makes you look favorable to the councilors, who would think twice of wanting to confiscate your Emerald if it meant being deprived of a useful service."

He had a strong point, and Sorun liked it. "But I'd get paid too, right?"

The winning smile Elias wore withered greatly. "W-well, Sorun, considering the extremely minimal amount of invested time and effort on your part I'm not sure such a service constitutes-"

"But I'd get paid too, right?"

"You'd... yes, I'd send you a small remittance for services rendered," Elias sighed out, slumping a bit in his chair. "I assume that's a yes, then?"

"Yeah, sure, I'll help you guys out from time to time." If it got Tails' mom off his back about the Chaos Emerald so he'd stop worrying about it then Sorun was all for it. Elias had reached out for a handshake - Sorun responded by gently slapping his palm with the back of his hand, and then the back of his hand with his palm, and then wiggled his fingers in a mystical manner as Sorun pulled his own hand back. The human got up from the table with a victorious grin. Elias remained rooted to the spot, staring at his own hand in a bewildered manner.

"Is... I was going for a handshake, Sorun, not... whatever that was," Elias told him. He couldn't stop looking at his own hand.

Swiping up the icepack from the table, Sorun said, "It's a common traditional handshake on Earth."

"I don't believe you," he whispered out, focusing on his own hand like his life depended on it. To be fair to Elias he was right, Sorun did make that up, but he had no way of knowing that.

"Mm. Well, anyways, thanks for lunch and the side gig. Nice talkin' with ya." The king was still looking at his hand by the time Sorun began walking his way towards the door, waving at Elias as he left. He'd only managed a sort of half-wave back at Sorun because he was so focused on trying to figure out what kind of handshake Sorun gave him like it was the most important puzzle in his life. It got to the point that halfway out the door Sorun was looking at Elias in confusion and wondering why he was putting so much thought into an unconventional handshake he made to have a bit of fun with Elias.

Mobian culture, fixation on handshakes, he didn't know, whatever, he was out.

Shrugging, Sorun exited the room and closed the door right behind him... only to then be met with Silver in the hallway, who seemed to have been waiting for him. He had a somewhat forlorn expression on his face. Might've had something to do with the large, red handprint throbbing on his face.

Automatically, Sorun offered him the icepack he was holding. "I tried to warn you, man," he told him as the white hedgehog accepted the ice.

"Thanks," he mumbled out, pressing the ice pack to his face. "... Sorun, it's melted."

"Yeah, I was wondering why it felt like I was holding a bag of water." Silver didn't look amused. "Man, what do you want from me? I bought that a while ago."

"Ugh, I know. Thanks anyways." Silver lowered the ice pack off his face, but then winced and put it back on the angry hand mark. Probably figured it was at least cold enough to help with it somewhat.

"So it didn't go well with Sally?" Sorun guessed.

Silver sighed. "No. I talked to her and then she yelled at me. And hit me. And then yelled some more," he lamented. "She's not a very nice person."

"Aw, don't say that. She's super sweet to her friends," Sorun denied with a wave of his hand. "And to every single person who lives in the Republic. And total strangers who seem alright. Really she's nice to everyone not trying to kill her. Man, you must have made a terrible impression, huh?"

"I don't feel like this is very constructive, Sorun."

"I disagree."

"Disa- you're barely taking this seriously!"

That wasn't true at all: Sorun wasn't taking this seriously in any amount. Of course he didn't say that to Silver's face to avoid is ire. In Sorun's defense it was hard to get onto the idea one of his friends was trying to do something as insidious as end the world, and he was pretty sure his brainwash/clone theory was dead-on. But for some reason, some unexplainable reason Sorun just couldn't figure out, Silver was barely considering that idea and was stuck on this traitor thing. Maybe because that journal specifically had the word "traitor" in it, which wasn't really a word that applied to brainwashed/cloned people. Unless it was taken out of context. Or any other number of things, which Sorun couldn't say for certain because he hadn't read the damn journal and he couldn't go get it to fact-check Silver.

And he got it, he really did. Fate of the world and all that. He didn't blame Silver going to these lengths. Except he could because he wasn't getting anywhere and Sorun warned him how bad an idea this was. But even if it meant the slightest possible iota of forwards progress Silver was apparently willing to go to all sorts of lengths just to get that much closer to solving the problem. Maybe there was a way to work around that - be constructive, like Silver suggested.

"Silver, hear me out. Maybe... don't randomly accuse good people of plotting crimes," Sorun suggested. "I mean have you considered, man, I dunno... joining the Freedom Fighters just so you could observe them from the inside? Gather evidence, or lack thereof, on the inside, get to know them in a way that would go a lot easier for them than if a stranger just walked up to them saying crazy stuff like what you're doing? For crying out loud, you have TK powers. That's already a better powerset than most of them have. Wouldn't even be hard for you."

To Sorun's great frustration, Silver shook his head. "I don't want to be distracted. Plus, what if me helping out so much derails the natural course of time, throws off what little we already know? Can't risk it."

"I think you're vastly overestimating the Butterfly Effect here," Sorun muttered out with a shake of his head. "Look, Mogul of the future said the end of the world don't even happen for twenty-five years. We have so much time; why are you rushing? Besides the whole I-wanna-meet-my-family thing, which I understand, but twenty-five years , man!"

Again, Silver shook his head. "World ends in twenty-five years, yeah, but the red-eyed traitor that kickstarts it shows up sometime this year. It's what the journal and all the other research I did suggests, and Master agreed."

Sorun sputtered out and threw his hands up. "S-so what, they show up and take a nap for a couple decades before ending the world? Spend twenty-five years building up a power base to end it? Gets sent twenty-five years into the future? Coma? Imprisoned? 'Cause future Sonic didn't mention any of this happening." Wasn't even clear if there had been a traitor to deal with after Sorun got sealed in the Master Emerald, because he never referenced it. Which made even less sense because then why would there be one in this time? Nothing changed. But there'd been so much happening and so little time maybe Sonic just hadn't seen fit to mention a so-called traitor. Maybe the end of the world was slated to happen but the time anomaly Sorun had to put the kibosh on interrupted it. Too little information.

" I don't know , Sorun, okay, that's as much as we learned!" Silver exclaimed. "We have this amount of information! Okay!? That's all! I'm trying to work with what we've got!"

"But why can't the others help if you told them all this when-!" Sorun stopped dead when Silver grew an apprehensive look mid-sentence. His eyes narrowed. "Silver. How much did you tell them when you gave the Freedom Fighters your whole little debrief thing when you first got here with me?"

Seemingly sensing his growing frustration, Silver grimaced and avoided Sorun's gaze. "The... bare essentials," he admitted, making Sorun's eyes narrow further. "I mentioned the threat and how bad of shape the future is in. Nothing else."

"You didn't tell them the timeframe." Rubbing his hand over his face and through his hair, Sorun made a great groan of frustration and leaned back until his back hit the wall. "Du-u-uude, why!? Why are you doing- you're hiding information now, seriously!?"

"Because I didn't want to tip the traitor off that I knew more than I was letting on!" Silver argued. "They were all there listening to me!"

"But they already know you're looking for them because you decided to go and ANNOUNCE it so what difference does it make if- ugh, ugh forget it!"

Maybe it was Sorun's fault for not seeing it. For assuming that someone who spent their whole life only having social interactions with a walking thesaurus and an old hermit would translate into Silver having something even closely resembling social tact. He certainly couldn't blame Silver; this was just... what he grew up to be, as a result of his environment. And his environment in no way could have ever prepared him for the social-fu it would have taken to play mind games, observe from the shadows, and subtly gather the information he needed to sus out whoever this culprit of his was. He'd already thrown all that out the window with quite possibly the bluntest strategy Silver could have employed to solve this mess.

Hell, these are things Sorun himself wasn't confident he could say he could do, and he was at least cognizant of the concept. With Silver Sorun wasn't even sure the hedgehog knew these kinds of concepts existed, and why would he when he grew up alone in an apocalypse with a single person looking after him?

So yes. Maybe it was Sorun's fault for realizing that, at the end of the day... Silver just wasn't good at this. Terrible, in fact. Just wasn't in his skillset. And maybe Sorun should have seen that and tried steering him just a bit, but he had been, and still was, so skeptical of the traitor idea he just didn't want to entertain it. But now because of that they were in this situation where Silver was making himself look like a paranoid weirdo to everyone else, and that was probably gonna end up being counter-intuitive to his end goal of finding the damn traitor. Which Sorun was sure didn't even exist. And yet the world would end. So there had to be some truth there somewhere.

It was such a stupid situation and Sorun had no idea what he was supposed to do about it. He was supposed to be retired, dammit. Not dealing with this. Not playing spy games with someone so woefully underprepared to be playing spy games they already lost the spy game and thought they were still playing the spy game.

"Maybe we should split up." Case in point. Now Silver was suggesting ideas like this. "We'd cover more ground if-"

"I want you to run that back in your head, and then I want you to remember the part where I told you I wasn't gonna go accusing my friends of being a traitor," Sorun said, back still flat against the wall as he glared up at the ceiling. "It's gonna be a hard no from me."

"Sorun-!"

"We said we were gonna be reactive with this, Silver. That was the plan. That was the strategy devised from all the no-information we have." His head tilted down to look at Silver. "This is a pretty proactive approach you're taking."

"Because I just don't think 'oh, we'll react to it when it happens' is a very reliable plan, Sorun," Silver shot back.

Sorun winced. "It ain't, granted, but-"

"If we get the traitor then they can't somehow end the world in twenty-five years." Silver's voice came out more somber and sad than Sorun like, and it stirred something inside of him that didn't feel good. "We can just cut it off sometime this year. Everything'll be saved and I can go back to the parents and family I was supposed to have." The Mobian looked frustrated as he looked down at his feet. "I know you don't like the idea of the traitor, Sorun, and I'll agree that there's a chance you're right, even if the journal didn't imply it, but... I'm trying my best here, alright? I know I might have messed up in a lot of places but I'm really trying here."

"Why can't shit ever be simple?" He'd be lying if he said he wasn't as concerned about the future and world as much as Silver, but it kept coming back to the concept of a traitor in the Freedom Fighters. Silver was so stuck on the idea he wouldn't move off it and Sorun just didn't believe it. Stick up for his friends and he's leaving behind the one person trying to solve this in the dust. Stick with Silver and... well, yeah, that would involve accusing his friends. Seemed like a loss no matter what he did. "Screw it, I'll play along a bit."

Silver already blew his chances on playing the passive observer, but Sorun was in a prime position to do that. And unlike Silver he actually had subtly and a modicum of social skills. So maybe... he could just say he was investigating the matter but in reality was doing nothing and just watching for anything out of place. And if he did see something off he'd just bring it to Silver's attention.

So basically what he was already doing. Just a whole lot of passive watching.

But hey, Silver didn't have to know that.

"Alright, fine," Sorun sighed out as he pushed off the wall. "I'll 'investigate the matter' if it pleases you so. Gonna come up with a fat lotta nothin', though, just getting that outta the way right now."

Well, that's what he promised, but at the end of the day Sorun just had zero reason to suspect any of his friends, so "investigating" was more "kind of just goofing around talking about whatever". It was arguably the same vein of thought, though. Sorun thought so, anyways.

"You wanna hear about the future?"

Sorun hadn't even been the one to initiate the topic of the future. When they split Silver wanted Sorun to talk to Tails, because apparently he really took the whole "you can't underestimate a genius" thing Sorun offhandedly said to heart and he was somewhat suspicious of him. For no other reason than that. Seemed ridiculous to Sorun but he needed to appease the guy, so off to the fox he went.

He was pretty sure he lived in the hangar at this point, because Sorun barely ever saw the kid anywhere else. To the point going home for dinner probably felt more like a visit to his folks. Between that and going out on life-threatening missions Sorun'd probably be worried in their shoes, but there were others always looking out for him, so Sorun thought it was fine. He'd been at it long enough to be fine on his own anyways.

And... the plane got fixed, it looked like. After Sorun totaled it. He did his best to not even look at the plane when he walked into the hangar just to talk to Tails at Silver's behest. He'd looked up from whatever he'd been working on, smiled, waved, they made some small talk, and then Tails came right out of left field with that question about the future. Sorun didn't really know what he was supposed to talk about, but he for sure knew what topics to avoid. Namely the killing. And threats against his future kids. Should probably leave the Mina thing out, too, 'cause he wasn't risking tempting those butterflies.

"Well, yeah, you went there, right?" Tails asked as he turned back to working on whatever was on the table in front of him. Some sophisticated thingamajig by the looks of it, with an exposed panel leaking wires that the fox was poking around in with a pair of tools. Sorun was sitting on a stool right next to him. "What was it like? You don't talk about it."

For a lot of good reasons, but none of those could be said. He chose not to even bring up the alternate future and skipped straight to armageddon. "Well, I met Silver there, and uh... yeah, looks real bad," Sorun confessed. "Dunno, he's, uh, trying to fix it. But yeah. Can't really say much since most of it was... you know. Rubble."

"Oh." His ears sagged down a bit at hearing that. "I was just wondering 'cause I figured the tech a few centuries ahead would look pretty wild, but... yeah, you're right." A few electrical sparks jumped out of the thingy Tails was working on. "I'm glad you made it back though," he added, giving Sorun a smile. "I know you had it really rough for a while there but you look like you're doing good now!"

Sorun rubbed the back of his head and glanced away. "Yeah, things are going great," he agreed. "'Cept with Silver. He's going really ham on this whole 'save the future' mission."

Tails face soured. "Oh, yeah. Him." He turned back to whatever that electronic contraption was. "No offense to him, Sorun, but I don't see how somebody from the future could have so few answers on how to actually save it."

Sorun couldn't refute that. "Silver means well," he carefully said. "He's just... not really going about it that well. Because apparently he thinks that one of the Freedom Fighters is the threat he mentioned and thinks it's one of you."

There were a few sparks that came out of the device that came when Tails sharply twisted his wrist, like the news Sorun gave him was so startling he'd done it on reflex. "He said what ?" he asked, almost sounding scornful as he turned Sorun's way.

"I know, right? It's crazy," Sorun scoffed out, rolling his eyes. He was glad to see his statement caused Tails to grow a relieved look. "I tried telling the guy there's no way any one of you would wanna end the world. Be another matter entirely if one of you were brainwashed or cloned. Would explain the whole 'the traitor has red eyes' thing since stuff like that usually causes that kind of effect. Oh, he said the traitor has red eyes," he added at Tails' confusion.

He nodded, and turned back to the gizmo he was dissecting. There was a rattling sound as Tails poked around its insides with his tools. "Well geez, Sorun, that sounds almost logical," he remarked in a sarcastic tone. "You didn't tell him that?"

"I did, but he's not buying into it so hard. Barely acknowledges it as a distinct possibility," Sorun said. "According to him it doesn't really line up with the wording of a journal he read of someone who knew what the deal actually was, but I didn't get a peak inside the thing so I don't know what he's talking about. But I can't believe one of you would do something like that." A beat passed. "I mean if you were to go about ending the world how would you even do it?"

"Doubt I could do it if Robotnik couldn't," Tails truthfully admitted, not even bothering to take his attention away from his work. "Kinda doubt anybody could, actually. I mean... through what means? Robotnik tried everything and we always stopped him. I don't think there's anybody in the world who could end it if they tried."

"Psh, I could do it. Easy," Sorun replied in a joking manner.

Tails rolled his eyes. "Yeah, right. How?"

"Just use Yamato to separate the world from the ozone layer and let the sun cook the planet in rads. Kill off all plant life, work up the food chain. Take a while but it'd work."

The quiet rattling sound of Tails' tools stopped. The fox slowly put the tools down on the table, and then swiveled around in his stool to regard Sorun with a cautious look. "Um... your sword can't actually do that, can it?" he asked.

Sorun met his cautious look with a serious gaze of his own... for approximately five seconds, after which he barked out a laugh and shook his head. "Nah, something like the ozone ain't solid enough for me to stab and separate. But I really had you going there," he laughed, making Tails pout and cross his arms in a disgruntled manner.

"Where do you even come up with stuff like that?" Tails grumbled out, looking at least slightly amused, if annoyed, at Sorun's antics.

"Stuff like 'Worm' were really inspirational sources on creative power usage." At seeing Tails' questioning look, Sorun elaborated with, "It was a, uh, book. Yeah. Book."

"Oh. What was it about?"

"It's~a~story~I~can't~talk~about~'cause~you're~too~young~" Sorun chimed out, each musical syllable punctuated with him tapping Tails on the forehead.

"Quit it!" he laughed out, waving his arms in front of him to get Sorun to stop. And then he made a mad sort of pout again. "And I am too old enough! I'm old enough to go on missions with all the other Freedom Fighters but I'm not old enough to hear about a story!?"

"Oh, no, 'Worm' is one of those stories that's firmly in the 'I can't ever talk to anybody about this ever because it's too dark' box," Sorun corrected, though this just made Tails look more confused. "It's in the same box as 'Berserk'. Which... hurts, Tails, not being able to talk about 'Berserk' with anyone here. Almost as much as not seeing how it ends."

With a sigh and a shake of his head, Tails went back to work on the gadget. "I don't really understand how a story could be so dark you won't even talk to anyone about it," he said, "but if that's the case can't you just reinvent it or something? Just change things so it's child-friendly so I can actually hear the stories and understand what you keep referencing?"

"Child-friendly 'Berserk'? Child-friendly 'Berserk' ?" That sounded like blasphemy to even speak. Thinking about it sent Sorun reeling in horror. "Tails, you don't know what you're asking, that's not- alright, fine, let's try," he said, more out of morbid curiosity than anything else. "Our story starts with Gu- Gatsu sounds more friendly, we'll use that. Gatsu was born and... uh, yeah, he was born, that was it. Yep."

Tails glanced to the side to give Sorun an incredulous look. "You have to edit his birth? Seriously?"

"Yes. And after being born Gatsu had a childhood where he did things as a child. And then he grew up," Sorun continued. By this point Tails had shaken his head again once more returned to his work. "And then he met this cool guy and his friends, and they did stuff together! As friends! And then, uh... after that- this is stupid, I give up," Sorun sighed out. "Look, I can't do 'Berserk' dirty like this, Tails. It's like trying to separate moisture from water. The two are intrinsic; it can't be done!"

"I don't even know what you're trying to separate here, Sorun," Tails said, sounding thoroughly uninterested. "Never mind, this story sounds boring."

More blasphemy. Sorun excused it on a foundation of ignorance on Tails' part. Just barely. "Yeah, well, your mom'd try and get me if she found out I was telling you scary stories anyways." He started to gently claw at the air in front of him. "She'd be like one of those really annoying Home Owner's Association people from Earth that'd hit you with every minor infarction in the book and drown you in fines just to annoy you."

One of Tails' ears twitched in annoyance. "She'd never do that! She's way too nice!" He paused. "Wait, did you meet her?"

"Yeah." He really didn't like her. "She seemed like a nice enough lady." He thought about complimenting her on how she seemed competent, but that was the only compliment Sorun could think of and thought it'd sound a bit weird, so he chose to keep it to himself.

Well, then again, she had to at the very least be a decent mother if Tails was singing her praises, and he could respect that. Was probably the only reason Sorun didn't outright hate her - she was a good mother. He could tolerate a lot as long as she held onto that title.

He glanced back at Tails. Looked like he went back to being so absorbed in the thing he was working on he was barely registering Sorun's presence. He knew enough about him that at this point it'd probably be an effort in futility trying to talk to him - more likely he'd just end up bugging the Mobian for interrupting his technological guru flow state or whatever. He got testy when people did that.

"Alright, well, good talk. Seeya later," Sorun sighed out as he spun around and hopped off the stool. There'd been some small sound that left Tails mouth, a murmur that might have possibly been construed as "goodbye", but more than likely he'd just made a noise acknowledging Sorun was leaving. The teen shook his head as a result and walked away towards the hangar exit.

"Wonder if Silver had any luck on his end?"

"So no luck, huh?"

"It's no use, Sorun." It was a sorry state he'd found Silver in when he returned to the house. Flopped onto the couch with an arm and leg hanging off the side wearing a dead, forlorn expression, the aura of sullenness radiating out from him. It was a pathetic-enough looking state to appear pitiable. "It really is no use."

"Well, I coulda told ya that. I did at the onset of this, actually. Multiple times over if I recall," Sorun lightly replied as he sat down at the other end of the couch. "So how bad did it go?"

Silver's head listed off to the side, and he sighed out. "Pretty bad..."

"Um... so I can't just go in and talk with the councilor? You're sure?"

The Mobian clerk sitting on the other side of the check-in desk to the castle lobby regarded Silver with an uncaring, deadpan stare. "No. As I said, councilman Rotor is extremely busy. If you want to make an appointment with him you're gonna have to fill out a 58-B form."

Silver groaned and pinched at his nose. "Okay, fine, so if I fill one of those out then can I go see him? It's important!"

The duck on the other side of the desk shook his head. "No, you misunderstand. A 58-B form is a prerequisite to get your name on the waiting list of people requesting an appointment with the councilor. Once your 58-B form gets approved you're put on the list, and once you're next in line a 35-C form will be mailed to the residence address provided by you in the 58-B form. You'll need to get an approved 35-C form if you want an appointment with the councilor."

"And then can I talk to him!?"

"No, a 35-C just guarantees you a spot to wait in line on the day the councilor is accepting appointments," the duck drawled out. "I'd recommend getting here early on that day. Please bear in mind a spot in line doesn't necessitate you an actual meeting, variable by how his schedule is looking that day and what other matters he's beholden to attend to."

"O-okay, fine, how long does all of that take?"

"Usually about a week to process all the necessary paperwork."

Silver flinched heavily, but then took a breath to steady himself. "Alright, then can I have a 58-B form, please?"

To the hedgehog's frustration, the duck secretary shook his head. "No, sir, you'll need to see the clerk at our Forms & Registrations desk in order to get your hands on a form 58-B."

Silver's nose sucked breath. " Okay . Where do I find that?"

The duck didn't answer him. Instead he reached out to the little triangular plaque on the desk that read 'Front Desk' and turned it over backwards. An indescribable feeling of frustration welled in Silver when he saw 'Forms & Registrations' stamped on the other side.

"Hello and welcome to Castle Acorn's Forms & Registrations desk, how may I assist you?" the duck clerk asked in that same deadpan drawl.

"You- you could have just told me at the beginning that-!" Silver stopped himself, biting his lower lip as he did his best to contain his outburst. "Never mind... Can I please get a-"

"Sorry, sir, but you'll have to take a number before I'm able to help you," the duck interrupted, and then gestured to the strange dispenser item nearby that had a paper ticket stub sticking out of the bottom of it.

Blinking once, Silver turned around, noting how he and the duck were the only two Mobians in the lobby. He processed the empty sight for a single second, and then turned back to the clerk. "There's nobody else here, though," he whined out in protest.

"..." The duck's thousand-yard stare was uncompromising. Unflinching. Still enough that Silver would think him to be a statue if he hadn't heard him speak prior. It was disturbing enough, in fact, that instead of arguing the point Silver just awkwardly shuffled towards the dispenser. He pulled a ticket out, and then shuffled back to the desk before softly putting it down on the desk. "Um, here," he politely said.

Not even blinking, the duck picked up the ticket and read the number. He put the ticket down, and then cried out, "Number twenty-three!" Somehow he still sounded like he was on the brink of exhaustion despite yelling out like that.

Awkwardly, and not sure what else to do, Silver raised his hand. "Hello?"

"Hello and welcome to Castle Acorn's Forms & Registrations desk, how may I assist you?" the duck robotically recited in a voice that was completely identical to the first time he said that.

"You... what..." Silver quickly shook the confusion from his mind and calmly asked, "Can I please get a 58-B form, sir?"

"Certainly, sir, of course. Here you go."

Silver didn't like how, barely a moment after the duck finished speaking, he'd already had the form in hand and slapped it right on the desk in front of Silver. He'd even narrowed his eyes at the act, but then let it go and grabbed the nearby pen chained to the desk as he began filling the form out. Not even thirty seconds in he had a question. "Hey, so I'm staying at a friend's house right now so is it okay if I just write down his addre-?"

"The residency address to the domicile currently being inhabited by the applicant of form 58-B must be provided as stated in the directions outlining that requirement."

"But I don't live here, I don't-"

"Oh, then excuse me one moment." Without missing a beat the paper form was snatched right out from in front of Silver. He'd barely managed to let out a cry of "Hey!" before the duck, before Silver's eyes, shredded the form right then and there. His mouth dropped open, unable to even comprehend the act that had just been perpetrated before him.

"W-why?" he feebly asked once the white hedgehog gathered enough willpower.

The duck readjusted his glasses before speaking. "I'm afraid only citizens are eligible to receive form 58-B. Visiting members of New Mobotropolis require an escort of no less than one guard to accompany them in order to receive form 46-I in order to obtain form 58-B so that form 35-C can be obtained. Foreign dignitaries require no forms in order to seek an audience with the councilors or the king but do require a foreign diplomat visitation badge and express permission from the king." He took a slow, methodical look around and then looked back at Silver. "You have no guard escort."

Why did there have to be so many hoops involved with getting to talk to somebody? It didn't make any sense to Silver; already his patience was thin enough that he wanted to quit right there and just leave. "The future, Silver, think of the future," he mentally reminded himself, steeling his features and regarding the clerk with newfound resolve. "Is there really no other way to see him?"

Humming, the duck suggested, "If you applied for citizenship to New Mobotropolis you would eventually be eligible to receive form 58-B directly."

A smile broke out over Silver's face. "Yes, that's perfect! How do I do that!?"

"Sorry, but I can't help you." The smile dropped off Silver's face. "You'll have to go to the Department of Immigration in order to get that sorted."

Even more hoops than before, but this one Silver could at least understand partially. "Okay," he mumbled out, "so where's that?"

He could literally feel his face twitching in irritation when the duck clerk took the plaque off of his desk, and then reached under that very desk to put a new plaque on top of it. Somehow he wasn't surprised to see 'Department of Immigration' stamped on it.

"Hello and welcome to Castle Acorn's Department of Immigration, how may I assist you?"

"... Can I please apply for citizenship?"

"I'm sorry, sir, but due to a recent dispute with a rogue paper shredder any and all documents relating to citizenship application have ceased to exist. Maintenance staff is currently working to rectify the issue. If you have any further questions you'll have to ask them."

Silver groaned. "Okay, fine, then where's the nearest maintenance person that- no, come on don't, please- agh, come on!" he yelled out when, once again, the duck flipped the plaque around so it now read 'Maintenance Manager'.

"Hello and welcome to Castle Acorn's Maintenance Management desk, how may I assist you?"

"How many jobs do you have!?" Silver screamed out. "No, you know what!? Forget it! Can you please just tell me how long it'll take to fix whatever went wrong so that-!?"

Before Silver could continue the duck slid a new sign in the center of the desk that simply had the word 'closed' printed on it. "I'm sorry, sir, but I'm on lunch. Please return later if you have any additional questions."

By that point Silver decided to leave before he accidentally crushed that desk with his mind.

"I mean how many one jobs can a single person even have!?" Silver screamed out in frustration, looking ready to tear his own quills out.

"It doesn't make any sense! And the way he acted, it... rrrgh, he spoke in so many circles for no reason!"

Sorun only needed a moment to recognize the person Silver was talking about. "Oh, yeah, I know that guy. That's Dale. He's one of the Mobians that got roboticized for a whole decade 'til that one alien came and fixed all the roboticized Mobians. Rumor has it he was really traumatized from the experience so everyone thinks he works a bunch of jobs to take his mind off it. Elias told me he lets him since he felt bad and needed a bunch of superfluous positions filled that nobody wanted to do."

The explanation served to bring realization to Silver's eyes. And then he grew a sad yet disturbed expression.

"Also he runs the local book club, too," Sorun continued in a completely blasé tone. "I might join it one day. Dunno. Still thinking about it."

A bunch of airy sounds left Silver's mouth that was hanging open. He looked like he wanted to say something, but couldn't find the words. Then he shook his head to get rid of whatever mental picture he seemed to have conjured, and then stopped when his normal expression returned. "Right, anyways, after that I went to talk with Antoine and Bunnie..."

"-and so I really need to talk to you two because this is really important and-"

"Ah'll stop ya right there."

When Sorun first told Silver about Bunnie he said she was one of the nicest people he'd ever met. In hindsight it didn't mean all that much, because according to Sorun everyone in the Freedom Fighters was the nicest person he'd ever met, but after he got slapped by one of those "nice people" for investigating who in their group would eventually turn traitor to end the world he was starting to doubt him.

The "nicest people" he ever met. Nice people didn't throw people in trash cans.

He was hoping Sorun was only slightly wrong and Bunnie was an exception, and when he'd knocked onto the door to her home and she'd opened the door she'd been smiling. So the hope had been there. But then the hope was lost when her eyes took two seconds to recognize Silver, after which the smiling face turning into a wary face.

But he was new and Silver figured a bit of caution was probably warranted, especially after everything he'd said, so he decided to make his case to her in hopes that she would help. And now she was giving him a really cold scowl.

"So what yer sayin' is, ya think one o' us is gonna end the world," she drawled out. "An' ya don't know which one dunnit. So ya suspect ah'm some monster in disguise that wants tah end the whole world. Or one o' mah friends. Or mah husband. Or even the fella who's lettin' ya live in his home."

Silver shook his head. "No, it couldn't be Sorun. He's not a Freedom Fighter anymore."

("Wow, wait," Sorun interrupted while listening to Silver, "you... denied suspecting me but didn't disprove you thinking either she or her husband was a 'monster in disguise that wants to end the world,' Silver? Are you for real?")

("... You think that's why she ended up slamming the door in my face?")

("Gee, man, who knows. Could-coulda been anything, really. I mean, you think so? Could have just interrupted a marital spat between her and Antoine. Can't imagine she'd take offense to that. Being accused of plotting mass murder? Who'd get mad over something like that? Maybe she accidentally burned a pie.")

("I get it, Sorun, I get it...")

(Sorun had doubts Silver actually understood completely, but kept listening regardless.)

The scowl Bunnie was sending Silver became even colder, but for what reason Silver couldn't figure it out. "Not how the rest of us see it, even if he don't fight with us no more."

"Oh. That's, uh... nice of you?" The cold glare didn't subside in the slightest, making Silver nervously gulp. "So can I come in to talk to you and Antoine?"

"No. Get off'a mah lawn."

The answer had come so suddenly and harshly Silver had flinched from it. The mere delivery of it and how bitter the rabbit sounded almost made him shy away, but seeing her close the front door and the knowledge that he was losing his chance managed to keep Silver together. So, slightly alarmed, he jumped forwards and pressed his hand against the door to keep her from closing it.

"Wait, hey, this is really important!" Silver protested. "I know you probably don't want to hear it but I'm serious! One of you-!"

"Get yer hand off the door, friend." He did so, automatically, more because of the dangerous-sounding undertone Bunnie's tone had taken when he stopped her from closing the door. She kept regarding him with that cold look as he stepped back. "Listen', ah get where you're from they probably do things a bit different, but 'round here folks really don't appreciate it if ya start spoutin' nonsense like that 'thout a shred o' proof. 'Specially when ya ain't been here that long."

"You say that like I haven't been researching this for-!"

Bunnie promptly slammed the door in Silver's face before he managed to get another word out.

When Silver had finally gotten around to catching up to Sonic, a feat that was really harder than it ought to have been, he'd explained what the situation actually was to him in the hopes that he'd be of some help. So far it was really feeling like he was in the same mind on the matter as everyone else was, which was attributing to Silver feeling more distressed by the second.

"Alright, lemme get this straight." There was a heavy amount of skepticism on the other hedgehog's face as he leaned back, stretching his arms over his head. He regarded Silver with half-lidded eyes and a small, disinterested frown. "You're convinced one of us is gonna end the world. Even though we're spendin' all our time saving the world. How sure are you about this again?"

"I wouldn't be bringing it up if I wasn't sure, Sonic, and believe me when I say I am pretty sure," Silver stressed out.

"Ah-huh." He didn't look convinced at all. "And, uh, what, what does Sorun have to say about all this?"

"He's... pretty convinced I'm wrong and that it's not one of you, or if it is it's an evil clone or one of you got brainwashed."

"Huh. You know what, that sounds really smart. You should probably listen to the guy." Sonic pivoted around and turned his back to Silver. "Alright, I'm not listenin' to anymore of this. Later-"

"Hey, just listen a second-!"

"No, you listen." When he rounded back at Silver the skeptical look on Sonic's face was replaced by anger. "I've known all these guys practically my whole life. They're friends. They're family. I'd sooner believe Eggman woke up one morning and decided to be a decent person than believe a single one of 'em would ever want to threaten what we've been working our whole lives to save."

Silver slapped his hands against his own chest. "I know, okay, but I, the guy from the future who knows what happened , am telling you that-!"

"Well then tell me who did it."

"Huh?"

"If you're from the future and already know everything then tell me who did it!"

"I don't know who did it!" Silver shouted in frustration. "I wouldn't be here trying to get help if I knew who did it!"

"Then I guess you don't know a whole lot, do you!?" He stomped up to Silver and roughly poked his chest with a finger. "Look, you wanna crash on Sorun's couch and hang around here just to throw a bunch of accusations around at people? Fine, whatever. Do what you want. But I don't care whatever it is you got up to in the future, 'cause I'd bet my life on none of my friends ever doing the things you're saying one did. Which wouldn't be a hard win 'cause you don't even know who did what."

"I-"

"Zip it," Sonic snapped. "I know them, okay? You don't. If something does happen then we'll deal with it like we always do, and you can feel free to help out if that time comes, but I'm not gonna hear this from a guy that's barely been here for a couple weeks. Don't bug me or any of my friends with this again."

After getting the last word out Sonic disappeared, only leaving faint blue speed lines that near-instantaneously faded away into nothing. Silver stuttered out from the sight, having opened his mouth to try and argue the matter with Sonic before he'd sped away, leaving him alone in the middle of the street. Staring forwards at nothing with his mouth hanging out.

"He... he gave me the spare room..."

By the time Silver finished explaining Sorun couldn't help the pity he felt. On the one hand he shouldn't, because he'd warned Silver this was gonna happen. The whole reason he wanted to keep the traitor thing secret was because he saw this outcome coming a mile away, not to mention they were his friends, too, and he was essentially in the same boat as Sonic not thinking it possible any of the Freedom Fighters would turn traitor to end the world of their own consent.

On the other hand Silver was his friend, too, and it left him in the awkward position of having one group of friends hating another friend now because of what he said. The same friend that was probably the only hope for saving the doomed future Sorun had personally seen.

He had a job, dammit, why did he have to deal with this?

"Well, Silver, uh... hm. Yeah." He didn't even have it in him to keep ribbing Silver on his decisions anymore after how today had gone. He just felt plain bad for the guy - Sorun imagined he'd feel as terrible as Silver, too, if he invested a large portion of his life researching in these mythical hero figures and went back in time only for them to yell at him. But then he was reminded of how much it was Silver's fault, and while it lessened the feeling somewhat, he still felt... well, bad for the guy. "So no progress?"

"No. None," Silver sighed out. "Any luck with Tails?"

He could have responded by saying he'd approached Tails in a manner infinitely more tactful than Silver did and walked away without earning any scorn from the fox while simultaneously throwing Silver under the traitor bus the same way he was throwing himself under that very bus. Sorun gave Silver a break and didn't do that. "No."

Silver sunk lower in the couch. "I don't know what I'm supposed to do. How am I supposed to save the future when I don't even know what I'm supposed to do to save it? Who I'm supposed to stop, what I'm gonna prevent?"

"..." After grimacing in sympathy Sorun reached forwards and gently shook Silver's knee. He tried his best to put on a reassuring grin, though his face didn't feel very assuring. "Hey, there's always the original plan. Good ol' wait-and-see."

"What, just wait until the traitor's revealed so I can swoop in and help everyone deal with the problem?" Silver sighed again. "I told you I don't like that plan, Sorun. It doesn't leave us any time to prepare. Just to act. There's a whole lot that can go wrong."

"As opposed to doing what?" Sorun asked. "Nobody believes you, so the Freedom Fighters ain't gonna help. At this point I'm pretty much the only guy in the whole world batting for you, and I don't even believe in the traitor thing. And if you wanted to spend time investigating you blew your chances to get close to any of them after this. Wait-and-see's all you got at this point."

It was probably the cold, hard reality of the situation that pressed Silver deeper into Sorun's couch, who was beginning to become slightly worried one of his quills would cause a rip. "I guess you're right." He sat upwards - Sorun was relieved to find the section of couch he was laying on appeared to be fine. "Nothing to do but keep an eye out. I just really hate the idea, though. Feels like I'm just hoping for the best." He curled his knees against his chest and glanced to the side. "It's really frustrating."

"Yeah, I know." Sorun felt himself awkwardly scratching the back of his head once an awkward silence rose up. "You want those french fries now?"

"Didn't you just have lunch?"

"Ah, I mean... that was a while ago. And there's always time for fries." Sorun sat up off the couch and gave Silver a friendly pat on the shoulder. "C'mon, you'll love them. I found this new brand of ketchup at this one organic store in Station Square and I think you'll really like it, it's got this kind of tang at the end of it that..."

Most of whatever else Sorun said was lost on Silver, since by then he'd gone too far into the kitchen for him to hear him properly. He still found himself feeling more at ease despite it all from hearing it. The friendly voice was a nice reminder he still had one best friend to lean on even if things were looking so bad. So it was with a smile he got up from the couch. "Yeah, Sorun, that'd be great."

A/N- I mean, listen, I try toning down how hard Silver goes on the whole "there's a traitor, hur-dur" thing, but this is the same guy that was straight-up attacking people on nothing more than hunches in the comics. There's only so much I can do with that.

Chapter 93

A/N- Alright, here it is. The obligatory beach episode. Look, see, it's even called that.

Also friendly reminder that canon dates are a bit askew because of the way the story went so if questions about age come up, well, there it is. Story's time is a bit ahead of where it's supposed to be in canon despite some events not happening yet. Don't think about it too much, it isn't really that important.

Last I played a lot of Disco Elysium before this so some of that may have accidentally bled into the writing.

Recursion Error

Episode 93- The beach episode

It was one of those days.

Everybody had "one of those days". Days they didn't recount, days they didn't care to try and keep track of, maybe even dreaded when that day's date was coming up. When that one day did come most people did their best to ignore it. Most managed, others didn't, but at the end of the day one of those days was just a day. It'd pass and then it would go back to being business as usual for those experiencing their day so they could just move on with their life. That was the hope, anyways.

For Sorun it was one of those days. A day he'd made the mistake of going through the effort of keeping track of, after juggling around a calendar to line this world's dates up with Earth's. But it was locked in now, so here he was. Sitting on a park bench in the middle of the park with a bottle of soda clutched in his hand as he stared up at the morning sky.

"Here's to you, you shitty old man. Fuck you." Raising the bottle up to the sky, Sorun slammed it back and drank half the contents right there. Of all the things that managed to be preserved from the old world, thank goodness cola was one of them. He'd shake the hand of that Mobian that rediscovered the coveted drink if he ever found them. Or if they were even still alive.

... Nah, on second thought, that sounded like a lot of work.

Things would be alright. He'd finish the soda, walk somewhere, he didn't know where, just anywhere, carry on with the rest of his day and then tomorrow would get here and he'd get to stop thinking about it. Hopefully he could do all that before Nicole found him. Which would take all of a second if she put actual effort into looking for him. But he liked his odds.

He rose the bottle back to his lips. Yep, it was smooth sailing from here. No need to dwell on-

"Hey Sorun guess whose birthday it is!"

"Blegh!" The precious cola was sprayed out of Sorun's mouth in a fine mist to prevent him from accidentally choking on it in surprise. Past the quickly-fading rainbow formed from the mist he saw Sonic, the culprit responsible for sneaking up on him and startling him, all with that stupid grin plastered on his face. But none of that was important because Sorun was panicking over the words he just heard. "WHAT, WHO, HOW!? WHO TOLD YOU HOW COULD YOU POSSIBLY KNOW!?"

God fucking dammit who leaked it, he never even told anyone he swore to god when he found out who the hell did it he was gonna kill them-

"Uh... well, I've known Sally since I was five," Sonic slowly began, the smirk being swapped out for a confused face. Sorun froze and reflexively sucked his own lips into his mouth. "So she, you know, told me? When she turned six? Along with all our other friends? And we just... sorta remembered? Like normal friends?"

Sorun's lips folded back out of his mouth. "Oh it's Sally's birthday, alright, yeah, good for her. Cool," he rasped out, throat surprisingly dry at the moment. "So she's seventeen now?"

"Eighteen," he corrected.

"Ah. Whole two years older, huh? Ain't you still sixteen?"

Sonic rolled his eyes away from Sorun and crossed his arms. He looked annoyed now. "I mean, we used to be the same age 'til my whole space trip sent me ten months ahead. I come back and suddenly everyone's a year older than I remember."

"Rough." Sorun tipped the glass bottle over and peered through the neck. A single drop of cola dripped out of the empty bottle. "So she got a big party or something planned for you guys?"

Sonic looked back at Sorun, looking a bit surprised. "Uh, us. As in, all of us plus you."

"Could just buy another. Two sodas in one day never killed anyone and it's a special occasion- wait, what?" Blinking a few times, Sorun switched his attention from the bottle to Sonic. "I'm... I'm invited, too?" he asked. "Why?"

"'Cause you're a Freedom Fighter?" The way he said that made Sonic sound more confused than Sorun did at the moment.

"I mean, not really," Sorun said as he lowered the bottle from being raised above his head. "I carry boxes and stuff from point A to B. I don't fight stuff like you guys anymore; I got a job. I pay taxes and buy my own groceries. And then I have to make a second trip because Nicole frets over my lack of vitamins from not getting vegetables. So then I go buy the vegetables but I'm really just feeding them to Silver so she thinks I'm eating them. Please don't tell Nicole any of this," Sorun pleaded when he saw Sonic's wide-eyed stare. "I take vitamins I bought at Station Square, I swear, I just really don't want to eat the vegetables."

"Yeah, sure, whatever." Sonic waved his hands in a reassuring manner. "But listen, back to that first thing. 'Course you're still one of us. Once a Freedom Fighter always a Freedom Fighter, y'know? Just 'cause you're not out there with us anymore doesn't change that."

It was one of those awkward situations where, once again, Sorun was touched beyond words but the person who said those words wasn't Nicole so he couldn't show it. So it lead to the situation of Sorun just blankly staring at Sonic, inwardly cringing at his own reaction but lamenting he was too far in to back out now. It was better than admitting how endearing the words were and how much it meant to him.

"You okay? Sorun?" Mildly concerned but mostly just weirded out, Sonic waved a hand in front of his face. "You're spacin' out on me, man, what's going on?"

Sorun straightened up a bit and cleared his throat. "Ah, nothing. All is fine, everything is... fine. All fine." Absentmindedly tapping his fingernails against the bottle, Sorun asked, "So is there just gonna be a party or something in the castle?"

"Actually, I don't have a clue what she's planning," Sonic admitted with a shrug. "She asked me to find you, actually. She wants to talk about it for some reason, I dunno."

He seemed to find it odd from the way Sonic said it, and to Sorun it seemed odd, too. But the request itself seemed reasonable enough regardless, and Sorun was interested. It was a distraction he needed, anyways. "Oookay. I'll head there right now," he said. And then he looked down at the glass bottle in his hand, and then reared it back getting ready to throw it.

... And then he realized what he was doing and got out of the throwing stance, bottle still in hand.

"Right, can't do that anymore. Need to find a recycling bin," he muttered out. Sonic saw the small exchange, and one of his ears flicked in curiosity.

"Sorun, don't tell me people in your old home just threw empty bottles everywhere," he said in a joking and pleading voice.

The hedgehog wilted a bit when Sorun nodded. "Broken glass was a really bad safety hazard in Detroit," he admitted.

"Yeah, but you didn't contribute to it, right?"

"... Listen, I'm a responsible citizen now. What does it matter? Nobody ever even bothered to clean out that scrapyard."

"Okay, okay," Sonic chuckled out nervously, holding his hands up. "Look, if you want I can just take care of that for you so you can just head straight to the castle, how about that?"

Another endearing moment Sorun fought not to fawn over. Instead he simply just handed Sonic the bottle. "That'd be great actually, yeah, thank you."

"Sooo... eighteen. The big one-eight." Sorun clicked his tongue and tapped on his knees a few times. He was forced to readjust himself slightly - this couch had so much padding on it he was genuinely worried his whole body would sink into the thing. He didn't know how Sally wasn't having the same problem since she was sitting right next to him. "It's two less than twenty, you know."

"I'm pretty familiar with math," Sally lightheartedly replied, though she was giving Sorun a perplexed look. "You okay? You're kind of acting weird."

"Never better, never better, it's all good," he assured her.

She blinked at him and gave him an odd look, but then shrugged and drank out from the glass of water she'd been holding. "You sure you don't want something to drink?" she asked after finishing.

"It's all good, it's all good, never better." She gave him another odd look. "So, birthday, big birthday, big birthday plans, what's your plan, why am I here, why am I involved in these big birthday plans?"

Instead of answering immediately she continued to regard him silently with that questioning look. She slowly put the glass down on the small table in front of them. A really ornamental table with gold fittings. Out of everything else in what looked like a meeting room in the castle Sally had invited him in to it was probably the most extravagant piece if furniture in here. Aside from this couch attempting to swallow Sorun.

Seriously, what did they pad this thing with? His hands kept disappearing into the cushions.

"I wanted to ask you a favor in regards to..." Sally slowed down when she saw Sorun adjust himself for the fifth time in the last twenty seconds. "Sorun, do you want to sit somewhere else?"

The latest position featured Sorun sitting in a way that he was facing Sally and with his legs crossed. Seemed to be stable so far - he wasn't sinking at a rate that made it look like Sally was growing. "Nah, I think I finally figured it out," he assured her. "Oh, uh, congrats, by the by. You know, for surviving eighteen years."

She smiled for the first time since greeting him after he entered the castle. "Well, thank you, but you don't have to say it in such a macabre way. My brother complains that you do that a lot." She twirled a lock of red hair between her fingers and glanced towards a nearby window. "It doesn't really feel all that different. There's a bunch of traditions members of my family were supposed to do at these times, but with everything I barely ever got to participate in many of them throughout my life. But my father was the only one who ever enforced those and he... well..."

Sorun shifted his legs so the other one was sitting above the previous. "He's still not doing well?"

She grew a somber face. "He... can't really speak anymore. Mom's spending most of her time looking after him, but. Well. You know..."

"Mm." Old age - the oldest and most reliable killer there was. Sorun wanted to make a snide comment, but held off in light of it being Sally's birthday. And her dad, too, he supposed. "Didn't mean to bring the mood down."

Sally waved his concerns off. "It's fine," she said, a bit of her smile returning. "So, listen. We haven't been able to do much because Eggman and his Legion went quiet due to us all pushing them back. Again. So we're all just waiting around on standby."

Sorun nodded along. "Following."

"So this is happening and... well, a lot's just happened in the last year," Sally said. "Pretty much the whole world's liberated now, we got the new city, things are finally going fine for everyone, and in light of all this we all figured it was a good time to celebrate. Even if it seems a bit premature. I think everyone just capitalized on my birthday as an excuse to celebrate something," she remarked with a small grin.

"Naturally."

"And to that end we all just decided to hold a small get-together. In recognition for everything that's happened and just to celebrate. Just us Freedom Fighters. And Knuckles, too, since he and the rest of the gang on the island have been with us through a large part of all of this. They're coming, too. It'll be nice. All of us hanging out like old times without some massive, giant threat looming over our heads, you know?"

Oh, Sorun knew, all right. He'd been living the stress-free dream of not having to worry about all the heavy stuff for a while now and it was sweet. "I can get behind that," Sorun said. "Plus what you guys do is important. You should totally just take a moment to yourselves-"

"Ourselves. You're coming too, remember?" Sally interrupted. "You're still one of us, Sorun. We wouldn't be having this conversation if we didn't think so."

There was that warm feeling again that Sorun had to hide by shifting positions on the couch once more while looking away. "Yeah, well... I got the time, so I'll go." He had a hard time keeping up his indifferent composure when he saw Sally beam a smile at him. "But why'd you need to talk to me about it like this? You could have just come to my house."

"Oh, that." Sorun looked back at her in interest when Sally's expression suddenly became mildly sheepish. "So... way back in the day during one of our operations we found this one island, right?"

"Ah-huh." He nodded along.

"It's a really nice place, remote, large beach, I remember it being really great," Sally continued. She was twiddling her fingers as a distraction. "We all want to go there, half because it's nice and half because of where it is in the world it'll be morning in a few hours so we'll have a whole day to enjoy there."

"Ah-huh..." Sorun started smirking in amusement because he saw where this was going. It was a reaction Sally caught, which made her twiddle harder.

"And what with it being so far away and Angel Island currently being in an inconvenient spot I just wanted to ask if you just transport us all there? With your sword?"

"Ah-hah, I see." It was allll clear now. The nice invitation to the castle, buttering him up with all these nice words and this impractically soft couch. And of course he would do it, but more importantly than that the door to teasing just now was opened and Sorun would be a fool not to capitalize on it. "You never call, you never write-"

"We live in the same town," Sally dryly commented.

"-rarely visit," Sorun revised, "I mean I get you're all so busy with the Freedom Fighter stuff and this is the first time you've had some time off in a while, but... but I thought we were friends. But now it just seems like you only ever give me the time of day because I have this super convenient katana thing. It's almost hurtful."

She made a small sort of chuckle. "Come on, Sorun, it's not nice to tease. And you know it's hard to find time when we're both living in different circles now."

A bit of dissatisfaction grew in Sorun. Was always hard to get things past Sally - nigh impossible, almost. Not like her brother where it was so easy Sorun probably should have felt bad doing it. She was too "people smart". People genius, even, in the same way Tails was a mechanical genius, or Honey a fashion genius, or Sorun a gaming genius. Or Nicole being a genius in general.

"Really should have been you holding the crown," Sorun off-handedly muttered, sounding a bit bitter over his teasing being seen through. Sally grinned wider, and whether it was because of his remark or his mood, Sorun didn't know.

"It's something Elias and I talk about," she admitted. The grin dimmed somewhat. "He's entertained the idea of stepping down to pass the crown to me one day in the future. Even if the position's power is diminished from an active council, it's still the highest position in government now. We... don't really want to talk about it so much with dad still around," she added. The grin faded altogether. "He's a serious traditionalist and the change of a monarchy to a republic... well, the stress didn't do wonders for his health."

"So what, you're waiting for him to pass before you start swapping the crown around like a hat?"

Sally flinched at the wording. "I wouldn't put it quite like that," she said, "but... it'd make things in our family easier, yes." She made a small sigh. "Our mother isn't as set in the matter as our father, but with his health and me being busy with the Freedom Fighters along with everyone else, it's just not a good time. The people need a leader and there's only so much a single person can do at once. Maybe one day, after we win. But I think my brother's doing a fine enough job that I'm not really worried about it."

He didn't have much more to add. It seemed like sensible enough reasoning and he agreed with her wholeheartedly. "Alright. Now, moving away from that dour stuff..." he started, "I have always wanted to go to the beach. To have fun. Not-" He pushed the memory of drunkenly crashing a plane out of his head, "-for any other reason than the one I just stipulated, nope."

The bright smile returned to Sally's face. "That's great! And, say... since we're on the subject, when's your birthday?"

Red alert. Deflect it. Deflect it right now. "Kind of a weird thing to bring up out of nowhere, ain't it?"

"Not... really? We were talking about my birthday, I'm asking about a birthday, seems pretty related." Instead of answering Sorun silently stared, making Sally shake her head. "Fine, don't tell her I said this, but... Nicole's been trying to figure it out." Sorun felt himself still as Sally continued with, "It's just that you've been here for over three-quarters of a year and she's a bit worried she'll miss it. It doesn't help you've never talked about it."

"Ah. Well ain't that a thing?" He probably should have figured something like this would happen, but for the most part he'd been ignoring the possibility in hopes that it would kind of just go away on its own. By and large that was still Sorun's strategy and at this point he was hoping Sally would drop it really soon so they could get back onto another topic.

"So...?" Sally hedged, seemingly awaiting a response.

Evidently she wasn't dropping it. "So what?"

"So are you gonna tell her when it is?"

No. He wouldn't tell anyone. He wouldn't tell Sally right now because for all he knew this was some sort of convoluted plot she concocted with Nicole and the AI was listening in from somewhere. Or more realistically she'd just tell her later. Either event was a disaster Sorun couldn't abide.

To that end Sorun did the thing he was reasonably good at: continue to deflect. "I don't think today's really an appropriate day to be talking about something like this. It's your birthday, it's your day. Shouldn't have me crampin' it."

"I wouldn't go that far." She tried to make light of the reasoning, but all the same still looked off-put by his words. She seemed to shake the mood off after a brief moment. "She cares about you a lot, you know. She just wants to do something nice to make you feel more welcome when it gets here."

"Yeah. I know." Part of why the situation sucked so much. He'd usually just consider lying about it but Nicole was the one person he didn't really want to do that to, so... back to hoping the situation would just go away on its own. Which it probably wouldn't. Eh, he'd wing it if it ever became a problem. "I'll talk to her about it. One day." Probably. If she remembered.

... Ah, dammit, she always remembered.

"I'm glad to hear it." She smiled "So you've never went to one in your old home? A beach?"

"... There was a beach in Detroit. I never went." Sorun's face soured. "Except for that one stupid contest at the youth center next to the beach my mom and Dave's parents dragged us to. But other than that, no, I never went personally."

"How come?"

Because how the hell was he supposed to grind experience points out on a beach? "Just never found a good opportunity," Sorun said, shrugging. He smiled a bit. "But no, I'd like this. I'd like to have fun on the beach with you all. And hey, it'll be nice seeing the gang from the floating island place again. I haven't seen them since... I said goodbye to everyone before trying to go back to Earth." Sorun frowned a bit. "And then I never saw them again until I almost died again and you all shoved me in the giant glowing crystal..." He frowned deeper and looked Sally in the eyes. "Um... did, did you guys ever, like, tell them? What happened with me? And Earth? Because it kind of looked like everyone assumed I did leave and acted surprised I was there. Shadow was freaking out."

The first thing Sally did was awkwardly cough. Not a good sign. Then her eyes darted away from Sorun's as she said, "Well... the truth is nobody was really sure how to handle it. A good time to explain things never came up before... you know."

"Do they at least know I'm fine now?" Sorun pressed. "I vanished after going in the Master Emerald. Do they all still think I'm vanished?"

He felt a bit relieved when Sally shook her head. "No, we explained things. After," she elaborated, "when you came back. They know."

"It's still gonna be super awkward," Sorun muttered out in lament. He rubbed his face a bit, letting out a small sigh as it dropped back to his side. "Ah, well, nothing to do about it, I guess. But hey, since they're coming I can bring my houseguest, right?"

Sally froze. Not in the "I'm surprised you asked that" kind of way, but more in the "I need a polite and tactful way to handle this" kind of way when somebody needed a moment to think. For Sally it took less than a moment for her to find the response she'd been looking for, but Sorun had still noticed the pause. "Well, Sorun, I... suppose your pet Chao did help out with that one mission at Station Square, so technically he could be construed as an... honorary Freedom Fighter of sorts, so yes. I suppose he could. As long as you keep him away from Sonic; the two don't get along."

Sorun blinked suspiciously at Sally. "Uh... I know he's kind of dumb, but I wouldn't really refer to Silver as a pet-"

"Okay I tried to be nice about this but I'm just gonna say it," Sally interrupted, bluntly. "No. He can't come."

"A-ah, I see." Well that was disheartening to hear. He couldn't say he was surprised, but he hadn't expected to hear it laid out so raw. By Sally of all people. Maybe he really did underestimated how much damage Silver did. "Is this about the traitor thing-?"

"It's about the fact it's a gathering for Freedom Fighters and he's not a Freedom Fighter, Sorun." She crossed her arms, glowering not at Sorun, but seemingly at the mere thought of Silver, which couldn't have been a good sign. "But since you brought it up, yes, Sorun, it's because of that, too. I don't take kindly to the insinuation either I or one of the friends I've spent nearly my whole life with, who I'd trust my life with, are secretly plotting to undermine everything we've spent our lives fighting for." She looked like she was getting angrier from mentally reliving Silver's questioning. "And he was saying all that with, with such a carefree expression! Like he didn't even care-!"

"He cares," Sorun very carefully corrected, hoping to calm Sally down, "he's just, well, I don't wanna say emotionally stunted 'cause he's not, but, uh... he doesn't have a lot of practice with people. I mean he was raised by Mogul and never had contact with anyone else besides some weirdo hermit before he met me, what do you expect?"

The name "Mogul" made Sally freeze, and slowly she turned towards him with narrowed eyes. "The mammoth. That Mogul?" The name sounded icy coming out of Sally's mouth.

"Y-yeah?"

"The one who tried to usurp the old kingdom by taking a family artifact from me? The one who sent mercenaries against the Freedom Fighters? The one who kidnapped Tails and sent a clone to replace him for months? The one we were keeping in jail before he escaped ?"

Okay he forgot about the body snatcher part. Goddamn. "Uh... to be fair it seemed like he chilled out after living in an apocalypse for a couple centuries. Or maybe being a dad mellowed him out, who knows?"

She didn't even seem to hear that. "You're saying that same Mogul is the one that raised Silver?"

"I'm starting to regret having revealed this information, but yes. It was that guy." Sorun gulped and nervously tapped his knee. "I feel like this isn't helping you trust him."

"No, the opposite, actually," Sally stated through her scowl. "I'm starting to wonder if we should even have him in the city."

"Hey, come on." Slightly alarmed, Sorun uncrossed his legs and sat up straight on the couch to give Sally a serious look. "I know Silver's kind of an anti-social weirdo, but so was I! You never kicked me out for being weird!"

"You weren't raised by a villain!"

"Ehhh- forget it, look, he's a good guy," Sorun said, though Sally didn't look like she believed him. "I mean I'll admit it, flat-out, he's stupid when it comes to a lot of societal cues, but it's not his fault! If anything he came out really well for where he came from! It's almost a miracle when you think about it!"

"Sorun-"

"Look I know he screwed up with you all, it's fine if none of you like him, I get it, but you can't just throw him out! He doesn't have anywhere else to go and I'm not entirely convinced he'd make it out there on his own!"

"Sorun," Sally repeated, a bit more forcefully. He quieted down and listened as she spoke. "Listen, I'll concede the fact he actually hasn't done anything illegal. Wrong's another matter, but... ugh." She made a small groan and pinched the space between her eyes. "I just don't want to think about him today, Sorun. It's supposed to be a day to celebrate, not think about your friend Silver and everything surrounding him. And I know he's your friend, but... he just can't come, Sorun, not after what he did."

He would concede the fact that it'd be a big mood killer to bring Silver, who pretty much everyone saw in a negative light. It didn't stop him from feeling a bit disappointed, though. Even a bit guilty, knowing how he'd be going to a fun party while pretty much just leaving him behind. Knowingly. Especially since he doubted Silver had never been to a beach part before and would have really liked it.

There was a small shuffle from Sally. She seemed to grow a bit uncomfortable at the sudden sullen face Sorun had. "It's not all that bad, Sorun. It just a day."

"Yeah... I know."

The response didn't sound encouraging, and it made Sally frown a bit. Then her eyes lit up at realizing something. "You know..." she began with a small grin, "Nicole's going to the beach along with the rest of us. We're bringing the handheld and a supply of Power Rings."

Silver didn't exist anymore. He never did. Large parts of the world itself fell out of Sorun's worldview when the full weight of that sentence hit him. It was like a switch being flicked so violently the switch itself was torn straight out of its housing. Nothing in the whole damn universe existed except for the single thought racing through Sorun's head:

"Nicole. The beach. The beach. Nicole. Nicole at the beach. The beach and Nicole. The beach. And Nicole. The beach. Nicole. The beach. Nicole. The beach-"

"Well, Sally, when you say it like that I guess there's only one responsible thing to do."

"Silver I'm going somewhere with the Freedom Fighters. Won't be back 'til tomorrow. Also I'm taking Virgil so you got the house to yourself 'til we get back."

"... Huh?" From the couch he was sitting on Silver seemed to find the news unexpected, which was to be expected. Then again he may have been off put from that having been the first thing Sorun said when he entered the house, wearing nothing but a t-shirt and shorts, but he pressed on regardless.

"Yeah, it's this, uh..." Well he couldn't go and call it a party now, could he? Not without hurting Silver's feelings. Since he couldn't come. "It's a little get-together the Freedom Fighters are doing for old times' sake. And I was one so I got invited. Tried to get you in but they said no."

"That's fine?" He either didn't understand the gravity of what was going on, which was good, or didn't care that much, which was just a tiny bit sad for Sorun to consider. His white-furred head turned a bit to the side to glance at the small, floating creature next to Sorun's side. "But your pet gets to go?"

"Virgil was an indispensable ally in that one mission we did that one time," Sorun explained. "He helped me cut up a giant robot scorpion thing and then I beat up a really small and sad man."

"Chao." The intimidating-looking Chao nodded his head in approval as the single-syllable word was said in his deep, wispy voice. More than likely both in being recognized for his efforts and that Sorun committed an act of violence.

The expression Silver was giving painted him as being ambivalent overall to the news, which made Sorun feel a bit more at ease with the situation as he retreated to the house's kitchen. Mature as Silver was he didn't want him to feel down being explicitly told he couldn't come, but he seemed to be handling it fine enough. Likely due to Sorun downplaying the event itself. Or he probably just did accept he wasn't welcome and learned to live with it, which would be the best path overall, but he was locked in enough Sorun was willing to let what was happening already ride.

After retrieving the Chaos Emerald from its resting place in the kitchen sink, he retreated to the living room to address Silver one last time before he and Virgil departed. Still looked ambivalent, fortunately, bordering uncaring, if not a bit surprised from how sudden this was. "Anyways since we're all going you're officially the strongest person in the whole city. I really doubt anything'll happen and even if it does Nicole set the automated defenses for the city up so nobody can even get in, but, erm... yeah on second thought don't worry about anything, just chill out 'til I get back."

"All I do here is 'chill out'," Silver said. "I don't have anything else to do between trying to nail down the whole 'hey the entire future's on the line' thing I have going on."

"Well if it makes you feel better I'll ask around a bit about it since they'll all be there and they actually like me." No he wouldn't. The lie brightened Silver up a bit, though. "Doubt anything'll come of it, though." And now he looked a bit sad again. "Look man, seriously. Take a break and destress. Read a book or something, I dunno, I got-" he glanced over at the sparsely-populated book shelf nearby, "-some over there. Or go out to lunch. Geez, I'll even leave you some money to eat out for dinner if you want."

"It's not that." He tried to look gloomy, but there was a small flicker of a grateful look Sorun managed to catch. "It's... you know, it's hard sitting still knowing all this and how much pressure there is. I just wish I knew how you manage to stay calm all the time knowing the same stuff I know. Like right now," he said, gesturing to Sorun. "I'm not blaming you for going out to do something, but you're... you're always just not bothered by anything. Kind of wish I could keep it as cool as you."

Well, Sorun would concede that was mostly due to the fact he internalized a lot of his feelings and he was an utter jackass, but he could still see Silver's point. "I mean, I get it. Don't get me wrong I get it. But it's times like this I need to go and do this because it has something extremely important going on and I will never be able to focus on anything ever again if I don't witness it."

Silver arched an eye ridge. "And... what, exactly, is so important you can't do anything else?"

"Nicole. The beach. Nicole. The beach. Nicole. The beach. Nicole. The beach-"

"Look, you gotta stop worrying about things like 'what' or 'who' or other unimportant details like that," Sorun said, sitting down next to Silver while draping an arm over his shoulders. "Some things in life are just too important. Arguably more important than food and water."

"What, like breathing?"

"Even more important than air." He shook Silver's shoulders with his arm and then bounded back up to his feet. "And so! I must go accomplish this great feat," he said, shifting the blue gem into his katana. "And you must do something else to occupy your time, don't care what, just relax. We're bouncing." He nodded his head to Virgil. "Come along, Virgil. The beach awaits."

"Chao."

Nodding again, Sorun split apart space behind them with a single swipe of his sword. Virgil didn't waste any time flying through. Before he crossed through Sorun turned to give Silver one last look, and then waved at him. "Bye, have fun."

"Wait, you're going to the beach?" Silver's question wasn't answered because by then Sorun had already left through the portal he'd created. And almost as soon as he left it closed, leaving Silver completely alone in the living room. He slumped further into the couch. "I... I would have liked to go to the beach..."

The beach.

Compared to the last time Sorun went to one there was a lot less stress going through his system. The lack of a burning pile of wreckage, a monument to everything wrong with his life back when his life was in shambles, was a good improvement. And the island itself was... eh, big. Maybe two, three times bigger than the dinky little island he got stranded on that one time during the plane incident that was in no way his fault.

But that was all secondary to the beach, which was, as Sorun stood there looking over it... well, a beach. That was about it. Was nice enough.

He looked behind him. All the others were there setting up a veritable pile of stuff that had been brought over from New Mobotropolis to further enhance the Beachtime Experience. Mostly just some folding chairs, containers for food and drinks, other miscellaneous items.

It was all very nice. Being here with everyone, doing this. Having a sense of belonging and being allowed to just relax. It'd be the perfect experience, too, if Sorun weren't standing there clutching Yamato in his hands in a fit of nervousness as he looked down at his feet.

"So you, uh... you gonna go get 'em now? 'Cause they're waiting." He didn't even look over at Sonic, who sounded a bit impatient with Sorun at the moment. He was doing that thing where he crossed his arms and tapped his foot rapidly, which was already creating a small crater in the sand. "We told them you were gonna portal them over, Sorun, come on."

"It's just been a while since I've seen them and a lot's happened," Sorun said. It was understandable to be nervous. Not overly anxious, but the sensation was still there. "I mean I saw Knuckles that one time, but what about the rest? It's gonna be awkward. I don't do awkward."

The look Sonic gave him was skeptical at best. "I really don't think they're gonna care all that much, man. You're thinking about this way too hard."

Nonsense. He never did that. "If you say so, I guess." Sighing, Sorun swung the sword through the air, cutting a blue cross shape in the space in front of them which folded into a portal. And then Sorun promptly turned around and walked away a little bit. "Well, there it is, go fetch them," he said, giving a small wave to Sonic as he passed.

"Seriously? Really, Sorun?" The flat look sent his way didn't slow Sorun down in the slightest. It made Sonic sigh and shake his head, though he still turned towards the portal right after to walk through. Sorun didn't pay much attention; amongst all the Freedom Fighters setting up the Beachtime Experience stuff was Nicole sitting in one of the folding chairs, fiddling around with the handheld she was really in. He had more of a desire to go and talk to her than to greet the people that would inevitably come out of that portal, though alas...

The sensation of air and space rapidly being displaced behind him; something coming close. Eyes flashing green, world coming into focus. Blood rushing and making everything become clear. Muscles tensing. "Dodge it."

"SORUN!"

He dodged it. The black and yellow object zoomed past Sorun after he quickly sidestepped it. He saw who it was and the world sped back up to uncomfortable levels. Eyes returned to blue as the blood slowed, muscles went lax, and everything returned to the sluggish levels of painfully normal.

The entire event barely took three seconds.

"Huh?" Sorun blinked and looked down at his feet. There was a deep groove cared into the sand about half a meter long from where he'd dodged, and a small frown wormed its way onto his face. "That movement... it's getting worse."

He tried his best to relax his face and looked up. He'd never admit to missing Charmy. Maybe to Nicole if it was in private and she asked. He was one of those people that brightened up the room. But he couldn't abide getting tackle-hugged from behind in spite of that. He had standards. And Charmy wasn't Nicole.

It didn't stop the bee from zooming forwards to try again.

Sorun sighed, left hand holding the sword while his right swung freely. That urge was easier to keep a handle on when he knew what the fast-approaching object was and that it wasn't dangerous. Fast things triggered it sometimes and it was getting harder to get a grip with it. But it was an issue he pushed to the back of his mind like always so it wouldn't bother him, and afterwards he rose his right hand forwards so his hand caught Charmy in the chest when he tried tackling him again.

"Now, now. It's rude to try and commit sneak attacks like that," Sorun jokingly remarked. "Hey Charmy, been a while. Don't, uh... please stop trying to do that."

He acquiescence and relented, thankfully, and silently Sorun breathed a sigh of relief as he allowed his hand to rest back at his side. Charmy still had that goofy grin on his face regardless. "Sorry, Sorun, but it's been so long!"

"Yeah, it's been a hot minute." He glanced over at the portal. Sonic thankfully had guided the rest of the Chaotix team through the portal. They were good people; looked like they were already having a great time. Of course when Sorun's gaze wandered over to Knuckles he couldn't help his eyes sticking on him for a moment longer. Couldn't help feeling something stir in him, couldn't help seeing a golden helmet superimpose itself over his head for a single frame of time. The moment passed and it was just Knuckles again, and Sorun breathed a bit easier.

The fingernails on his right hand felt itchy looking at Knuckles.

At some point Charmy had grabbed at Sorun's hand and was dragging him towards the group, chattering on about something. He smiled, nodding along and pretending like he'd been listening the whole time while silently berating himself for zoning out like that.

"Ah-huh. Ah-huh, yeah. Oh?" He felt a bit bad, stringing the bee along like that, but Sorun felt it was more polite than flat-out admitting he'd ignored him, even accidentally. "So how has life on the island been?" Smooth. Divert the conversation along a path Sorun could follow. Detract from the fact he hadn't heard.

"Oh, it's been great!" Charmy sounded happy enough, so he couldn't have noticed. Good. "We still travel down from time to time to help with Eggman, but otherwise everything has been going great!"

"Chill, chill." He'd been dragged right to the others. It'd been so long since he'd seen them that he barely... well alright, no, they looked the exact same from the last time he saw them. It was still nice all the same. "Hey, all," Sorun greeted, giving a small wave.

"Hey, you!" When Mighty gave his own friendly greeting by way of a shoulder pat, Sorun was pretty sure he'd felt the sand underneath his feet vibrate from the force of the impact. He'd been worried about holding in the wince, but to his surprise he didn't need to put in the effort. It didn't hurt as much as it should have. "Man, it's been so long!" the armadillo continued. "Like, wow, we all thought you left and you didn't and..." The smile started to trail off of Mighty's face. "Then, uh, then the others said what happened with you and, uh-"

"Hey, hey, hey, come on, now, none of that," Sorun said. "It's supposed to be a good time we're all having, isn't it? None of that sad stuff. It's fine."

"See? I told you he'd be fine!" This time when a reassuring arm found itself over Sorun's shoulders it'd slammed down with enough force that Sorun felt his feet sink into the sand. And this time he'd really felt this one, right alongside the realization that he hadn't missed Vector nearly as much as all the rest of them. "What'd I tell you, solid as a rock this guy!"

"Yeah..." Maybe he could have a bit of fun. It was supposed to be one of those events, after all. "You guys still don't have financial troubles since you live up on Angel Island, do you, Vector?"

When he looked up, had to crane his neck back, really, Vector, who Sorun still thought had an unusually expressive face for a crocodile, looked down at Sorun in confusion. "Whatchu talkin' 'bout, Sorun?"

"Sonic didn't tell you about my rates?" Sorun asked, feigning mock surprise. "I make a living teleporting stuff around, since, you know, it's such a convenient thing only I can do. I get complaints from couriers for stealing work from them. And even with the friends discount I gave you all it's gonna be two hundred mobiums for a round trip." A pause. "Each."

Vector stiffened stiffer than a statue. If he looked closely Sorun could almost see the green color draining out of his scales and took a small sort of delight out of it. All of the others were in similar states of shock. Even Espio, who should have been the most composed out of all of them, looked visibly sick. Like he was about to throw up on the sand.

Ray was the first one to speak up. "I-i-i-isn't that a b-bit high?"

Shrugging off Vector's frozen arm and stepping back a bit, Sorun scratched the back of his head. "Is it? Because that discount I waved your guys' way scratched off ninety percent of the overall cost. I'm being generous here."

"IT'S STILL TWO HUNDRED WITH NINETY PERCENT OFF!? YOU'RE CHARGIN' A RACKET!" Vector bellowed out. "It's highway robbery! And to us, of all people! I take it back, you're just as cold as I remember you!"

It was with supreme self-control and discipline that Sorun managed to keep from chortling, or even so much as grinning from the display he was seeing. A feat not so easy from the amount of amusement he was seeing before him. Alas, somebody had to come along and ruin the fun. Even went as far as to grab his ear like a strict mother would do to a misbehaving child.

"Guys, relax, Sorun's just having a bit of fun with you all," Sally assured them with a lighthearted grin. A grin that seemed a lot less sincere when she turned her head to Sorun and tugged harshly at his ear. "Because in no way is Sorun seriously charging for this kind of thing, right?"

This time he couldn't hold back the wince of pain, but he was less upset at that and more at his fun being ruined. He got over it a second later, rolling his eyes and waving Sally's hand away from him. "Yes, I'm kidding around. You guys get the full hundred discount. This time," he assured them. And then paused when he turned and saw all eight of them slumping down with so much relief that he could have sworn they were about to pass out. "Um... you guys are still bad off, huh?"

Espio was the one that answered. "Our efforts dedicated towards protecting our home isn't the most prosperous of efforts. Mainly due to the fact there's no longer any major infrastructure on the island and no one to pay us," he informed. "We appreciate you waving any fees charged for your usual services for our sake, Sorun."

"I mean I just wave a piece of metal around in the air a bit, it ain't all that much effort. But you're welcome for being the most generous person you'll ever meet in your entire life, Espio."

Once again he found an arm slamming over his shoulders. It was Sally's arm this time. And she put a lot of effort in because he almost doubled over from how hard she slammed the arm on him. "You know what, Sorun, I think I should catch up with the rest of the Chaotix while you go do something else, what do you say?"

"Didn't you go on a mission with them all like three days ago?" Pressure from the arm was increasing. Shoulders were feeling like they were about to fall off. The argument was lost and Sorun took three steps back. "I see your point, though, I'll get out of your hair."

The only response given was a sickly sweet smile from Sally. With a roll of his eyes and a scoff, Sorun turned away as he heard the nine Mobians behind him begin to converse. Sorun, the sole human on this entire island, wandered a few steps down the beach with his eyes glancing around towards the one sole AI on the island. Alas, Nicole wasn't sitting down where he'd seen her last. And he couldn't find her by sweeping his eyes around the immediate vicinity.

With his girlfriend nowhere and sight and motivation temporarily plummeting, Sorun found himself collapsing into a sitting position on the sand. He huffed out a defeated breath, but then felt his ears perk up when he heard a soft, scratching sound nearby.

"Hm?" He looked towards the source of the noise, but lost all interest completely when he saw it was just Tails sitting in the sand. Drawing something with his finger. Which actually did serve to draw a bit of Sorun's interest, and after evaluating that he didn't have much better to do at this exact moment, he scooched over so that he was sitting next to him.

"Is this work I see here, Tails?" Sorun accused, moving over so that he was shoulder-to-shoulder with the fox. "During a sacred beach trip? Have you no shame?"

"Hey, Sorun." Tails didn't even so much as look up from whatever he was drawing in the sand with his finger, but a small smile did grow on his mouth. "It's not work. I'm just trying to figure out what to do about the sandcastle."

"Sandcastle?" Sorun repeated in a murmur, craning his head down a bit lower to look. Indeed, the diagram in the sand was that of a castle. A really intricate 3-D rendition of an otherwise basic castle structure quickly and expertly sketched into the sand. For the plans to a sandcastle it sure did look like the most complicated thing in Sorun's life. "You really have to go this far for a simple sandcastle, man?"

"Not really. It's a blueprint. You need those to build things."

"So just... build it," Sorun slowly said, looking up from the diagram and at Tails. "Like, do you really? What's stopping you from just building it? It's a sandcastle, man, not a plane. Its main ingredient is sand and literally nothing else."

Tails' finger stopped mid-drawing of a castle turret in the center of a long diagram of lines and measurements. "I guess... the others did say I need to relax more. Hmrf." He made a short sigh, and then in a move that mildly surprised Sorun he completely wiped away the sand diagram before turning to him. "Alright, then help me out here."

"With the sandcastle?"

"Yeah!" He nodded at Sorun. "It'll be fun, right? And plus I've never seen you build anything before. We can make one together!"

"..." The enthusiasm Tails was displaying was completely lost on Sorun as his own gaze fell down towards the sand. "Sandcastles, huh...?"

Four years ago

Detroit City Community Youth Center

Everything about this was stupid. The stupid contest, the stupid youth center, all this stupid sand. Useless.

Get out of the house more. He didn't know what mom was talking about when she said he should get out more. He got out fine enough. He went to school. Except for right now since it was summer but that didn't change the fact he went to school. And it wasn't just his mom, either, because Dave's folks were apparently acting the same way and dragged them to... to this.

Stupid youth center. Stupid plots of sand everywhere crowded by other kids. Parents all standing in the back watching them all. Weird moms dragging them to stuff like this when he just wanted to play his games.

At least Dave was here. Suffering with him and making the suffering easier.

"Okay, so..." Sorun languidly blew past his lips and looked down at the plot of sand they were sitting in. "'Ooh, build a sandcastle, it'll be fun for you kids,' goddamn shitty-ass fuckin' broke-ass MC," he thought hatefully, glaring at the "event organizer", a title much too prestigious for the fat woman who organized all this, sitting in a booth nearby with the other judges. Because this shit was being judged.

Fucking hell.

"Dave," Sorun tiredly mumbled out as he rubbed at his face, "look maybe we can just half-ass it and go home early 'cause-"

The world itself rumbled when Dave's fist struck down on the sand supporting their weight. It was in that frame of time Sorun saw it: Dave's entire form, outlined in a golden corona of sand that matched his blonde hair and yellow hoodie. His smile wide and near-manic as he stared at the very sand itself, like it was an enemy to be defeated. The very image emitted a sense of confidence so alien and yet captivating that Sorun couldn't help but be drawn in to the sight.

"THE SANDCASTLE BUILDING TECHNIQUES OF THE MILLER FAMILY IS AN ART THAT HAS BEEN PASSED DOWN FOR GENERATIONS, SORUN!" His will, unwavering. His belief in conquering the challenge, absolute. Every single facet of the other teenager sitting next to Sorun exuded nothing but the utmost confidence. Unyielding charisma he couldn't help but not be drawn into. "We'll build a sandcastle that'll rival heaven itself," Dave proclaimed. The sand around him settled as he pointed straight up at the ceiling. "One that'll blow all these guys outta the water!"

Sorun didn't understand the meaning behind a single word David had said but goddamn was he in from that alone. "Yeah, alright, fine. So speaking of water should I grab some?"

"Huh? Oh, uh, yeah, dude." And like that, like a light switch had been flipped, the charisma was mostly gone. Mere eddies of the glory he'd held for but a single moment wafting off of him as he looked at Sorun. He seemed a bit off-put by Sorun's mood. "But I mean come on, man, get hyped! We're gonna beat everyone! You love doing that!"

Sure he did. When they were on the other side of a screen and couldn't overpower him by virtue of Sorun having bottom-tier strength. This wasn't that. And yet, looking around... he supposed Dave had a point. Shying away from a challenge was a real anti-gamer move a self-respecting gamer like him could never commit to. Especially if Dave wasn't talking out his ass and he actually did have some ancient family technique for building sandcastles. However the hell that kind of legacy managed to manifest.

"... Well I guess we, as gamers, can't go and let everyone beat us. Just ain't right," Sorun finally admitted with a small smile. He became much more startled when Dave wrapped his arm over his shoulders and roughly shook him, laughing all the while.

"Ah-hah! That's the spirit, my dude!" He swept his free arm out in front of them. "I'll teach ya how to create a work of art, Sorun. By the end'a this you'll be able to make sandcastles whose light will pierce the sky! Just like a real man should!"

"Yeah, sure man, can't wait..."

Present

"..."

"Erm, Sorun?" Tails' voice shook him out of the memory. His eyes drifted towards the fox, who was giving him an odd look. "You kind of spaced out there. You doing okay?"

"... We'll make a sandcastle whose light will pierce the sky, Tails." Sorun's head tilted up to gaze at the infinite blue above them. "One that'll rival heaven itself."

"Okay?" The divine meaning behind Sorun's words were lost on Tails due to a lack of context. He just stared on at the human, slightly confused but otherwise he was mainly focused on the sandcastle. "So should I get the buckets-?"

"The buckets. Yes. And water. All is required."

"... Alright, Sorun." He was obviously weirded out by Sorun's sudden demeanor, but quickly shook it off and rose up to his feet to go get the supplies needed. Sorun himself didn't even notice the fox leave; his eyes were solely focused on the sand below him, his mind envisioning the first steps needed to construct his masterpiece.

There wasn't much thought that was needed. The designs were as fresh in his mind as day-old memories.

At approximately 10:37 A.M., in the complete center of the multiverse, in the centermost universe known as the Prime Zone, within the Milky Way Galaxy, located inside the Sol system, on a small, unassuming planet known as Mobius Prime, formerly known as the planet Earth Prime, home to a miniscule island located within the planet's tropics, on a completely clear and cloudless day, a human being and citizen of the Republic of Acorn created history.

From Sorun's perspective, the process had passed by in a blur. Barely any thought put in as his arms had moved automatically to shape and mold the sand as needed into the shapes desired. At some point Tails had become a non-entity. Relegated to standing back and observing Sorun in mute amazement as he constructed it.

The best damn sandcastle this planet would ever have the privilege of bearing witness to.

The instructions in his mind were as fresh as the day they had been instilled into Sorun by Dave. Every step, every meticulous detail, all plotted out and acted upon perfectly by his body. Perfect mimicry of the movements Dave had displayed to him, now being displayed to Tails as the sandcastle slowly took form. As if the memory itself was guiding Sorun's hand as sand walls were smoothed over, as intricate detailing was bored into the castle walls, as shapes heretofore thought unattainable by Mobian kind to be implemented in sand sculptures were indeed sculpted and implemented.

Sorun had always remembered perfectly with his hands. It hadn't been a difficult task on his part.

When he stepped back to admire his great work he felt a sense of pride befitting such a great work. It'd come out exactly as envisioned: a perfectly identical sandcastle to the one he had helped Dave build that day. The walls, perfectly symmetrical. The canopies to the turrets, perfectly conical. The gaps in the parapets, spaced perfectly. The sand surface itself perfectly smoothed even to the point it shined not as a sculpture of sand, but as a porcelain work of art. One that was as fragile as it was beautiful.

The waves softly crashing onto the beaches shores staggered, if only for a few beats, and the wind itself blowing across Sorun's had picked up in intensity if only for a few moments. As if the very planet itself was taking a shuddering breath in awe at his works. At the work of indescribable beauty lying just in front of him; a piece of talent and art that would never be replicated by any pairs of hands for as long as the stars burned. Such was its splendor. It was an image the world would treasure and hold in its memory until the universe grew cold.

It was... the true essence of a sandcastle.

"Wow, that's pretty neat, Sorun!" Tails praised.

"It's okay, I guess," Sorun said. "The ancient Miller family sandcastle building techniques, passed down through generation upon generation, has served us well." Shame it'd die with him in all likelihood. Unless Tails had been paying real close attention to the craft, but part of Sorun sincerely doubted even a genius mind of his caliber could fathom such an intricate and complex art. Hell, Sorun didn't even understand it. He just copied what Dave did.

"The ancient... uh. Um?" Blinking in clear confusion, Tails looked back at Sorun. His tails slowly swished in the air to match his visible confusion. "Is... so your last name is Miller?"

"No." Sorun said, gaze stoic, unceasing from the sandcastle.

"Oh." The answer didn't cede Tails' confusion. It only grew. "So what is it, then? I've never asked."

"I have a new life, Tails. Why taint it with things like names? I'm Sorun. It doesn't need to be more complicated than that." That was the bonafide truth and certainly not an attempt at erasing his embarrassing last name from the annals of history. Certainly not. He was who he was.

Sorun. The Ultimate Gamer. Mail courier and employee of the fashionista Honey. Sandcastle artisan.

"U-um, uh... okay." A small, defeated breath left Tails. His shoulders sagged, and whatever questions he had burning on his tongue were snuffed out as he made the decision to just accept the words coming out of Sorun's mouth and not question it. "We probably should have brought a camera or something."

"I hear you." Distant laughter drew Sorun's attention momentarily from the sandcastle. It was further down the beach. Nicole was with a group of their friends and she was laughing at something someone said. And here he was without a camera. "Be different if I still had my phone. But who knows where that went."

Tails' eye ridges furrowed in confusion. "But a camera isn't a phone? I don't know what you mean."

Sorun looked back at Tails with a deadpan expression. "You know, it amazes me this world has laser guns, robots, and nanotech, but somehow a common smartphone from my world seems more advanced than half the stuff here. Gives me really weird 'Final Fantasy' vibes, y'know?"

Tails' face changed to mimic Sorun's deadpan. "No, Sorun, not really. I didn't understand any of that."

"The suffering continues." He pocketed his hands and rotated fully to face Tails. "Do you even have touchscreens? You're telling me Nicole can make holographic displays you can interact with but you don't have touchscreens? You skipped that and went from analogue straight to the future haptic stuff?"

The deadpan mimic upon the fox's faced turned into a fresh, puzzled one. "Why would I want to touch the screen to interact with it? Why would anyone want to do that? That... no, seriously, I can't see a practical use for that."

"It was mainly to save real estate on space. Less keyboard and more screen for your phone," Sorun explained. "We're talking about a pocket-sized rectangle that was, like, a millimeter thick here, Tails, you needed as much screen as you could get."

Something about something Sorun said caught Tails' attention. No, more than that. He seemed focused now on something, his interest piqued and his eyes going inquisitive as he asked, "Your people really made communication devices that thin?"

"It's weird when you call it that but yeah." Communication device. Huh. Sorun didn't know how to feel about that one. "Had a bunch of apps in it, too. Clock, calendar, compass I never used because why would I, interfacing widgets to connect to local networks, software to download and install other apps people made, high definition camera and recorder, video playback software. All sorts of stuff."

"... How much storage did they have?"

With a shrug, Sorun answered, "Some of the higher-end ones had hundreds of gigs of storage. Might've even worked their way up to a whole terabyte, but I dunno, I didn't follow those circles too closely." As far as he was concerned computer tech and the latest SSD chips were a whole different world than the one the phone techies lives in. Things of that nature he could go on about for days. Phones? He was pretty much clueless in that area.

That'd done it; the gears were turning now in the young inventor's mind. His eyes weren't even focused on Sorun anymore. His head was tilted down, chin cupped in thought as quiet, indiscernible murmurs left his mouth while Sorun watched on, likely rambling on about theories and tech-speak that would go far over Sorun's own head. All because he made the mistake of talking about a phone.

"Tails?"

"How could they fit so much- no, unless, but maybe- but then how would, oh, the materials needed alone, maybe Sorun knows-"

"Come on, man, we're on the beach." Bending forwards a bit, Sorun softly flicked Tails on the forehead. It seemed to snap him out of whatever funk he'd been in as he blinked up at Sorun with wide eyes. "It's beach time, not tech time."

No, it wasn't working. The fox still seemed pensive about something, worked up. His fingers were curling in an out like he wanted, needed , to get his hands on something to take it apart and examine it. And now Sorun was thinking maybe it was a good thing that he'd lost his phone. Probably was a kinder fate than whatever he planned on doing.

"Sorun, you... um, said you lost the one you had. The commu- phone, I mean, you implied you had one but no longer have it." God, he was scratching behind his ear the same way a meth head would scratch at their neck. Had the same frenzied look in his eyes, even. "What, um, what happened to it? Your phone?"

He had to take a short breath to clear out the irritation the memory brought on before answering. "I lost it when you grabbed me at the store. Way at the beginning. Fell outta my pocket or somethin', I dunno. It either got left there or fell out somewhere inside the portal, and if it's that last one then I go no clue where it wound up." He looked up and scratched at his cheek. "Lost my wallet, too, man. I had some stuff in there."

"Oh..." The way Tails slumped over in defeat almost made Sorun sad from the secondhand sadness alone. He genuinely looked like someone just murdered his parents in front of him and Sorun didn't know whether it was out of guilt or disappointment he didn't have a smartphone to dissect. "Um, uh, I mean, sorr- wait, that's not-"

"Chill, dude, it's fine. Apocalypse, remember? Managed to dodge all that 'cause of you?"

The reminder did serve to massively relieve Tails mood. Even so he still looked a bit sad. Must have been really bummed over that phone. "Yeah, I know. But, uh, hey! I could maybe pay you back for it? You know, the phone? How much did they cost, anyway?"

When money was mentioned it was like a spike of adrenaline going through Sorun's entire system. Time slowed to a crawl, lost all meaning, really, as that single word reverberated through his mind. "Money, money, money..." He stopped moving. Tails stopped moving. The world itself refused to move. Time itself became irrelevant as all sorts of thoughts began whizzing through Sorun's mind, all around that single concept. The idea of getting paid.

"Hey. Dude." Sorun could see him. Himself, a mirror image of Sorun, standing next to Tails with an incredibly mischievous smile on his face. "You know what you gotta do, dude."

"Do we really wanna lie to Tails about how much a smartphone costs just to milk as much money out of him as possible? I don't know, man, that's kind of rude. We're friends. I'm not even upset about the whole abduction thing anymore."

"Forget about Tails," Sorun said. "Just, like, just think about it. No way does Tails' have the money, but what about his mom ?"

"That stone-cold bitch."

"My man. My homie. My thoughts exactly. I mean, I mean come on, think about it, she's one of the councilors, the whole family's probably loaded. They can super afford you ripping them off."

He had a point. He did not like Tails' mom. Or even his dad, now that he thought about it. Uncle was a right bastard whose teeth he'd knock out if he ever saw him again. But he did like Tails, which was the problem. "Do we even need the money? We're pretty much set on funds. What am I supposed to do with more?"

"We can buy Nicole a really nice gift from Station Square. They got all sorts'a pricey shit in that one district."

Once more, he had a point. "Let me consult my moral compass for a bit here." He looked down on his left shoulder. A miniature Sorun with silver, cylindrical horns and a barbed, silver-scaled tail was standing on it. "What do you think?"

"Fiscally speaking this is the most responsible course of action we could possibly take," said the Devil. "Strictly speaking we're well-off enough that we could afford not to take such a reprehensible action. Unfortunately we may have a moral responsibility to do so."

"Huh?"

"Think about it from a logical standpoint: the socioeconomic policies of the Republic of Acorn are fairly decent even by our standards. It features many socialist policies such as free healthcare and education while adhering to capitalistic values that allow individuals such as Honey to own and maintain their own businesses, which feed into funds towards funding the city in the effort of further improving its own welfare. It is, by all rights, a near-ideal society we have found ourselves in. We have a duty as citizens of this society to help nurture it. In matters such as this though we need to think of what we can do to help us in order to help others."

"Huh?"

"Because of the economic structure of New Mobotropolis independent businesses such as Honey's bring in a, while not substantial, otherwise rather large sum to be added to the Republic's pockets. We are an employee of said business, who has played a large part in its success due to our unique circumstances and abilities."

"I'm following you."

"We are indispensable to the business. We're integral , which means, logically speaking, we ourselves are vital to the health of the entire Republic as a whole."

"Ahh..."

"It stands to reason we would need to monitor our levels of motivation and keep them elevated in order to continue to perform exemplary within Honey's business. High motivation leads to high success of the business, which leads to success of the Republic. Procuring additional funds in the effort of acquiring expensive gifts to court the AI you have been dating will go a long way towards increasing motivation levels. An AI, I remind you, who is charged with the responsibility of maintaining the city. Surely making her happy would improve her performance and further support the Republic."

"That does make sense."

"Further support of the Republic leads to a slow increase in funds. As Tails' mother is a politician of the Republic, those funds are inevitably funneled back into her as well as the Republic so she is able to make a living. She will make back the money given to us. More than that, she will make more money. This is basically an investment on her part."

"Whoa."

"So you see the course of action we have to take," the Devil concluded. "We must steal from their family. It's for the good of the Republic. It's for the good of everyone who lives in the Republic. It's for the Prower family's own good we steal money from them. It is the only clear, morally righteous path available to us. It's our duty as proud citizens of the Republic of Acorn."

"You make a solid argument." Sorun looked over on his right shoulder. The miniature Sorun standing there had a pair of silver horns that curved up in a way that they formed a halo coming out of his head. "What do you think?"

"You should gouge the fuck out of him," said the Angel.

"I see no problem with either of your positions."

"Sorun? Hey, Sorun?" Tails' voice brought the human back to reality. Time once more existed. The waves were softly crashing into the beach once more. Dave's ivory sandcastle stood tall for as long as the tide receded. "You've been standing there staring off at nothing for two minutes, are you alright?"

"Yeah, I was just doing the mental calculations converting my world's currency to this one's. In case it interested you mobiums almost completely match the value with US dollars one-to-one. So that phone's gonna set you back five thousand mobiums," Sorun said with a completely straight face.

The face Tails made in regards to that news was the same face somebody who just got shot with a gun would make. He even stumbled back as if he'd been shot, and his fur was standing up on end, too. "Fi-fi-fi-five th-thousand, huh...?"

"The wallet was five hundred, too, so not to add to your burdens, but..." That was a lie. The wallet had only been eighty dollars. But who was he to stand in the way of profit and the future of the Republic?

"Five hundred for a wallet!?"

Sorun shrugged. "It was a birthday gift." Was made of real fake leather, too.

Nearby, within the group of Mobians she was conversing with, Nicole had stopped talking and went dead still the moment the word "birthday" spoken in Sorun's voice reached her audio receptors. Her ears had flicked backwards towards his direction, and after her head spun so quickly towards him that, were the body organic, the head would have twisted right off.

"Look," Sorun continued, completely oblivious of the lynx staring intently at him, "if you don't want to actually pay it's cool, man. It don't care too much about it for it to matter all that much."

"No, no, it's..." Tails sighed, rubbing at the temples of his head. "Look, maybe I can talk to my mom about it or something. Or I could just make... I dunno, I'll figure it out."

"Yeah, no, that's cool. 'S cool," Sorun said, hands in pockets as he watched Tails spin up his tails and fly away. And as he turned his head to watch the fox fly away he'd noticed that, funnily enough, Nicole was standing there. Her back turned to Sorun but also with her startlingly far away from the rest of the group while being really close to him. Hands folded in front of her and ears perked up unusually high.

Sorun blinked, and then tilted his head at the odd behavior. He couldn't really figure out why it was she was just standing her like that, like she'd been just kind of... standing there, listening to Sorun and Tails speak. He was about to ask her when she turned her head and decided to speak first.

"Oh, hello, Sorun," she greeted. "I trust you're having a good time?"

"Er, yeah?" He looked around a bit. It was just the two of them standing there. "It's nice, doing this. It was great of Sally to invite us all along for her birthday."

"Yes. Speaking of birthdays, I happened to overhear you talking about one with Tails."

Oh. This is what this was about. It was red alert time again. "Yeah, we were just talking about stuff. Wasn't anything important."

The smile Nicole had dimmed a bit. "Are you sure?" she asked. "Can I ask what the topic-?"

The master of deflection interrupted her with a wave of his hand. "Eh, it was just about some lost stuff I was talking about with Tails, nothin' serious."

"I could assist if there is something-"

"Nope, all good. Thanks anyways."

"If... if you say so." She didn't even try to hide the visible disappointment from her face, or the way her ears drooped at bit as a result. They perked right back up when she noticed the small structure standing behind Sorun: his immaculate monument fit to rule a granular kingdom. "What is this?" she questioned, immediately moving over to it and crouching down to get a better look at it.

Ah, new topic. One Sorun wasn't uncomfortable with. He was happy to answer. "It's a sandcastle. Of the sand variety."

"You made this?"

"Well, Tails helped. He carried the water. But otherwise, yeah, I made it."

"It's...!" She really did seem to be examining Dave's sandcastle in depth. Moving her head all around the structure, green eyes darting left and right as they scanned the structure. "The dimensions are near-perfectly symmetrical, the walls and parapets evenly spaced, everything about its overall aesthetic is... you constructed such a thing out of sand and rudimentary tools?"

Sorrun glanced down at the plastic bucket and small shovel sitting nearby. Rudimentary? Maybe by her standards, but he wouldn't use that kind of word with those tools. Whole civilizations were built on shovels. It was almost insulting calling them rudimentary.

"Sorun, you should have told me!" Nicole's voice made Sorun look back at her. She was smiling at him widely for some reason, practically beaming with pride. "I didn't know you could sculpt so flawlessly!"

Ah, that's where the confusion was. Now it all made sense to him. "Oh, no, I can't," he corrected her. "I can't sculpt to save my life. I can only exclusively make sandcastles. That specific one, actually."

The beaming pride dimmed down to near nothingness. In its place was the look of hopeless confusion Nicole was now adopting as she looked at Sorun. "I-I don't understand what you mean by that." It was obvious from her face, the slight twitches to her features, that she was trying to piece together the statement she just heard, but she was having difficulty making sense of it. "Surely if you could make something like this your skills-"

"Nope. Only sandcastles," Sorun said. "I can do sandcastles and nothing else."

"But... but that doesn't..." It was almost like the logic was causing Nicole pain just trying to figure it out. The distress continued as a particularly large wave rolled in and washed over Dave's sandcastle. Walls crumbled and were washed away. Rooftops collapsed as the structure became unstable. All too quickly the once great monument was transformed into nothing but a malformed ruin as the wave receded back into the water. Somewhere else in the world the land flooded as the planet wept at its loss.

"Ah, well, easy come easy go," Sorun said. Nicole said nothing, electing to simply look at the ruined sandcastle with a completely lost expression on her face. "So how's the beach going for you, Nicole?" Sorun asked.

"Hm?" Whatever was going on with her must have been severe, because even after Sorun spoke out she continued looking down at the sandcastle with that lost expression. Then she shook her head, looking extremely dissatisfied at whatever conclusion she'd come to before looking back up at him. "Oh, yes. The beach." Her smile seemed to return as the conversation shifted away from the topic of the sandcastle. In fact, Nicole seemed to be taking great, concerted efforts to not even look at the remains of the sandcastle, and stepped around it so she was closer to Sorun with the destroyed castle behind her. "I'm having a wonderful time, thank you for asking," she continued. "I like being here. It's an interesting new perspective to experience the beach in person."

He heard a small rustling sound and looked down. She was moving her toes through the sand, letting them shift through the spaces between. He remembered when they first arrived on the beach he'd seen her jump from the moment her feet first touched the sand for the first time. She spent five minutes after the fact standing there, just looking at her feet, with Sorun snickering all the while. It was another moment he lamented the loss of his phone.

"I could fill a small spot in the house full of sand if you want," Sorun offered.

Nicole's smile froze. "Please don't." He didn't know why but for some reason that didn't sound very much like a request to Sorun. He shrugged and decided to let the matter drop.

"Alright." He gaze traveled upwards. With the sun sitting there so bright he once more was thankful for his choice of dress for the occasion. He didn't want to imagine roasting in his immaculate coat and was glad he'd just come with the shorts and t-shirt. Nobody else had really done the same, on account of the fact that pretty much all of his Mobian friends already wore a strikingly small amount of clothes to begin with. He saw that Bunnie left the short jacket she usually wore behind and Antoine traded out what he normally wore for shorts and a shirt like Sorun did and that was literally it.

And Nicole did the same. Wearing the same purple dress-robe-wrapping thing as always. It didn't matter, he guessed. The important part was that she was here and having a great time. That was most important. He wasn't at all disappointed she hadn't attempted to change into something more beach appropriate. Or that she was the one percent of Mobians in the world that didn't walk around practically naked. Usually a positive in Sorun's eyes but this was a case where it wasn't.

"So you're just gonna keep wearing that?" Sorun asked. "Not, uh, nothin' else? It is the beach."

Nicole just smiled and shook her head. "I'm completely fine as-is. Why do you ask?"

Clearing his throat, Sorun quickly turned his head to the side. "Oh, no reason, just wondering, wasn't- yeah, no, was just a question. Don't look too far into it." His eyes quickly scanned for a distraction. He settled on the ocean itself. "I'm gonna go in there," he said, pointing to the ocean.

"The ocean?"

"I mean it's the beach. It'd practically be a crime not to." He looked back at Nicole. "Did you want to...?" The questioned dragged on as Sorun dared to hope.

Politely, Nicole shook her head. Hope burned once more. Sorun soldiered on and didn't let it show. "No thank you. The handheld's range is limited and I don't want to risk something happening. I've made concerted efforts to keep it and myself as far away from the water as possible."

The legitimate safety concern was a good enough distraction for keeping Sorun's mind away from lost bikini dreams. He nodded sagely at her and said, "Alright, that's fair. Well I'm gonna go in anyways. In fact, uh..." He briefly paused and look down at his shorts. His quite-obvious normal shorts and not shorts meant for swimming. "In fact I completely forgot to get- ugh, where's the Chaos Emerald, I gotta dip out for five minutes to buy something from Honey's."

It was hard to conceptualize times like these. Feeling weightless, floating in an endless sea of blue. Staring up at an endless sky of blue with blue eyes. Wearing nothing but a newly-procured pair of blue shorts.

Nothing but blue, blue, blue...

The sensation was weird. Sorun had only ever had one opportunity to do such a thing, just mindlessly floating on his back in the water. But that had been in a public swimming pool so noisy it was impossible to find peace there. Here in the water off the island there were barely any sounds. Just waves and the wind. The distant chatter of all his friends had faded out eventually, just leaving Sorun alone with his thoughts. It was a unique peace. One he didn't prefer to his quiet moments alone with Nicole, but it had its own charms.

Right now his thoughts were mainly on himself. Seeing himself in bright sunlight without a shirt. How so many things had changed.

"Man. I almost look... healthy? What happened?"

Used to be he was an emaciated skeleton. The level below skinny but the one above being actually anorexic. The "Shaggy Special", as it was known on Earth. Little muscle, showing ribs, whole nine yards. It was a stark contrast to the body he'd have whenever using Devil's Body - a perfect specimen of lean, muscular physique. The apex of human form. Literal Adonis bod. Something people worked a lifetime just to sculpt. Of all the powers given up by Sorun that one probably hurt as much as Yamato.

Nowadays it was... better? Still skinny, but more filled out. He would daresay, normal-ish. And he actually felt better these days, too, beyond the emotional aspect. More awake. By all appearances it was a solid improvement.

It was Nicole's fault.

She always fretted over the littlest things, he swore, and he should have known something was up when she'd always been subtlety pushing him to eat more than he usually did. But then... but then she'd had to go and do it. She had to go and open his refrigerator and he had to watch as all the bags of french fries he'd been stockpiling spilled out from it right in front of her.

He didn't think he'd ever forget that accusing glare she gave him.

So after the health rant where he hadn't even been able to get a word in edgewise he'd been diversifying a bit. Half because she seemed genuinely worried and he wanted to relieve that for her sake, half because he wasn't convinced Nicole wasn't sneaking looks inside his fridge when he wasn't aware just to make sure he was actually being truthful with his diet. It got to the point where she'd even come over sometimes to show him all these recipes she found, going all, "I care too much about you for you to jeopardize your health to bad eating habits" and, "It really is for your own good, Sorun, I can give you reading material on the subject if you're truly inclined." He'd managed to dodge vegetables so far but if she ever decided to start cooking for him he was doomed.

"Women, sheesh..."

But the changes he'd undergone on the road to being a functional, healthy human being had been an eye-opener to Sorun, and he had to admit that, once again, Nicole was right. As always. And... maybe a small part of Sorun regretted that her boyfriend's physique was tantamount to a fleshy skeleton.

It was something he'd suspected for a bit, that her attitude had something to do with that, but no, when Sorun looked further into he found she really was just worried about his health and couldn't care less about the rest. In fact nobody cared. It was another one of those Mobian cultural aspects that was completely foreign to Sorun - how visual looks just mattered strikingly little to them as a whole. He suspected it was in part due to the fact that Mobian bodies were so diverse from one another due to all the varying species, doubly so since everyone was compatible with everyone, which was near-opposite from where he'd come from.

Still... as endearing as it was that Nicole, really Mobians as a whole, were so socially progressive with matters like that... well, Sorun wasn't, so he couldn't help but be a bit self-conscious about himself and how Nicole deserved better than his bony ass. So he was somewhat glad he was filling out a bit more. He often wondered what he'd be like if he actually tried to obtain the same physique Devil's Body afforded him - that Adonis bod.

But something like that would require work. Like, a whole lot of work. Sorun didn't want to do that.

But then there was Nicole, and she deserved Adonis bod. The treacherous part of Sorun's mind whispered that there was an easy, effortless way to get that bod - just use a Chaos Emerald to get Devil's Body and he'd have it forever, no work, no muss, just straight to the results. Be the easiest thing in the world.

Of course... he had his health to consider. And he did not think Nicole would ever forgive him for shredding off over a decade of his life just to look hotter - and she wouldn't even see it from that perspective. Plus he needed that Emerald for something already. His job security depended on it.

"Ugh... should I just 'Johnny Bravo' it?" Sorun wondered. "Mf. Sally and Bunnie are fitness nuts, maybe they'd have tips. Amy, too, but... I can't go to her with this. Gossip'd reach the whole town within an hour with her mouth. Ah, but wait, Nicole's really close friends with Sally. And Bunnie. Man, this is already too hard."

Something brushed by Sorun's side, in the water. He'd caught it from the peripheral of his vision. The object looked startlingly similar to a shark's fin.

"I'm going to ignore that. I didn't see that." The memory of what he just saw was already forgotten. "It's for Nicole sake thou- would she even care all that much? Beyond me just looking healthy? Ugh, this really seems like a serious discussion I should have with her, but... yeah, I just won't."

Something brushed by Sorun's foot.

"That didn't happen," he decided. "Eh, then again maybe it wouldn't hurt to at least have some light exercise thing in the morning at the very least. If nothing else then for the health benefits. That's a pretty good balance between laziness and health, right? Yeah, it's gotta be."

Nope, this time he'd seen it for sure when it swam past the side of his head. Shark fin. In full view of his eyes.

"Maybe it's not a shark's fin. Maybe it's a dolphin. They're practically indistinguishable." Sorun rolled his body over so that he was facing the depths below, and then dived under a bit to get a better look.

That proved to be a mistake. It was right there - jaws wide, right in front of Sorun. All he could see were rows of teeth mere inches away from his face in the water. He was pretty sure dolphins didn't have teeth like that which only lead to one conclusion, one that he reached in an instant.

He panicked. Cursed his own ineptitude and rose up through the surface of the water, flailing his arms in the air and screaming. He expected it to happen any second now: to feel a massive bite clamp down somewhere on his body, forcing him to fight off the shark. A shark he didn't think he had much of a chance of beating. It was a Mobius-brand shark, so probably no amount of nose punching would deter it. Sorun'd probably die right here. To a random shark of all things.

Except none of that ever happened. A bite never came. What did come was laughter that wasn't Sorun's voice. Familiar laughter, at that, and when Sorun put a face to the voice he started scowling something fierce. Performing a feat that to most would be moderately impressive seeing as he was floating in water, Sorun turned. Rigidly, near motionless with that scowl affixed to his face at the culprit floating in the water alongside him. Pointing with one hand and holding his laughing head with the other.

And then without so much as a single word Sorun grabbed at Razor's throat with both hands and pushed him under the water in an effort to drown him.

It wasn't working. The shark was still laughing at him, just underwater now. "He can breath water, dammit," Sorun realized seconds later. He let him go when he realized his efforts, while merited, were ultimately futile. All it did was cause Razor to burst back out of the water while still laughing at Sorun.

"Ahahahaha-!"

"Yeah, that's- that's great, man, real great, you, you can stop any time now."

"-hahahahaha-!"

"Any time would be appropriate, now, for instance, but please, by all means."

"-ahahahahah-!"

"My kind turned his into soup," Sorun bitterly thought.

"-hahah...! Man, that was... that was great. I needed that."

"Yeah, it's great you got your jollies out," Sorun replied in an unamused tone, "now you mind answering how it is every time I go out to the ocean I keep finding you? It's the ocean!"

The sharklike grin Razor was holding faltered a small bit. "Because you keep coming back to the same spot?" One of his hands rose up out of the water so he could point in a direction. "Look, the island we met on is literally right over there."

In a move that startled Razor slightly, Sorun's entire body spun around in a complete 180 while still floating in the water. He squinted - oh, yeah, there it was. Even more it was less of a black dot on the horizon and more of a greenish-brownish blob it was so close. Huh.

Sorun spun back around, startling Razor again. "Ocean's smaller than I thought," he said.

"Uh, if you say so." The shark's wide grin returned. "Anyways, hey! I didn't know you'd come back! Did you crash another one of your plane things?"

Irritation played over Sorun's face. "Why you always gotta focus on things like that, huh? On words like 'crashing' and 'me' and other things that don't fit together?" He huffed out a breath and crossed his arms. "And anyways, I'm here 'cause, uh, well no reason, really, we're all kind of just hanging out here 'cause it's my, er, friend's, one of my friend's birthday today."

"... Oh, you mean all those Freedom Puncher guys you said you were friends with?"

Sorun smiled in an amused way. "Yes, Razor. Those words exactly. But what are you doing out here?" he asked.

"Eh, I just wanted to get away from the city for a bit. Like to hang around the area here." He grimaced and turned his head a bit. "Some of the guards were givin' me a harder time than usual. Didn't feel like hanging around."

The light smile Sorun had on died. The fingernails on his right hand itched again. "They're still harassing you?"

"It's not 'harassing', it's... y'know, foreigner, former pirate, all that," Razor said, making a lighthearted chuckle while shrugging his shoulders. It didn't do much to change Sorun's expression, making Razor continue with, "Look, I wouldn't be comfortable, either, so I kinda get it. My friends are still lookin' out for me. Sister ain't. She's, er... still in jail. You know. With all the others. Won't really see me when I visit."

"... Yeah, sorry, man, I don't really have anything to contribute to that one," Sorun admitted.

"I getcha." Razor made an awkward cough and rubbed the back of his head. "So, um. How have you been?"

"Some stuff happened, but otherwise I've been... well, better off than I've ever been since coming here, actually," Sorun admitted. He glanced around at the water around them, and then realized something. "You didn't bring your Chao with you, did you?"

"'Course I did!" Razor happily replied with a wide grin. Sorun just barely resisted sighing and palming his own face. "He goes wherever I go! Why?"

"He ain't here. He on the island?"

"Probably!"

"Okay." Maybe wasn't the big deal, but Virgil was there with all the rest of them and he didn't know what that kind of meeting would bring about. And he guessed all the others would wanna meet Razor, anyways, so Sorun turned towards the island and- "Whoa, wait, why's it so far!?"

He'd been, like, right off the coast of the beach when he'd began mindlessly floating in the water. Not even five meters away from the shore. Now it looked like he was a hundred meters away from the island, maybe even two! And he wasn't even facing the right side of the island where all the others were!

Noting his confusion, Razor responded with, "Oh, yeah, the currents in these parts are kinda strong. Surprised you went in without knowing that, actually. I'd think it'd be kind of dangerous with your whole 'can't breath water' thing." He turned to face Sorun. "Did you ever get that fixed, by the way? Just seems weird."

"That ain't a thing you can fix , man," Sorun bemoaned, staring off towards the island. "Freakin' currents, man, how do they work...?"

The beach, Virgil concluded, was boring.

Nothing to do. Nowhere interesting to go. No one to fight. Nowhere to sleep - this sand stuff was just as irritating a substance as the first time he'd went to one with Sorun when he crashed them on that other island for some reason. It was terrible. He couldn't comprehend why anybody would want to spend time here.

Which was why he was so confused looking around and seeing all the other Mobians having a great time. Somehow . Here, of all places. A place where enjoyment shouldn't be possible. They were somehow enjoying this wasteland.

He'd bug Sorun about it but he wandered off somewhere and Virgil couldn't find him.

The Chao's head picked up suddenly. Maybe it wasn't a complete waste being here, because something was rushing up on him from behind. Wasn't hard to get out of the way, quickly zipping to the side to dodge what just tried tackling him. The silver-horned Chao's mood instantly became elated when he saw who it was. One of his own kind, an evolved one like him, but more importantly he'd recognized the green and black colors. The one joined with that one shark Mobian in the same way he was joined with Sorun. Crusher.

Crusher was fun. Crusher could actually put up a fight and be amusing. Crusher didn't whine and cry like the unevolved trash joined with the young rabbit Mobian. He was actually fun to be around as opposed to that bowtie-wearing weakling.

Wearing a stern, yet lighthearted and amused frown, Virgil had spoken in the language only their kind seemed to understand. "Chao chao-chao, chao chao chao chao-chao."

("You still haven't learned that doesn't work, even after all this time. Yet you try.")

The words seemed to fall on completely deaf ears when the green and black Chao whirled around, manic grin on his face. "Chao-chao chao!"

("Doesn't matter! Still gonna getcha!")

He wouldn't. But it was nice he was so spirited.

And thus, there they went, colliding into each other, rolling around in the sand as one Chao tried to force the other to submit. The coarseness and overall terrible feeling of sand didn't even register with Virgil at the time; why did sand matter at all when something fun was finally happening? The stares of all the other Mobians around didn't even matter to Virgil, even if everyone stopped to stare. He couldn't really blame them. This had to be better than whatever they were all doing to amuse themselves in that wretched sand.

"Uh... is, uh, is anyone gonna stop... whose Chao even is that?" Sonic wondered aloud, watching the display with wide, startled eyes. "I mean, that's... that's Sorun's Chao, it'll probably really hurt him."

Before anybody could respond there was another sound: the sound of a body crashing through the nearby brush and then landing face-first on the beach's sand. One only needed a momentary glance to tell it was Sorun lying in the sand. And then in the next instant he'd pushed himself up, shaking loose sand out of his hair while exhaling an exhausted breath.

"Ugh! Finally!" he groaned out, rising up to his feet as he brushed the remainder of the sand off his body. "Flippin'... swimming all that way and the mini-jungle... agh. I hate currents." He looked up, locking eyes on the two Chao wrestling in the sand - and then made a loud groan once again while rising a hand up to cover his face. "You gotta be kiddin', I rushed all the way here for nothing. They're just playing around."

When Razor burst out of the foliage next to Sorun, everyone just stared. Mostly in mild surprise and interest, though Razor himself had the same reaction multiplied a hundredfold seeing the entire group of Mobians spread out in front of him. He'd looked at all of them excitedly, pointing at them while looking at Sorun and asking, "Oh, are those all those Freedom Puncher guys you keep talking about!?"

The mute interest morphed into stunned surprise on everyone faces. Sally was the worst off; she looked mortified hearing that. And for Sorun's part, all he could do was laugh.

The time had come.

An opportunity like this was one that appeared only once in a lifetime. Some people didn't even get the opportunity, such was how rare this moment was. As such even thinking of squandering the opportunity was nothing less than a crime against life itself. And Sorun tried to not be a criminal.

He sighed, hands folded behind his head as he looked over towards the beach. Some of the others were missing, having gone off... somewhere, he wasn't sure where, but most were there. After the initial shock of his appearance wore off most of them wanted to talk to Razor since apparently nobody had much experience with aquatic Mobian culture. Sally had been the most interested one and had been asking the most questions when she wasn't glaring at Sorun out of the corner of her eye, like it was his fault he kept calling them Freedom Punchers because he didn't bother correcting Razor because he thought it'd be funny.

Nevertheless. It was keeping them busy, which meant Sorun had a chance to sneak off from the main group to fulfill a lifelong dream every aspiring man had. He'd be a fool to waste such an opportunity.

"This truly seems unnecessary, Sorun..."

Of course she had to be a naysayer to the aspiring dream. Sorun lowered his arms back to his sides and turned his head to Nicole, who was standing besides him. "This is the most necessary thing we will ever do in this relationship."

"It's just..." She was rubbing at her arm and looking away, wearing that extremely apprehensive look and yet wearing that reluctant and amused smile. She was digging the idea, or at least considering it. She'd outright deny Sorun if she was completely against it. "We have a home we can do this sort of thing in. With walls. And privacy."

"Look, Nicole," Sorun began, "you're always going on about how you want to experience now things, yeah? This is one of those things people do."

"You're goading me using past behaviors," she accused, but that nervous, apprehensive smile wasn't disappearing. "I don't see why... just tell me why it would be any different here than-"

"Because it's a tropical island," Sorun explained, as if that alone was explanation enough. "Making out in a tropical paradise setting is a wholly different experience to just doing that at home, and I don't know if we'll ever get this opportunity again so we need to strike now while the iron's hot and everyone's distracted. It's basic science."

"It is not," she firmly denied. "There is no scientific foundation to these claims of yours. And I really don't know why you must phrase it like that..." She was tapping her arms with her fingers in a nervous manner, and Nicole's face had grown flustered. It was a rare day he managed to make that happen.

"But you don't know because you've never done something like that in this kind of setting," Sorun challenged. He was grinning in a very much opposite manner to how Nicole was apprehensively smiling, but he knew he was getting through to her from the very obvious lack of any variation of the word "no" on her part. "You need data to ascertain these sorts of claims. Data that can only be accrued through personal experience, Nicole. We have to kiss in this tropical paradise to prove or disprove my hypothesis that it's a different experience. It's for science , Nicole, and you love science. You wouldn't want to deny the science, would you?"

Her head sharply turned towards him. "This has nothing to do with science and you know it," she accused. "You're twisting words to try and make this course of action sound reasonable when it is not."

Shrugging, Sorun said, "Weeell technically speaking chemistry is a science so-"

"Sorun...!" She couldn't even look at him she seemed so flustered, and she had to resort to holding the side of her face with a hand. But at the very least he knew he hooked her with the scientific intrigue, because she had this certain look in her eyes that Sorun had grown accustomed to that told him he'd already won her over. Those same eyes had darted over to their group of friends nearby on the beach. "But all of our friends are here, Sorun, and if any of them were to accidentally come across us doing that I'd-"

"Nicole, Nicole, it's fine," Sorun assured her, waving a hand aside to ease her worries, "I talked to Razor on the way here and apparently he's super familiar with the island. There's all sorts of spots he told me about that nobody would ever find us in. We're in the clear!"

Because he needed this to happen. Because it was every man's fantasy to kiss the girl of their dreams on a tropical island. Dave had said as much to Sorun one time. That a true man needed the perfect setting to kiss the girl to express their true feelings. He'd gone on and on about how it was one of his greatest desires if he ever met a girl he liked enough to make that kind of commitment - to kiss her on a tropical island.

Well, Dave was gone along with everyone else on Earth, but Sorun was still alive to carry on the dream. He didn't want to tell Nicole this; didn't want to inadvertently guilt trip her into going along with it and ruin the mood. Had to be of her accord to set the mood, but that part was already taken care of, because despite of how vocal she was against it that smile combined with the looks she kept giving him said enough, and the moment he said he knew of spots they could do this in secret without being discovered she looked completely agreeable to the idea.

The dream would be fulfilled.

And... well, he did just genuinely want to kiss her since there wasn't a bunch more going on at the moment.

"Fine, Sorun, we can... convene somewhere. Privately. If you truly know of a location where we assuredly won't be discovered." There it was. She was smiling more openly now. Only hints of apprehension remained on her face. "But only for a few minutes. Just long enough that the others won't begin wondering where we went and come looking for us. Five at the most."

A bit of disappointment made its way on Sorun's face. "Wha- seriously not eve ten min-?"

"Five minutes."

"Five minutes, okay, sure." He'd take it. Arguing further would only serve to jeopardize the dream and he didn't want to pressure her any further anyways. He never reacted anymore whenever Nicole just grasped his hand without any warning, but it still made him feel a bit warm inside when they both walked further into the island brush, away from all the others.

If nothing else, the sights were pretty. And mostly green, but while they were walking around Nicole kept glancing around at all the plants around them. Never made any idle comments or pointed out anything in particular, but he caught her eyes tracking some of the plants they'd passed by.

The plants weren't all that interesting to him. All except for what was up ahead: a small alcove in the brush surrounded by a curtain of vines hanging off from the trees above. Unless one were to push their way past the vines nobody would be able to see whatever was on the inside. For all intents and purposes it was the perfect hiding spot.

The absolute... perfect... spot.

"The perfect spot," Sorun vocalized in whispered awe when the pair had stopped in front of the curtain of vines.

"... Sorun, truly?" Nicole didn't sound in awe at all. More slightly amused but mostly skeptical. "I understand you wanted to be a bit adventurous, but this is-"

"The perfect spot." There was no denying it. Complete coverage. Out of the way. On a tropical island. There was no better spot that would suffice.

"You've certainly said as much." With the hand not holding Sorun's own Nicole palmed her own face to hide the amused smile that had grown. "Very well, just... I'm not exactly sure how we're to-"

"You don't need to know anything when you've found the perfect spot, Nicole," Sorun explained when he reached out towards the vines. "It's like, uh, it's like when you do stuff without really thinkin' about it so ya just do it," he continued as he moved the vines aside, "so in this instance we'd-"

There were people in the perfect spot.

The perfect spot was compromised.

More specifically it was Knuckles standing there. Julie-Su was standing there, too, right next to him. Both were standing rigid and staring at the pair of them with wide eyes. Coincidentally Sorun and Nicole were doing the exact same thing, even holding the same postures. It was a solid ten seconds of awkward silence before Knuckles cleared his throat to speak.

"Uh..." His eyes darted between Sorun and Nicole and landed on Sorun. "So, uh, wow, you two-?"

"'Splorin'," Sorun automatically replied without any thought.

"Exploring?" Knuckles repeated.

"Exploring," Sorun confirmed. "What, uh... what're you two doing here?"

Both the echidna looked at each other before looking back at Sorun. "Just exploring, you know?" Knuckles said.

"Exploring?"

"Exploring."

"Yeah?"

"Mhm, yeah."

"Ah. Okay." Slowly, movements robotic, Sorun began to move the vines to re-obstruct the view of the interior of the alcove. "Just gonna... put these back."

"Alright," came Knuckles stilted voice from the inside of the alcove. And that was the end of that conversation once they disappeared from sight.

"..." Nicole blinked a few times at the vines and then looked questioningly at Sorun. "What was that?" she asked.

He didn't respond. He just wordlessly took her hand and guided her further into the brush.

Dave had been right, it seems. The way to the true man's dream was found through kissing your girlfriend somewhere on a tropical island. Why else would Knuckles be all the way out there? In the middle of nowhere, away from the others? With a girl?

Good for him, but that left Sorun without a viable path to fulfill the true man's dream entrusted to him by Dave. As of yet . There had to be more than one hidden spot here somewhere, Razor had said there were tons, and Sorun was determined to find another one yet.

Nicole seemed increasingly puzzled by the lengths Sorun was going through but was going along with it nonetheless if only to satisfy his whims.

"You know what? I was wrong. This is the perfect spot," Sorun claimed once they'd found the true perfect spot. A waterfall. Not an overly huge one, just a small stream running off a mound of rocks. But behind that waterfall was the obvious makings of a cave - a sight only one with the trained eyes of a gamer could ever spot. "It's thematic and everything, Nicole, it can only enhance the experience."

The grip in Sorun's hand was limp by now. Once more she sent him a questioning look that conveyed just how mystified she was with the entire experience thus far. "A hidden cave behind a waterfall is thematic for us?" she echoed. "In what way?"

Gesturing to the waterfall, Sorun answered with, "'Cause they always hide stuff behind waterfalls in video games. And we're gamers, so, like, it's perfect."

Yes. Truly. That other spot? Nothing but a random assortment of vegetation. Knuckles could have it to do whatever he was doing with Julie-Su. This spot had everything. Atmosphere, significance, sound dampening from the running water. It was better by a factor of ten, maybe even eleven. There was no way they could leave this island without kissing in there.

"I've yet to encounter that particular trope in games. Perhaps it's a quirk from the games of your old home." She made a small sighing sound and released Sorun's hand. "If you truly think this is that important then by all means we can, but can you do me the favor of at least looking in there first to see if it's suitable?" She looked around a bit, paying attention to some of the plants hanging off the rocks nearby. They had colorful orange and yellow flowers growing out of them. "I want to stay behind for a bit to examine some of the local flora."

"Alright, sure." He was already moving towards the waterfall while Nicole stayed behind to look at all the flowers. He couldn't begrudge her that, it was new things to look at and he doubted she could really resist cataloging all the plants she saw to memory, but he had more things to worry about than plants. Like scouting out the true perfect spot to ensure it was as perfect as it looked. He didn't have any doubts, though, because there was no way-

"Wait..." Sorun stopped, right at the front of the waterfall, inches away from the mouth of the cave. There were sounds, sounds beyond the rushing water right in front of his face. Voices. Indistinguishable in both the words those voices were saying and how many there were, but voices were voices. But more startlingly was the fact in addition to the voices he heard... high-pitched giggling! "No, no, no!"

An alarmed Sorun burst through the waterfall, nearly sprinting into the cave in a mad dash to confirm his fears. Those fear were realized when he saw two distinctly yellow bodies in the cave. He wasn't sure what happened next - he'd been rushing too fast and the movement in front of him had been too frantic to make out, but by the time he came to a stop he was face to face with Charmy. Just... floating there, right in front of Sorun. With his hands folded behind his back and the guiltiest smile Sorun had ever seen plastered on his face.

"H-hey! Sorun! It's so weird seeing you here, what do you know! Ha ha!" Oh, the poor guy. It was so obvious what had been going on Sorun couldn't poke fun at it. It was just too sad. He'd feel nothing but pity if he weren't currently embroiled in unyielding rage on the inside for the perfect spot behind occupied. "So what are you doing here?" the bee asked rather quickly.

He was too tired and distraught to tease. With a resigned breath and sunken eyes, Sorun tonelessly said, "I heard some noises and grew concerned." He looked a bit to the side. He wasn't at all surprised to see Saffron hiding behind a rock and poking her head out to look at him. Sorun lethargically turned his eyes back to Charmy. "It would seem, however, my fears of danger were unfounded. You and Saffron were just exploring this cave. Absolutely nothing else to note, it seems."

Rapidly, Charmy nodded. "Yep, yeah, completely! Totally! Just us looking around, y'know, 'cause this island's so neat and she wanted to-"

Goddamn it all. "Look I'm just gonna leave. This didn't happen. I wasn't here. Just...-" Exhaling through his nose Sorun shook his head and turned around, "-pretend this didn't happen, alright?"

He didn't hear Charmy respond as he exited the cave and passed the waterfall. Honestly, he couldn't blame him; a situation like that was so awkward it was natural to look for a way out, to turn the other way and forget about it as quick as possible. Sorun'd do the exact same thing. He was happy to leave the matter alone as quick as possible, in fact.

Didn't change the fact his will was being crushed at a worryingly alarming rate, because dammit, that spot had been so primo. So much, in fact, that Sorun knew, deep within his soul, that there could possibly be no spot on the island that was as good as that one. Not without the hidden waterfall chamber. He wasn't even sure he wanted to do this anymore if the best spot on the island got swept on up from right under Sorun's feet, but, well... the embers were still burning within him. The dream wasn't quite dead yet.

"Ah, you've returned," Nicole commented when he returned back to her side. "Sorun, a quick question. Do you think your shark friend is knowledgeable of the names and classifications of the genus of plants we keep finding here? A number of these flowers have unique characteristics and traits I want to file away for future reference and I'm not wont to try and classify something as important as species of flora if official labels already exist."

Sorun made a noncommittal grunt. To most that would mean nothing. Fortunately for Nicole she knew him well enough to understand he was greatly upset at something and didn't have the mental fortitude necessary to formulate an articulate response. That specific grunt meant that he didn't know and would ask Razor later.

"I see," she said, nodding. "Was something wrong with the cave?"

"..." He looked up at Nicole with hollow, vacant eyes. "The spot is compromised."

This, Nicole did not understand. "Pardon?" she asked, visibly confused.

Sorun didn't elaborate. He merely took her hand once more, and continued on further into the island. Nicole wordlessly followed, more for his sake than anything else.

Maybe in the end it was all a pipe dream. A stark, unreachable goal only meant for those who struggled to obtain it to struggle in vain. All except for the people that actually seemed to be accomplishing it because they'd acted faster than Sorun on this.

Damn it all. There had to be something.

"Maybe here?" he wondered. It was a rather innocuous-looking spot he'd found after some wandering. Some tall rocks surrounded by a gathering of palm trees. Slightly uncomfortable, maybe, but... well, it was hidden. And really, could it be any worse than making out in a cave? On the hard rock? On second thought, yes, this had to be much better than a cave. What was thematic ambiance to the padding of actual ground?

He looked in the other direction. He wasn't even sure Nicole cared anymore - she was crouching down near some plants and examining more flowers. At this point Sorun wouldn't even be surprised that half the reason she was putting up with this was because they kept finding interesting-looking plants along the way and she was just using the excuse to look around. Couldn't really blame her, in fact he was happy she was having a good time, but dammit, what about him? What about his dream? Dave's dream?

A quiet laugh broke Sorun's thoughts and made his head whip towards the newest spot he'd discovered. A laughing voice. Two voices, actually. A female voice and a male voice. The male one was noticeably French-sounding.

"Son of a bitch."

There wasn't any surprise on Sorun's face when he leaned past a gap in the rocks to look inside the small spot. Absolutely no surprise when he saw Antoine and Bunnie sitting rather closely towards one another, arms around each other. He didn't get a laugh out of the way they were frozen and staring owlishly at him. He didn't even know what he was supposed to feel at this point.

"Er... hi, Sorun," Bunnie awkwardly greeted. She'd untangled her arms off of Antoine and looked to the side in an embarrassed manner. "We was just, uh, lookin' around, y'know, all curious-like, an'-"

"Bah, I'm not ashamed enough to caramel-coat it," Antoine interrupted, shaking his head. He actually looked a bit defiant when he turned his body towards Sorun and crossed his own arms. In a weird way it felt a bit refreshing to the human. "Sorun, we are a married couple who are very much loving each-"

"Save it, man, I ain't gonna ruin your little mack-on fest here." Evidently Antoine didn't understand what Sorun just said, because he looked at him in confusion. Bunnie looked like she did, though. She was trying to hide as much of her face behind the sunhat she'd brought along as possible. "I'm leaving. This didn't happen."

"Oh. Uh... okay." Antoine blinked, like he hadn't expected this to go this way. Or be resolved this easily. "Then-"

But it was too late. Fed up with it all, Sorun had already gone.

The dream truly was a futile thing in the end, it seemed.

"I don't know, Nicole, I just wanted... I dunno." They'd settled on sitting next to each other, both resting against a palm tree on the beach. It was a mutual agreement that exploring the forest was done, on Nicole's part for having seen all she wanted to see and on Sorun's part for giving into the futility of achieving the dream. "Just a nice moment or something we could share," Sorun glumly continued as he threw a small stone into the sand.

Nicole glanced over at him. "We have many moments together," she pointed out. "I don't see how this was supposed to be any different from all the other times."

"Would have been unique? I dunno. I just thought it'd make a nice memory."

"And this isn't one? A nice memory?" Sorun thunked his head on the back of the tree when he heard the teasing tone Nicole had grown.

"I'd thought we were all having a wonderful time here, but it seems I was mistaken."

Sorun crossed his arms and shifted a bit where he was sitting. "Not saying it isn't a good memory. Just could have been a bit better is all I'm saying."

"Hmm. Fine."

He was about to ask what that was supposed to mean, but then he'd seen Nicole lean over to where he was sitting. And then she'd quickly pecked him on the cheek before moving back to where she'd been sitting prior.

By all accounts it was the most chaste kiss he could have possibly gotten, but at this point Sorun would take it. Even if it meant he had to look away from Nicole out of sheer embarrassment. It still made him happy. It counted.

"I did it, Dave. I did it."

"Well?" Nicole asked, sounding expectant. "Did it live up to everything you were hoping for?"

"... Well, you always outperform my expectations," Sorun mumbled as he rubbed at the spot on his cheek he'd been kissed. "But nah, it felt about the same." Not that he was expecting some heretofore unfelt emotion due to a simple switch in location from the normal locale, but he'd been open to being surprised. For the dream to be more than just a dream, even if attainable. Still worth it.

"I told you so it would be like this, Sorun," Nicole stated. She crossed her own arms and put on a self-satisfied, smug look. "And you had us traipsing through all of that jungle, too."

"You liked looking at the plants, you can't complain," Sorun shot back. She didn't refute it, but when Sorun glanced at her she was still holding that smug smirk. He rolled his eyes, shook his head, and stood up to his feet. "Alright, well, we're having a huge bonfire and I gotta go help Razor track down a bunch of dead wood." He pocketed his hands in his pockets, mumbling off to the side, "Offered to just cut down some trees with my sword that can cut through anything, but nooo, gotta preserve the environment..."

"It's good to do things like that, Sorun, yes."

His eyes snapped down at Nicole. She wasn't even looking at him; just sitting there, eyes closed while still holding that smirk. He couldn't say anything as a good comeback. She'd won too thoroughly. "Er, yeah, I guess," he'd simply said in reply as he turned around to walk away. "See you later."

"If the kiss was that disappointing we can always try again when we go home."

His footsteps sped up a little bit. He could he felt that smug grin burning a hole in his back as he fled away from Nicole.

Okay, so it wasn't much of a bonfire. More a campfire. A modest campfire at that in the middle of the beach. As it happened there wasn't all that much wood on the island, and with the risk of invoking the wrath of his friends present he elected not to cut down any of the healthy trees. So he and Razor had tried - they really did. But this is what they came up with in the end.

A modest pile of sticks they were gonna set on fire later. Might last them a half hour if they were lucky.

"I still don't get why you guys mess around with this fire stuff," Razor huffed out when he tossed the last handful of sticks on the pile. "That stuff burns, you know?"

Sorun paused from unfolding one of the folding chairs the others brought as he looked up at the shark. "Is this one of those underwater things I don't understand because I breath too much air?" he asked as he set the chair down. "You... you cook food, right?"

"The, er... the others I used to ride with did," Razor said, "but I never got it. Sis didn't, either."

"I mean, I can respect eating raw meat. In that same vein of thought I can't respect salmonella, though. So yeah." And that was just Earth standard. He didn't want to risk an encounter with whatever hyper-evolved, Chaos-laden super salmonella was probably running around on this planet.

"What's wrong with salmon? I think it's great."

"God." There was a soft crunching sound as Sorun stabbed the legs of chair into the sand beneath him. "Look, it's a species barrier thing, alright?" he continued as he looked up at Razor after rubbing at his eyes. "Ocean people like it raw, land people like it cooked, it's just how it is even if we can't understand why the other likes their way of eating so much. It's like a two-dimensional being trying to comprehend a three-dimensional being. It just ain't happening."

With a chair in his own hand, Razor looked up at Sorun before he planted it into the ground. He blinked at him, giving him a look that clearly lacked comprehension for a few seconds before shrugging and planting the chair. "Eh, I don't really understand what you just said, but if you say it then it must be true. You're smart like that."

Smart? That didn't sound right. "What gave you that impression?" Sorun asked as he placed another chair.

"Well, you're the smartest guy I know, so... it makes sense, doesn't it?"

"..." With his eyebrows raised high in disbelief Sorun went back to placing the chairs. "I worry for your people if that's your takeaway," he muttered out.

Having placed the last chair down, Sorun stepped back in admiration of their work. A circle of folding chairs around a pile of sticks amidst the setting sun. Paired with the image of crashing waves in the background and the orange lights from the setting sun dancing along the ocean's surface, it was... certainly one of the better sights Sorun had seen in his life.

"Huh..." Razor had traced Sorun's eyes to the sight he was looking at. From the serene look on his face it was hitting him about as hard as it was hitting Sorun. "Y'know, sights like these are pretty much half the reason I bother coming up here. You don't get stuff like this under the surface of the ocean."

"Hrm. Move to the surface," Sorun suggested, without hesitation. "You'd get to see this every day and you wouldn't have to deal with the people in your city. In fact just move to the city I live in. There's room."

"Eh-heh, yeah, that'd probably be nice." Razor had laughed it off in a tone that suggested he took what Sorun had said as a small joke. It caused him to frown a bit. It hadn't been a joke. "Couldn't really leave my friends, though."

"Bring them."

"Nah. One of my friends really likes the temple she looks after. Don't think she'd leave it for anything." Razor turned to Sorun and approached his side. he pulled something out from a small pouch strapped to his waist - afterwards he tossed it to Sorun. "Anyways, here. Check out what I found."

Sorun caught the object midair and looked down to examine it. A cursory glance revealed it to be a yellow fruit of some kind dotted with green spots. "What's this?" he asked.

"Dunno!" Razor grinned and gave him a shrug. "These fruits all grow on the islands around here. Everyone back home likes 'em enough so whenever I'm around I bring some back with me. Try it!"

"Hm." Well, he was kind of hungry. And exotic, tropical fruit was exotic, tropical fruit. If Razor vouched for it that was good enough for him. "Hey, if you say so."

Sorun bit down into the fruit.

His pupils dilated.

Did anyone ever look up into the sky and think to themselves... man?

Like... like cloud watching, but into the soul. Soul watching. Like the sky was a mirror and all of Sorun was up there looking down on him along with the other million and a half colors swirling up there.

It was questions like these that would baffle even the most studious of philosophers, would stump the greats like Play-Doh and Scrotumtease, that'd been whirling through Sorun's mind at a million snails a minute ever since he ate that fruit Razor gave him. He didn't know what the fuck was in that fruit, but it was eye-opening. Literally. He felt the third eye in his brain opening up, and it was... it was dark in there. There wasn't light in his skull. Maybe that's why he couldn't see out of it.

Could Tails put a lightbulb in his skull? He'd, he'd ask. One day.

There were a bunch of noises, too, but what even was noise? His brain told him noise was vibrations in the air picked up by the cochlea organ in his inner ear within a range of twenty hertz to twenty kilohertz which converted those vibrations into electrical signals interpreted by the brain as noise. But when did he ever listen to his brain?

"Are his eyes supposed to be all big like that?"

"Razor, what did you give him!?"

"I-I thought it was harmless! Everyone from where I'm from eat these things and nothing like this ever happens! I ate one before I gave him the other one!"

"He can't handle mild substances!"

"R... really? 'Cause they make baby food outta this, too."

"We all figure his tolerance for pretty much everything is nonexistent, it's... it's a human thing, we don't really know. I think we can fix it, though. Nicole, can you...?"

"I'm already looking for it, Sally. Does anybody know where he left it?"

"He left it half-buried in the sand over there because he got too tired of carrying it around. I'll show you where."

"Thank you, Tails."

See? The brain was nothing but pain.

Except it wasn't anymore. Oh, it'd been there - that deep, gray fog weighing everything down that only grew more and more oppressive the longer he stayed here. And then he found out everything he knew was gone, washed away in invisible fire, and his body was chained beyond the fog. Into the great nothingness.

He felt nothing. Nothing mattered. Anything was nothing. Hey, Nicole was visiting again. Why was he bothering to breath when there was nothing left?

But that was gone! It's over! There's stuff again! No fog or chains or darkness. Stuff . Tangible, edible stuff. 'Cause... 'cause he had money? Yeah, 'cause of the job he had.

Holy fucking shit, he had a job now, and a house he could call his own. He wasn't a total failure and a waste of space anymore like he'd always been. And there was a whole community that actually gave a damn about him. He never even thought things like that even existed. He had friends? And a girlfriend even? And it was Nicole?

God, he was so fucking happy. His life was going so great and he didn't want it to stop. He could just live there like this forever, right? That'd be nice.

"Heeeeey~... you." He didn't even care he was latching onto Antoine like this. He might care, but it was hard to tell since his face was kind of an amorphous blob right now. But nah, he wouldn't care. He was good people. The goodest of people. "You're, you, you're the greatest, man, come here, just, just come here."

It didn't feel as good hugging him as it did hugging the angel lynx computer lady person but that didn't matter. Still warm. Could he just do this forever? Ev- everyone should just do this, the world would be such a gooder place if everyone just hugged their problems out.

God, they took him to the beach with them and he couldn't be happier people cared about this much, he fucking loved them all so much.

"Th-that, that iz nice, Sorun," he heard Antoine say, a bit lighthearted but nervous, as he pulled him off of him. What he sitting in a chair right now? Was that what that was? Oh, he put the chairs there, yeah . "You're a very good friend, too, oui."

"Nah, but, but you're better," Sorun protested. "Not as good as the, the... the nice kissy gamer kitty. She's best." He poked Antoine in what was either his chest of his forehead. "But you're so great, man, I, I don't wanna be around if you're not around, 'cause you're so great 'n' just, man I just like you so much, man, I'd hug all of you if I could but, but like you're here an' everyone else is... like, I don't know where they are. There's oxygen an' stuff keepin' us apart. But invisible, like glass. The invisiblest glass, Antoine, can you believe that? So smooth. So breathable."

"I really do think you are needing to do ze lying down until Nicole comes back with ze Emerald, mon ami."

"I'm so glad I have so many friends like you, Antoine, you're all just the best. Wonderful, all of you. Man, I have so many friends, I... I had more than this? Oh, yeah, the, uh, the one. That one. Yeah."

The coyote he was clutching onto shifted under him. "Sorun?" He sounded more flustered than anything else for some reason. Sorun couldn't imagine why. This was great.

A picture of something he didn't remember appeared. "Mhm, the, uh... that one, her. We were... we was cool." Cool as ice because ice was always cool. But then he broke something and the ice had turned warm. He'd laughed while doing it. "Everything was fine until it wasn't, and then she got real mad and everything got all bright and HOT. But then it was fine!" Sorun cheered out, throwing his arms up. "'Cause I heal good." He felt oddly sad for a moment. "She couldn't heal good."

"I really am not understanding any of zis," Antoine said, now more bemused than anything else, "but I am seeing ze picture. You ate ze strange zing and now are seeing all ze strange zings, non? Imaginary people and ze such."

"Nahhhh, man, it was... she was..." He wracked his brain for an answer. The picture was disappearing, the words evaporating, but the word was... a path to the word was there! "'They're in the net, Command. Send it. Authenticate: Solutions 0-8-1-6.'"

"Okay, Sorun, it iz ze obvious sign zat you are ze spinny-noodle-y type in ze head right now." Sorun giggled when Antoine picked him up and set him down so he was sitting on the soft sand. "Just sit here."

There was another picture. It was that place .

Frantically, like his life depended on it, Sorun grabbed at the collar of Antoine's shirt. His life did depend on it, this was so important, he couldn't believe it, why wasn't he there right now!? "Antoine, I need to go there. The tower. There's something important there, Antoine, it's waiting for me, Antoine it's in the tower I need to go there! I need to go to the tower!"

It was there. It reached up so high into the skies it breached the clouds. It was the only thing left alive.

Gently, Antoine pried Sorun's hands off of him. "Sorun, zere iz no tower," he softly mumbled out. "What tower?"

"It's there, Antoine, it's right there. I need to go in it."

"Why? What's zere?"

"It's... frrrreeedom, Antoine. Truth."

"Okay, Sorun." His hands were softly placed back into his lap by Antoine. "Just please be sitting still and you'll be right as ze raindrops licking splitted."

"That sounds right," Sorun agreed. There was a crunching sound of sand, and he looked towards the source. "Oh, h-hi!"

There were no words. "Radiant" was insufficient. If the words did exist his mind was running a bit too soupish to remember the collection of letters. All he could tell was that the person standing in front of him was bright. Striking. Not just in their features but in their spirit. That's as best as he could describe it. The person in front of him was truly beautiful beyond words. A person whose mere presence was so blinding Sorun was beyond words and could only stare in awed silence. A figure that shone so brightly that the glowy blue thing they were holding in their hand seemed dim in comparison.

He couldn't understand the feeling he felt looking at the person. The feeling of warmth just from being in that light. The sheer joy from being in its direct vicinity. The feeling of sheer devotion he had towards it, like he had to accept this light and this person as an immutable part of his life. Every single fiber of his being was telling him to love and cherish this light. His soul was telling him he should fight anything that ever threatens them. He was pretty sure he had a sword that could help with that, but he forgot where it went.

This person was beautiful. He was compelled to poke them in the face.

"Ha ha." He tried poking the light. It was too bright, and he missed. In reality he was just too far away due to sitting down while the light was standing up and away from him, but Sorun had no possible way at the moment of comprehending what that ordering of words even met. Distance didn't exist.

The light shifted. "Sorun, please take this," it said. The cochlea organs in his ears quivered in pleasure at the sound of the light's voice. He didn't even know light could speak like that. It held out the glowy blue thing, and the first thought he had was that he didn't want that dull piece of shit. He wanted to hold the light forever because things were always great when the light was around and he didn't have to worry anymore and he felt like his life had just a little bit more meaning if it meant he could make the light happy. But he got the sense that the light would be unhappy if he didn't take the blue thing, so he took it.

The blue thing was hard and smooth. Not at all like the light. The light was soft and had fur.

The light... had fur.

God, if light had fur then what the hell was the sun made of? The thought scared Sorun, and he dropped the blue thing as a result.

The light sighed. They crouched down and picked it up, and then placed it in Sorun's hands. He was able to feel the light's hands when they brushed past his.

The hands were everything. The hands of a gamer. An artisan. A coder. A kind and loving person. He was definitely one of these things. Maybe two. Did sandcastles count?

"Now Sorun, can you do something for me?" The light asked him.

"Mmmmmm... hm. Yeah, I'll do anything for you."

"That's nice, Sorun."

"Even tax fraud."

"Don't do that, Sorun, Elias will get mad and I don't want to put you in the jail."

"Alright." Crime was illegal. Couldn't do that. Got it. "But what do you need me to do right now , then?"

"Do you know that one power you have? The one where your hair turns white?" the light softly asked him. "Do you think you could use that? Just for a moment so you can go back to normal?"

"Huh? But... o-oh, wait, you're Nicole! The light's name is Nicole!"

The light named Nicole seemed to need a moment to pause and try to understand what he just said. It gave up, saying, "Yes, Sorun, it's because you needed a minute to remember my name that I need you to fix yourself. That's not normal."

"I mean that body feels great an' all, but..." He looked down and attempted to grab at Nicole the light's wrist. He got lost and grabbed his own wrist by mistake. "But I feel so happy right now, Nicole. Because you're here and everyone's here and everything's great but because you're here everything's greater than great because you're here and I feel great and I don't wanna stop feeling great. I don't want that to go away. Let's just stay like this forever. I'm fine with that."

Nicole patted him on the top of his head like a lost dog, unsure of what else to do in this situation. "You can be happy without being under the effects of whatever was in the fruit Razor gave you that intoxicated you, Sorun," she soothingly said to him. "But I'm happy to learn you have all these feelings, even if it took all of your inhibitions being obliterated by poison to get the words out. Now please cure yourself."

Well, if the light was asking him, he had to obey. To not listen to the light was blasphemous. That was a bad thing, he knew that. "'Kay," he simply said.

Sorun's hair turned white.

He blinked. Reality snapped back to normal.

Currently Sorun was sitting in the sand in front of one of the chairs circling the pile of sticks and and Razor made. Everyone was sitting in a chair except for Nicole, who was staring at Sorun. Actually everyone was staring at Sorun.

He glanced down at the blue Emerald in his hands. He didn't remember everything he just said, but he remembered enough to know the embarrassing parts. "Oh. Huh. Wow. Yeesh. How do I salvage this?"

"I got nothing for ya, bro," Sorun thought.

"Dang," thought Sorun. "Uh... alright, plausible deniability here we go." If he pretended he never said all that vulnerable, mushy stuff then it was the same as it never happening in the first place. That's how it worked.

"What just happened?" Sorun asked, looking back up at Nicole. "I was standing next to Razor and now we're all here. What happened?"

Nicole looked confused at his words. So did everybody else, who glanced at each other questioningly. It was Nicole who spoke. "You don't recall a single thing that happened?" she asked, sounding a bit incredulous.

Damn. She wasn't buying it. "I remember a fruit," he helpfully replied, trying to garner just a bit of credibility for his case. "I remember eating it. Now I'm here. What's with that?"

"... I think I see." She closed her eyes and offered a small smile. Sorun instantly translated that as her knowing he was completely faking not knowing what just happened, but would go along with it anyways for his sake. It was hard to take any solace in this fact because he knew she was going to tease him about it relentlessly when they were alone later. "Razor gave you a sample of some of the local fruit and you fell under a stupor of sorts. I managed to goad you into curing yourself with the Chaos Emerald."

"Oh, wow, really? That's nuts. That's real nuts, guys." Yep, and that was that. No need to dwell on the matter if he didn't remember anything. Case closed and shut. He hopped up one of the remaining empty chairs. "What a wacky adventure, everyone, glad it's over."

Once more everyone glanced around at each other. "We're really not gonna talk about-" Rotor began.

"Nah, nope, nothing to look at." Sorun snapped his gaze to Razor. Miraculously somebody miscounted the amount of chairs they needed and an extra just happened to be brought for him. "Razor, why'd you poison me?"

The shark floundered at the claim. "How was I supposed to know you'd react like that!?" he yelled. "I've seen people eat tons of those things and they turn out fine!"

"Well, that's how it goes, Razor. Mobians get all the biological advantages over humans," Sorun glibly remarked. "But the crisis is averted, so we can all go back to what we were doing before."

Once more everyone stared. Sorun was fairly confident the bead of sweat rolling down the side of his face was imaginary. Phantom sweat.

"... Okay, if ya say so," said Bunnie. Sorun breathed out a sigh of relief as Nicole sat down in the chair next to him. "Jus' try'n watch what ya eat from now on. Wouldn't want any more crazy episodes on our hands."

"Ha ha, yeah, crazy, I-I didn't do anything actually crazy, did I?"

He didn't like that smirk Bunnie grew. Dammit, everyone had it. "Oh, nah, Sorun, you ain't gotta worry 'bout a thing."

Well, it was clear enough to Sorun. Everyone but Nicole bought the memory loss lie. Didn't erase all the stuff he said that he knew they heard. He supposed he should be lucky they were all giving him a break and pretending nothing happened. Except for Sonic, who looked like he wanted to say something about it, but Sally was glaring at him and pinching his shoulder so he was keeping his mouth shut.

Eh. He'd take it.

"So we gonna start this campfire or what?" Sorun asked, desperate to get away from the shame of it all.

Again, everyone looked around at each other, and Sorun felt glad to be a part of the group now. Espio was the one who spoke out.

"Charmy. You did remember to bring the fire starter, correct?" the chameleon asked.

"Why would I pack it?" he asked back. "You're the ninja with all the ninja tools. Shouldn't you have packed it?"

"Does starting a fire truly sound like something a ninja would do?"

"How would I know? I'm not a ninja."

"..." Espio sighed and looked at the rest of the group. "We didn't bring a fire starter," he said.

Groans of disappointment all around. Sonic looked ready to get up off his seat. "Alriiight, I'll rub some sticks together really fast to try and-"

"Nah, hold on, I got it," Sorun interrupted. His hair darkened back to black as he held the Emerald up.

Sonic blinked a bit in confusion, but settled back in his seat. "Er, thanks, Sorun, but you really don't gotta go all the way back home for a fire... huh?"

The hedgehog's eyes widened in surprise. Everyone's did, really, when the Chaos Emerald in Sorun's hand instantly transmuted into a weapon. Not a weapon any of them were familiar. Indeed, it was the first time any of them had ever laid eyes on such a weapon. A... guitar, by the looks of it. A wicked thing covered in sharp edges with a scythe's blade folded inside of it.

"No, not that one," Sorun muttered out. A few small bolts of purple electricity danced along the instrument's strings before the weapon disappeared and turned back into the Chaos Emerald. "Lemme cycle through a few and find something," he said.

The Mobians all around stared on in sheer fascination. The Emerald changed again, this time into a large falchion blade. The hilt seemed to be fused to an engine and there were exhaust tubes jutting out the back of it.

"... Bit too violent, no," Sorun muttered. Another shift. Now he was holding a cleaver-like, serrated sword. The blade itself was dyed red. "Too unruly."

The weapon changed again. This time it was three intricate metal rods, the ends frozen with blue ice. They were all connected to a central metal ring via... vaporized ice, of all things. "This'll work," Sorun claimed.

Before anybody could say anything, he spun the three-headed nunchucks around. They shifted, the ring disappearing and the rods combining into a singular, long staff. The ends glowed orange with heat. And with the nonchalance of somebody sticking a fire poker into a fire, Sorun touched the end of the blazing staff into the pile of sticks.

The sticks alit within a second. The campfire had begun.

"Fixed it," Sorun said. The staff disappeared and the Emerald settled into Sorun's hands once more. "Alright, so where'd we leave the food, 'cause-"

"Whoa whoa whoa, wait up just a second there," Sonic interrupted, waving his hands in front of him to gain Sorun's attention. "What was that thing you just made? Since when have you been able to do that!?"

Sorun quirked an eyebrow at Sonic, and then made a look of understanding. "Ahh, I guess you haven't been paying attention. So I'm a void-type, right, which means I get to turn Chaos energy into all sorts of wacky stuff-"

"No, I get that part, Sorun," Sonic said, a bit exasperated, "I mean all that stuff you did! All the weapons! Since when could you do that!?"

The confusion on Sorun's face didn't fade. "... Since I got the ability to pick the powers and hold Emeralds without absorbing them?" He turned the Emerald into another weapon. This one was a longsword.

The hilt was stylized to look like the blade was jutting out of the mouth of a gargoyle, and the guard was stylized to look like wings. Blue lightning sparked over the blade's surface. "I've got dozens of weapons I can cycle through. This is Alastor."

"And that other one? The nunchuck thing?"

"King Cerberus. Sixty-six percent cooler than normal Cerberus," Sorun said. "Like literally it's the same exact thing but without the lightning and fire configurations. It's pretty useless."

"Okay, wait..." Exhaling through his nose, Sonic started rubbing the sides of his head. "So... so this whole time. You had all these great weapons this whole time but haven't been using them? You didn't think back then any of them would have been useful?"

"Not really." The sword shifted into a metallic suitcase covered in glowing, maze-like yellow lines. There was a three-eyed, fanged skull imprinted in its center, the slit eye sockets glowing yellow. "For one, I didn't get a choice of what I got back then. Second, even if I did I would have just stuck with Yamato. It's the best one. Why would I use any of the others when I already have the best one?"

The answer didn't seem to satisfy Sonic. "But why? If they all have different powers like the one sword-"

"None of them are like Yamato," Sorun interrupted, somewhat firmly. "All of the weapons are... gimmicky. Difficult to use with abilities that don't really measure up to Yamato's. Actually I probably can't even use half of them without the white-haired body; they're too intense for a normal human to use. By contrast Yamato is easier to use. The power's simpler and more flexible, versatile. It's the most efficient. It's... cleaner to use than all the rest." The suitcase shifted into Yamato. He laid it down on his lap, eyes gazing over its form. "You saw me use it against all those robots so you see what I mean. I wouldn't have got nearly as much mileage using any of the other ones. So I stick with Yamato because I never needed any of the others."

It was somewhat of a struggle to not let the phrase "Devil Arm" slip out of Sorun's mouth. But part of him worried how they'd react hearing him call them that, so he let the true title of the weapons go unsaid.

"Besides," Sorun continued as he looked back up at Sonic, "I kind of depend on Yamato to make a livelihood. And I don't really have much pragmatic use for a pair of gauntlets and greaves that'd probably blow my limbs off if I tried using them. And I've got, like, four sets of those."

"Uh... four?" Sonic blinked at that, looking a bit surprised. Everyone did, really - Sorun didn't blame them all that much. He supposed he did just drop a lot of sudden info on them. "Sorun, I figure I gotta ask. Where does all this stuff come from, anyways? Like not just all the weapons but the, er, the powers and everything." He shrugged. "You just always seem super familiar with them all. Even have names for 'em ready and everything. I was just wondering."

Ah, yeah. The origin of all the powers and weapons. Yeah, no way in hell was he ever telling them all he aped them from video games. Too much embarrassment. "That's a secret," Sorun said. There were more than a few disappointed groans all around. "Maybe I'll tell Nicole if she asks."

"Oh, come on!" Sonic complained. "You're seriously gonna pull that card!?"

"Yeah." Without missing a beat Sorun tossed the sword away. It turned back into the Emerald as it sailed away and landed in the sand somewhere. In the process he'd found it - the cooler they brought the food in. "Enough about all that, though," he said as he got up to pull the cooler towards the group, "we've been out here all day, so I think it's time we-"

Abruptly, Sorun's voice cut out. It was at the same moment he'd opened the cooler to see the actual contents of the cooler. The "food" that laid within. Hunger was all but forgotten in lieu of the pit that'd dropped in his stomach.

Hot dogs. There were nothing but hot dogs in this cooler.

After witnessing the crime against nature, Sorun's head snapped up to Sonic, his eyes accusatory. What made it worse was that the hedgehog seemed genuinely puzzled as to why Sorun seemed so upset at the moment. It only served to make Sorun more upset.

"There's more food on this planet than hot dogs, Sonic," Sorun stated in an icy tone. "This is cruel and unusual treatment, you know. They imprisoned people for stuff like this where I'm from."

"I really doubt they did," Sonic flatly responded.

"You don't know that. What are you gonna do? Fact-check me? You won't." He glanced at all the others. "You guys couldn't talk him out of it-!?"

Something hit him in the face. Sorun sputtered out, grasping at what hit him. Something soft - a bag of some sorts. He pried it off his face, but the initial panic Sorun felt was mollified when he saw it was a simple bag of marshmallows.

"We brought other food," came the deadpan statement from Sally. He looked up from the bag and saw her looking at him, a handful of metal rods in her hand. "You said you weren't gonna make up Earth laws to mess with people, Sorun."

"Yeah, well... thanks," he muttered out in meek thanks. He grabbed a marshmallow from the bag and tossed the rest towards the nearest person, and then grabbed the metal rod tossed to him from Sally out of the air. He trudged back to his seat, though he didn't even manage to get the marshmallow on the skewer before he heard a disgruntled yell from Sonic.

Looking up, Sorun saw the problem. The problem took the form of his Chao floating next to Sonic with a marshmallow skewered onto one of the blades jutting out from his arms. The hedgehog was giving the small creature the stink eye, and then began reaching out for another marshmallow. He grabbed it, but only for a second before Virgil blurred forwards. Now there was a marshmallow skewered on both blades.

Sorun laughed at the sight on the inside and pretended to ignore it as he held the marshmallow over the fire. It brought him back...

One year ago

"Wow, Dave, yeah, this is... this is totally where everyone wants to be on their sixteenth birthday. You're a fuckin' genius." The sarcasm was less dripping and more pouring out Sorun's mouth. "I feel like a goddamn hobo."

"Hey, now. That's disrespectful to Crazy Ricky."

"Dave, we're roasting marshmallows over a barrel fire in the middle of a scrapyard."

"Yeah and you didn't wanna actually go anywhere, so the hell else were we supposed to go?"

Sorun bit his tongue. He had him there, admittedly. If Sorun had it his way he'd just be huddling in his room and they'd all be playing something together online like sane people. But nah, it's his sixteenth birthday, they said, we all gotta do something special. "Let's all go camp out at the scrapyard!" they'd cried out. Meanwhile Sorun was wondering why he bothered to go along with this.

It's 'cause Jarod was bringing those damn imported chocolates, that's why. And Dave all but begged him.

Still, it wasn't... it wasn't the worst locale, he guessed. This was the spot , after all, on the rare occasion going outside to hang with the others was a decision Sorun committed to. A playground made of junk left to the whims of the imagination of a bunch of boys. It was good times. Except for the tetherball incident but that was besides the point.

Wasn't the worst place to spend his sixteenth birthday. Wasn't the worst place at all.

"Oh, hey," Dave suddenly said, head picking up to look beyond the flaming barrel in front of the two, "Jarod, you made it! It's so dark out here I barely saw ya coming."

The dark-skinned teenager who'd just walked into view was holding a plastic bag with his left hand. His right hand was holding up a middle finger at Dave, who was cheekily grinning as a result. "Ah-huh, yeah." He nodded his head to the fourth, white-skinned teen that'd been walking next to him. "So head's up but Billy forgot the graham crackers."

Both Sorun and Dave's heads snapped to Billy, who sheepishly rubbed a hand through his ginger locks while looking down. Dave was the first to speak out.

"Seriously, Billy?"

"Yeah, for real, Billy?" Sorun followed up.

"We were really counting on you, Billy."

"You had one job, Billy."

"Can't believe you've done this, Billy, just can't."

"I mean, really, Billy?"

"Billy, I just, I can't, man."

"What are you doing, Billy?"

"Foolin' around, Billy, that it?"

"Havin' a laugh, Billy?"

"Fun at our expense, Billy?"

"Of all the times to be let down, Billy."

"Worst time imaginable, Billy."

"Absolute worst, Billy."

"Bite me, both of you," Billy snapped, looking back up at them. "I forget one little thing and it's all, 'nyeh, Billy, how could you, it's a crime against humanity,' I mean what the hell?"

"Because you forgot one of the main components of s'mores, man!" Sorun argued. "What're we gonna sandwich the marshmallow and chocolate against, huh? I ain't spending this whole night with sticky fingers."

"Would you eat a hamburger without buns?" Dave added. "Would you eat a grilled cheese without cheese? That's just toast, man. You gonna give me pancakes with no syrup, huh?"

"Gyro with no sauce," Jarod added.

"A gyro with no sauce, Billy," Dave agreed. "Do you wanna live in a world like that?"

"We already live in that world. We live in that world every time we go to that damn diner." Billy looked to the side. There was a fifth teenager sitting against a pile of tires. Light skinned boy. Squirrely-looking with curly, brown hair. "Hey, Jamie, are you getting in on these or not?"

The teen didn't respond. He seemed incredibly engrossed in whatever he was sketching in the sketch pad he held.

"Yo, Jamie!" Jarod yelled out.

This time he'd heard. He looked up, blinking brown eyes in surprise as he looked at the group of four. "Huh, what? What's going on?" he asked.

In response, Jarod held up the bag of chocolate be brought. "S'mores but without no damn crackers 'cause someone forgot them," he explained, shooting a glare at Billy who rolled his eyes. "Guess we can just sandwich them between the chocolate but it ain't gonna be the same no matter what we do."

"Oh, no thanks." Jamie turned his gaze back down to the sketch pad. "You guys know there's a certain weight range for fighter pilots in the military? I thought it was because of fuel concerns but apparently it's more because of safety concerns with ejection systems, though they've been phasing it out on some models of planes-"

"Jamie you don't even wanna be a fighter pilot, why do you care?" Sorun interrupted, sounding almost worn out from the other teen's words.

He shrugged. "It's just cool. That's all. And I don't want to get my sketchbook sticky."

"Hey, that's fair." Fair enough that Sorun almost wished he'd just lead with that one and left it there. "What're you sketching this time, Jaimie?"

"SU-30." He flipped the sketchbook over to show the rest - to Sorun's eyes it was a drawing of a fighter plane so realistic he could have mistaken it for a black and white photograph at this distance. To anybody else it'd look like a work of art, but by now Sorun had seen Jamie sketch out so many planes that it became par for the course.

"Huh. That's cool." He wasn't even sure if Jamie heard that; he went back to sketching. Shaking his head, Sorun turned back to the other three. "Any idea what we're gonna do for Jamie's sixteenth? We ran out of airplane museums."

"We'll go skydiving," Dave said with complete confidence. "We'll scare the very idea of planes out of him. For the next week or so, anyways."

"You say that like he would be able to take his attention off the plane itself long enough to remember he's supposed to jump out of it," Jarod remarked.

"Ain't there an age limit, though?" Billy asked. "Gotta be eighteen or whatever, right?"

Multiple sounds of realizations and disappointment resounded from the four teens standing around the barrel fire. Jamie remained silent, wholly intent on sketching.

"Well, whatever we do it can't be worse than roasting marshmallows in the middle of a scrapyard for cars," Sorun sighed out. "With no graham crackers."

"Some would say the lack of crackers would build character."

"Fuck off, Billy, we're talking about a whole third of the snack here." Sorun's eyes glanced upwards, towards the black Detroit sky without a single star shining in it. "Gotta say, though, I don't feel a whole lot different, turnin' sixteen and all."

"Yes," Jarod agreed. "We all thought for sure the minute you turned sixteen you'd hit a magic growth spurt and reach normal size."

One of Sorun's eyes twitched. "I want you to keep making these short jokes while bearing in mind I'm holding a really pointy metal stick," he said. "And stop reminding me I'm old now. It sucks. This sucks and you all suck."

"Yeah, well, you suck, too, so we all suck together," Dave countered.

There probably would have been a cricket chirping somewhere if the conditions in the scrapyard didn't make life nigh-impossible to propagate in that particular region. The soft crackling of the fire was all that was heard in place as all the other teenage boys turned to look at Dave. Even Jamie had looked up from his sketchbook.

"You, uh... you wanna try that one again, man?" Billy asked.

"Nah," Dave said in utter confidence, shaking his head. "A true man stands by his convictions, and I meant what I said. You guys are are all the ones at fault for misinterpreting."

"Sure, but, like, you could rephrase it or-"

"Fine, it's like crabs in a bucket," Dave tried again, never losing his cool composure. "A crab by nature is a complete bastard so we're never getting out of that bucket 'cause we'll keep dragging each other down. But hey, at least we'll be in that bucket together."

"Yeah, I know that feeling," Sorun muttered out. "We ain't ever getting out of Detroit."

"You even wanna leave?" Jarod asked.

Sorun looked at him like he was mad. "What? Hell no. The fiber optic internet here's too good. I'm good never leaving the bucket. Bucket's got wi-fi."

"Uh-huh." Jarod pulled his marshmallow out from the open fire. He made a dissatisfied face and went back to roasting it. "You figure out what you wanna do with your life yet, then?"

At hearing that question Sorun couldn't help but scoff. He rotated his marshmallow around in the fire. "Hell if I know, man. I'm sixteen years old now and I have absolutely no aspirations whatsoever."

"Hey, you're good at games. You win all those tournaments all the time. You could go pro, try doing that," Billy suggested. "I mean, didn't you recently win that one 'Smash' tourney?"

A sour look crossed Sorun's face. "It's too soon for that one, Billy."

The reactions all around were near-universal. Jarod winced in pain, Dave glanced down at his feet, Jamie nervously returned to his sketchbook, and Billy shuffled around on his feet while nervously coughing to the side. He couldn't speak for the others but the last thing he wanted to talk about was what happened with that, and by the looks everyone else had it was a topic nobody wanted to talk about.

"Anyways," Sorun continued, trying his best to change the subject, "I dunno about the pro leagues. Maybe. I mean, I dunno how my mom'd react to me telling her I wanna be a professional gamer. She's a doctor, man. That's a hard enough standard to live up to."

"Yeah, but your mom's chill," Dave argued. "Like, the chillest person on Earth. She'd be cool with it. You know, assuming you pull it off."

"Which, by all means, you could," Jarod added. "If you really want to split hairs you already do play professionally. Give it a couple more years and you won't have to have your mom sign you off on all the tournaments."

"Guys, I don't even wanna know if I wanna do that for a living," Sorun said to them. "Games are more a hobby than anything else and I don't even know if I wanna turn that into a living. And I mainly do the tournaments 'cause I like beating people. The money's secondary."

"Well, hey," Billy said, "they say if you're gonna do a job you should make it something you love doing."

It was a fair point. It didn't change the fact Sorun felt unsure about the entire thing. About life in general. "Look, at the end of the day I dunno where I'm gonna end up in the future. Don't think anyone ever does," he said as he stared into the fire. "This world's messed up in all sorts of ways but that's one of the great things about it, ain't it? That anything could happen, an' life's this big journey that could take us anywhere? Some shit like that? I dunno, feels like media keeps drumming that idea into our heads but there's some truth in it. We can go anywhere and do anything we want. And 'cause I'm lazy as hell I'm gonna wait around 'til I figure out what to do with myself. And the world'll let me. 'Cause the world's cool like that."

The marshmallow on Sorun's skewer melted to a point that it slid off the skewer entirely. It fell into the barrel fire, bursting into flames at it shriveled into a black, charcoaled mess.

Sorun glared at the fire, as if trying to combust the flames themselves with his eyes. "I take it back, the world fucking sucks."

At first there was nothing. And then a few snickers coming from David. The small chuckles spread to everyone else, and soon enough all five of them were laughing.

Present

"This... this is fine, right? Guys?"

He'd never thought being nostalgic over roasting marshmallows could ever be a thing, but by now Sorun's life was so atypical the abnormal was normal at this point, so he didn't bat an eye at it. Everybody had gone on to talk about their own things as they all held the sugary cylinders over the fire. Sally, Sonic, Antoine and Bunnie were chatting about one thing or another. The entirety of the Chaotix were talking and laughing together about something. Tails and Rotor were having some deep discussion, probably about something heavily technical that would go over most people's heads. Amy and Nicole were laughing about something, and it was probably related to Sorun since they kept glancing his way. Razor wasn't even roasting a marshmallow, electing to just eating one of the hotdogs raw as he watched Virgil and Crusher go at it again in the sand.

It was serene. A weird sort of peace Sorun found himself enjoying. Just being there, surrounded by friends. Included. Knowing everything would be alright when they all went home later tonight because everything in his life was sorted. Knowing Nicole was over there and would go home with him.

Everything was so peaceful, in fact, that it hurt. Literally. It still hurt sometimes to smile for long stretches of time since his face just wasn't used to the action, but this was one of those rare occurrences where he couldn't help it. He felt complete. There wasn't a better way to describe the sense of belonging he felt being there. They were the closest he had to family.

He still sometimes wished Dave was here, though. The peaceful feeling was familiar enough he couldn't help but think of him. Everyone, really, his mom especially, but he often kept wondering how Dave specifically would have reacted to this whole situation. All things considered out of everyone Sorun knew Dave in all likelihood would have handled it the best. Would have adjusted way quicker than he did; unlike Sorun he actually had charisma.

It just figured. As far as Sorun cared charisma was a dump stat no matter what game you were playing. But Dave had always pumped charisma on his characters. It was probably the only argument they never settled.

"Ah, man, Dave... I'll always maintain you shoulda been the one to be sent here 'stead of me," Sorun thought to himself. "They're still fighting Eggman 'cause I screwed up on killing him at the last second. You wouldn't have done that. Knowing you, you would have solved every damn problem this world had in the span of a month. But I'm here and you're not, so... yeah.

"But hey, man, listen. I made it work." Sorun's eyes glanced over at Nicole. "Dunno how but I did. The pro gamer dream is pretty much dead in the water at this point, but despite all that and despite the world doing its damnedest to do me in, I did it, Dave. I got a normal life going for me. You'd all be stunned with disbelief that I, Sorun, managed to carve a workable life out in an alien world... but I did. And I got a girlfriend, too. So you all owe me five bucks from that one bet."

That barest amount of humor had Sorun make an airy, silent chuckle as he leaned back in his chair to look at the rest of the people sitting around him. He rose the marshmallow out of the fire. Perfect golden brown. "So... in light of all that, I think things are going to be fine. If you were here you'd call it the proudest moment of your life. You would, don't deny it. Geez... But yeah. Yeah, it's all gonna be fine, Dave.

"I made it home."

A/N- Alright, so listen. This chapter just wouldn't cooperate with me at all while I was trying to write it. I dunno if it was because I tried putting nearly the whole cast in one place which alone is a nightmare to write around because there's just too many people, or trying to get the idea of a beach episode out or the fact I just don't mesh with happy chapters like this. I dunno. I just kind of wanted to make it special since it's the last big filler chapter in the whole story. Nothing but straight plot from here on out. And I think on some level I managed to pull that off, but yeah, here it is.

Anyways, 93 chapter-long happiness arc is over. Sadness arc starts now.

Chapter 94

Recursion Error

Episode 94- Vacation's over

It was a beeping sound that woke him up.

Not an overly loud sound; a serious of soft, repetitive beeps emanating from somewhere near him that were just loud enough to rouse Sorun from sleep. He opened his eyes - his eyes burned when sunlight bleeding in from the window his them. He held in the groan he wanted to make and sat up silently in the bed. And then he looked to his left.

Yep, there it was. The source of the noise. Nicole was sitting against the headboard to the bed right next to him. Typing away on a bunch of holographic keyboards floating in front of her. Her fingers continued to unceasingly type away at the keyboards as her right eye quickly glanced in Sorun's direction.

"I'm sorry if I woke you," she said in a simple tone as her eye turned back to the keyboards and screens. Sorun could only blink in response.

"I... you... but wh..." Not being able to find the words, Sorun shook his head. "You didn't, don't worry about it."

Slowly, he settling back into the bed, laying his head on the pillow and pulling the covers up over him. Nicole continued typing away, barely even acknowledging his actions as Sorun tried to go back to sleep.

It wasn't working. His mind was stuck on what he just saw so he sat back up and let the blanket fall away from the top half of his body.

"Okay, but do you really have to do this here? Now ? Of all times?" he asked.

She didn't even look back his way when she responded. "I'm the administrator and steward of the entire city, Sorun. I have responsibilities. And I don't like to spend an inordinate amount of time sleeping like you do."

"But you have wi-fi," Sorun complained. "Administrate some other time." He shuffled closer to her, wrapping his arms over her bare midsection to draw her in closer. The screens had followed Nicole when she was pulled away, and she smiled a bit and took her attention off the screens for just a second to pry Sorun off of her.

"Sorun. My responsibilities," she protested, laughing lightly. It was a struggle - one of his greatest - to let go of her. He managed, barely.

"Fine, alright." She'd already gone back to her screens. He pouted a bit, looking out at the window and resisting the urge to instinctively hiss at the sunlight shining through, and then turned back to her. "What time is it?" he asked.

"Eight A.M."

This time he did hiss, and then began the process of settling back into the bed. "Ugh, just wake me back up around two."

"You have work."

Sorun paused mid-process, and then groaned in realization and sat back up against the headboard. "Ugh, yeah, you're right. And you just reminded me I got that stupid thing I gotta go do."

Still typing away with her eyes firmly locked on the screens floating in front of her, Nicole queried with, "'Thing?'"

"Yeah, so, ugh..." Tiredly, Sorun ran a hand over his face. He didn't know if the exhaustion came from just waking up or the knowledge of what he had to go do. "So Honey got into talks with some, uh, some guy. Fabric tycoon dude in Station Square."

"Oh?" She sounded a bit interested, but mostly was just focusing on whatever she was working at. Sorun had snuck a curious glance but then looked back away when all he saw were walls of text and code on those screens.

"Yeah his name is Reuben or something, don't remember, anyway he kinda just reached out to Honey outta the blue for business reasons and they worked out some kind of deal over the phone. So now I gotta be the guy to go all the way to Station Square to meet up with him and sign off on a bunch of stuff, and then I gotta bring back a bunch of boxes of fabric from what I assume is a warehouse or whatever in Station Square back to Honey's shop."

"Seems reasonable."

"Mhm, except for the fact I gotta stay in Station Square for a day or two."

The typing ceased. Evidently that last statement had warranted enough of Nicole's attention that she finally tore her face completely away from the screens to look directly at Sorun. "Pardon?" she asked, looking surprised.

"Right, so..." Sighing, Sorun offered her a hapless shrug. "I just got told all this yesterday and I'm really short on the details, and I'm gonna ask her why I have to do this when I go to her shop later, but for whatever reason Honey needs me to stay a whole day, maybe two, in Station Square. So I'm gonna be gone for a bit," Sorun explained. "It's just business stuff. Not clear on why I have to stay there when I can teleport with the sword, but again, I'll ask her later."

"You'll be gone for some time, then." There was a note of disappointment in Nicole's tone.

"'S just for a day, two max." Sorun took on a bit of an amused face at the disappointed look Nicole was wearing. "It's not that long, Nicole, don't tell me you're that upset over it."

The look turned into a pout, at which point Nicole promptly turned back to the screens. "Just because we've been together for a month doesn't mean I'm suddenly incapable without you somewhere in the city," she said.

"Ah, I see." Sorun nodded his head with a serious face, timing hums with every head bob in a sign of clear understanding. "You won't miss me, I got it, I completely understand-"

"Of course I'm going to miss you," Nicole interrupted, looking at Sorun from the sides of her eyes. When she said it like that she almost sounded insulted. Her expression softened and she glanced to the side, away from him. "You can't come back to sleep here instead of spending the night there?"

"I cannot." For reasons Honey better explain to him before he started using the "raise" word again. She started to get into the habit of hissing and swatting at him like some kind of vampire whenever it sounded like he was about to say that word.

"Then I suppose it can't be helped." She only looked a little disheartened at the news, which Sorun supposed was a good sign of something. The disappointment was more clear in her voice, though. "In that case you had better begin your preparations, then. I'll tell Silver where you went if he asks and feed the Chao in your absence."

He gave her a grateful smile. "Thanks." He looked down - his hand was sitting there, all innocuous-looking. He began to slide it over the surface of the bed towards Nicole. "You know, I got about an hour before I need to head out so we could totally just stay here and-"

Before he could even finish Nicole gently grabbed his wrist and placed it back on his side. "You need breakfast and I'm in the middle of something important," she told him as way of explanation. Now Sorun was the one pouting again as he turned away, arms crossed and thinking to himself he wouldn't forgive this. "... But we can certainly revisit this conversation after you've returned from your business trip."

Maybe he could forgive her. It was Nicole, after all. They were in a relationship. He was pretty sure he was supposed to do things like forgive.

"If it makes you feel better I'm not letting you leave this house without a goodbye kiss, Sorun."

Ah, there it was. The forgiveness he'd sought out for so long.

"Remind me again why I have to spend a couple of days in Station Square."

It's not that Sorun was, strictly-speaking, annoyed at the prospect of having to spend an abnormal length of time in the city. There were certainly worse places and the locale gave him a small inkling of his previous home, if not full nostalgia. And the food was good enough.

Or it would be good enough if he wasn't being consigned to the fate of being stuck in a hotel room during the entire duration.

He stood there with his back leaning against the counter, glancing to the side at Honey as she was filling out a bunch of forms behind said counter. Larry was on the other side of the shop unpacking some boxes - Sorun lamented that he'd finally run out of names that sounded like Larry to tease the lynx with and had begrudgingly started using his real name recently. Probably for the best when Sorun thought about it. The joke had begun to grow stale and he needed to keep his coworker on his toes for no reason.

But he couldn't care less about Larry at the moment. His focus was on Honey, who hadn't even looked up from the forms.

"Sorun, you know how these eccentric business-type guys are like." He couldn't be sure, but Sorun was almost sure he'd convulsed when he heard that word. Oh, did he know. He knew just what "eccentric business-types" were capable of. He worked for one of those damn things. "If this Reuben person's anything like me their schedule must be so hectic they can't get anything straight! It makes sense he needs you to be there to take his call the first moment he's available. And since we don't know when that is you're planting your butt in that hotel room 'til he calls the room phone. It makes perfect sense."

No it didn't. It didn't make sense at all but he couldn't argue it because Honey wrote his paycheck. Sorun didn't see at all how anybody could be so busy that he had to bend over ass-backwards just to accommodate their schedule but Honey was the boss here. "But I can teleport ," Sorun continued to complain, "can literally make a portal from there to here and back, he can't just call you and-"

"He's planning to call a specific phone in a specific room in a specific hotel, Sorun," Honey interrupted. "If he does that and you're there to answer the phone the conversation goes as quickly as possible. If he has to call here and I have to waste time tracking you down, it's more time out of his schedule, and at that point we're gonna lose a potential supplier of high quality materials and it'll be your fault. It makes total sense, I don't get what you're not seeing here."

Was this one of those things he just wasn't able to comprehend because Sorun didn't have the mind of an entrepreneur? One of those business acumen things he needed an actual education or experience in the field to get? Because he didn't get this. It sounded like pure nonsense, really, but Honey over here was acting like it was the most sensible thing on the planet and it confused him. "But you're the business owner," he argued. "It's your business, your deal, why do I-"

"Because you're the person delivering the fabrics here so I can inspect them and make a final decision on a purchase," Honey succinctly put at the same time she flung her arm out to the side in a wild flourish of finishing off a signature she was writing down. "Besides, I don't know when he's calling. I can't afford to wait by the phone for a whole day or two."

"Oh, like that thing you're asking me to do?" Sorun snidely remarked.

The yellow cat looked up from the papers she was signing to give Sorun a critical look. "Are you actually gonna lean there and tell me you're complaining about me paying you to wait around in a comfy hotel room?" Honey asked him. He had to look down in silent admittance that, yeah, it was sounding like a pretty stupid argument the more Sorun thought on it. "I'm even fronting the cost of the room and room service for you here, I don't get it, what's the problem?"

Unfortunately, his masculine pride refused him the privilege of telling Honey that Sorun just didn't like being away from his girlfriend for extended periods of time. And beyond that the more he thought about it the more he realized he really shouldn't be arguing this. Easy money was easy money. Regardless of how... weird this all was.

"It's just a bit unusual," Sorun said in a half-truth as he looked back at Honey. "There's no problem here, I'll do it."

The annoyance that had been on Honey's face evaporated in an instant and was replaced by a beaming smile. "Great!" she exclaimed in happiness, mouth open in a wide smile and eyes closed. She leaned forwards to poke a noticeably slate-faced Sorun in the cheek as she opened her golden eyes to look at him. "But really, Sorun, I super appreciate you doing this." She continued poking him in the cheek. "I get this is totally a whole lot of responsibility you're in no way qualified to handle-"

"How am I even supposed to respond to that?"

"-so I need you to realize I'm putting a huge amount of trust on you," Honey continued. "You, my most experienced and capable employee. There is absolutely nobody else I could hope to trust with this. Make me proud ."

The poking wouldn't cease. Sorun tried his best to ignore it. "What about Larry?" he asked.

Honey scowled. "Oh, yeah, that reminds me." She thankfully stopped poking Sorun and turned to the side a bit to face Larry's way. "Hey, Larry!" she shouted at the lynx. "I told you I needed all that unpacked twenty minutes ago! So help me if I look back in five minutes and you're still at it...!"

The threat needn't have been said. The implications, whatever they were as Sorun had never incurred such wrath from the cat, was evidently clear to Larry. The lynx Mobian had made a frightful kind of squeal and tripled, no, quadrupled his movement speed in that moment.

Honestly, Sorun was just impressed he'd survived working for Honey this far.

"Now then!" And like that Honey turned back to Sorun, all smiles. "I'd say the fate of the business rests in your hands, but the situation isn't nearly dramatic enough for that."

"It ain't?"

"I mean, I'd certainly like to have silk fabrics imported from Station Square for me to work with," Honey said. "You know how hard it is to get actual silk all the way out here?"

"Pathetically easy 'cause I can go anywhere in the world in an instant for you?"

"Yeah, and do you have any idea how few people actually sell silk? More than that they have manufacturing processes for silk over there nobody else in the world have. I neeeeed it...!" She really didn't need to look so creepy in that moment. Rubbing her hands together like a damn movie villain in that instant, only to transition to looking all gleamy and innocent in the next instant, standing up straight with her finger pointing up in the air. "And so! The moderate success of the business rests in your hands, Sorun."

It was certainly a way to lay out the situation. Sorun rolled with it. "I'll try not to let you down, ma'am." And he meant it. Truly. Because the consequences for doing so wasn't a world Sorun wanted to imagine, and thus he pushed himself off the counter and walked away as quickly as he could.

He passed by Larry on the way out, still unpacking things out of boxes. A passing whim made Sorun give him a halfhearted wave and mutter out, "Hey, Larry."

"Huh? Oh, hey!" Larry momentarily stopped what he was doing and straightened up to fully address Sorun. "How's it going, you need something?"

Already Sorun was feeling like this had been a mistake. He'd been dragged into a conversation without anything to discuss. "Nah, man, I, I was just, you know, saying hi. That's it."

Larry wilted a little bit. "Oh. Uh, I just thought, like the way you said that-"

"Yeah I know-"

"It's just, it came out really sounding like you had something to-"

"Just saying hi."

"Like I really thought-"

"I know what you thought."

"Oh."

"Yeah." The next ten seconds were some of the most awkward this week, Sorun had felt. He scratched the back of his head for lack of anything better to do. "I gotta go."

"Okay." Somehow, and Sorun didn't know where in the world the lynx found the fortitude to do this, Larry managed to give Sorun a smile. "Have fun on your trip!"

Usually the socially correct action at this stage of the conversation would be to reflect the other party's niceties in order to further reinforce a positive repertoire. Considering he was a coworker of Sorun's this proved to be doubly true. But for reasons that were unexplainable to Sorun's psyche, likely stemming from the fact that this was Larry, Sorun truly just stood there, silently deliberating with himself if he should say something back.

For the first five seconds Larry waited patiently. Ten, fifteen seconds had passed, and an odd look at came across Larry's face from Sorun silently staring at him in indecision. Twenty seconds in he looked to grow worried. At thirty seconds his eyes began darting around in random directions, as if he were seeking help.

At the thirty-five second mark Sorun made a decision. He turned around and proceeded to leave, with Larry staring at Sorun's back with wide, bewildered eyes as he exited through the shop's front door.

"..." Giving off a short sigh as the door swung closed behind Sorun, he looked down at the sword resting in his hands. He shook his head as the blade was pulled out of the sheath. "Not a good moment, not a good moment," came the mental belittlement. The following portal that Sorun cut was made quicker than normal.

"Sorun, hey!"

He'd only gotten one foot through the portal before he heard the voice, froze, and then made the mental equivalence of a grimace when he recognized the voice, all the while keeping a neutral expression. He let as much as an unpleased hum sound in his throat as he turned around. Sure enough, Sonic was there.

He must have been more distracted with this trip than he thought; Sorun hadn't even heard him approach.

"What do you want, Sonic?" Sorun asked. "I got a job I need to do. Because I need to pay taxes. Unlike some people."

Of all the remarks Sorun had expected, a light chuckle out of Sonic hadn't been one of them. "Ha ha, great one, Sorun." He even did a little point and winked at Sorun, which put him off even more to the point he was considering just turning around to leave mid-conversation. "Anyway, I just came to ask one quick favor. You're going off to Station Square, right?"

"... Hm?" Sorun quirked an eyebrow. "How did you hear about that?"

"Ah, just heard it around."

"..." Now Sorun's head was tilted to the side. "Even though the only people that knew of this was Honey and myself? I only told Nicole just this morning. A bit over an hour ago." Larry knew, too, but he wasn't even sure that was because Honey told him. From Sorun's perspective it looked like he'd just been listening in on the conversation between himself and Honey and pieced it together himself.

Sonic didn't respond. Literally. As in, it was almost like he was standing there with a frozen expression, just staring at complete silence. When Sorun started to feel unnerved from the sight, the hedgehog became animated again and began speaking. "Yeah, Nicole told Sally and she told me, you know how it is."

"Okay, whatever." It was a logical enough of an explanation and Sorun didn't feel like dwelling on it further. He was more focused on just hearing what this "favor" was so he could leave already. "What do you want?"

"Right, yeah. So there's this one pizza joint over in Station Square, so I was just wondering if on the way back-"

"You seriously want me to make a pizza delivery for you?" Sorun grumbled out. He couldn't help but feel more annoyed in the fact it was Sonic asking him this. Somebody who could run all the way there and do that himself in a matter of seconds. If it was anybody else asking he'd made it a hard maybe but with Sonic he just didn't feel like-

"Well it's not just for me, it's for all the Freedom Fighters," Sonic explained. "Everyone's been working really hard on everything and I just thought, y'know, since you're gonna be over there and everything already you could just bring something back to the ol' HQ on the way back. They have a special way of making it over there and you can't really get it anywhere else." He grinned. "It's just a little surprise for them all! All I'm asking for, swear it."

It had a practical reason behind it and Sorun hated that because it was hard to argue against pragmatism; that was his thing and he didn't like poking faults in his own style of reasoning. And if it was for everyone and not just Sonic, that was... that was different. Enough to make Sorun much more amenable to the idea.

Nope, it was more than that. He was already standing all slack-like, eyes pointed up to the sky in resignation at a choice already being made. The least they all deserved for their work was a pizza, after all. "Fine. But you're spotting me for it later."

"Hey, alright! Thanks bud-"

"I don't know when I'm coming back so when I go to the HQ and no one's there I'm leaving it in the fridge." Sorun's back was already turned to Sonic, his feet carrying him through the portal. "I'll be upset if you don't pay me back for the pizza."

And with those warm parting words, the portal closed behind Sorun, leaving Sonic standing alone in front of the shop. A stiff breeze had passed by, rustling the nearby grass and making it bend in the direction of the wind. What hadn't been disturbed by the breeze, unlike the grass, was Sonic himself, who was standing rooted to the spot and completely motionless, smile completely frozen on his face. Not even a single hair of fur on his body had moved in response to the wind brushing against it.

And then, he'd shattered. Like an ice sculpture being struck by a large hammer the hedgehog's entire body broke apart into innumerable red, glowing cubes of energy, scattered along the ground. And like water evaporating off the sidewalk on a hot day the innumerable cubes that had made up Sonic's body disappeared, leaving no evidence of their presence to be seen. Another breeze passed by the empty spot in the street in front of the shop.

On top of that shop a pair of legs were swinging carefree off the side of the roof. A hooded person dressed completely in red sat there, a few more of the glowing red cubes floating around his body as he stared at the spot where Sorun had been standing previously before disappearing through his portal.

"Illusions are fun," Rubrum said to himself. He held up his right in, in which was a piece of paper, and released a sigh of lament at the sight. "The things I do just to get a single guy in the wrong place at the wrong time..."

Back on Earth Sorun never participated in hotels. He did participate in them out of necessity during the road trip with Silver, and all things considered he'd handled the experience well enough. He hadn't thought at the time he'd have an easy time sleeping in a bed that wasn't his, not to mention the stress that had been the current situation at the time, but after all the bullshit that'd happened prior he'd found himself sleeping rather soundly those times. In Silver's case it had been more a matter of sleeping in a bed that wasn't two hundred years old and ruined for the first time in his life, and he'd jumped up and down on it for an hour before going to sleep.

Even though he'd never been in a modern Earth hotel, though, he at least knew what they looked like, and the hotel room in Station Square was about the most standard-looking room he could have imagined. Maybe a bit nicer, even. Nicer than his own bedroom back home at any rate, but the lack of Nicole certainly brought it down a fair bit.

Tossing the blue Emerald aside on the floor - thank goodness he'd remembered to turn it back before coming in, because for as much as someone carrying around a glowing gem would raise some eyes he was almost positive someone carrying around a katana would raise a few more - Sorun flopped down on the bed. It really was a nice room: good wallpaper, decent air conditioning, the cleaning services must take their job really seriously because the smell wasn't bad. The thought crossed Sorun's mind that he ought to thank Honey for calling ahead and booking the room for him, and even going as far as to pay for it. Even the room service, too, Sorun had considered as he looked over at the hardline phone sitting on a nightstand next to the bed. He should, but then he considered how big her ego was already from all her success and how smug she'd act if he did such a thing. She already lorded the fact he got all his clothes from her over her.

The woman was his only supplier of pants. And was one of two women in the world that knew his underwear size. That was already too much power.

Then again she did deserve it. Setting up the hotel in advance, giving him a good job (another thing she liked to hold over him), the fact the clothes were good. She certainly had the praise coming, and part of Sorun thought that he'd feel bad if he didn't at least say something . But what if he doled too much praise out? She'd get uppity about it just to annoy him and he'd end up regretting the whole affair to begin with.

"Ugh, whatever, I got this whole trip to mull it over," Sorun thought to himself as he sat up on the bed. There, sitting at the end of the room, was the one sole reason Sorun had immediately chilled out about this whole trip from the moment he'd entered this room. Possibly the third most beautiful piece of technology Sorun had seen in his entire life, right next to Nicole, and the wireless game controller Nicole had made for him.

A plasma screen TV.

"In the ten months since I first came to this planet... I don't think I've ever once sat down to just watch some TV," Sorun thought to himself with widened, astonished eyes.

New Mobotropolis, the Republic of Acorn as a whole, really, didn't have TV as Sorun knew it. The technology was there; the industry wasn't, so the most monitors were used for was long-distance communication, computation, and playing existing pieces of media. A hundred percent none of the other Mobian settlements on the planet had it. The Overlanders might, but Sorun didn't like going to those territories.

So here it was. The last bastion on the entire planet where the concept of commercialized TV existed. Right here in Station Square where the last vestiges of actual humanity survived. When he fumbled around for the nearby remote he couldn't help but hold it up in what was nothing but pure reverence.

He'd cry if he didn't have standards. So instead he just flopped back on the bed and flicked on the TV. He was shooting for cartoons here, but at this point he'd take the news if it meant he finally got to watch something on TV to recapture those memories of happier times. He would still hold out for hope that there was actually something entertaining on that wasn't the news.

There weren't any cartoons, unfortunately. What there was, however, was what looked like a live-action rip-off of "Kamen Rider", so he'd take that. And he savored it for all it was worth.

---

50 hours later

"And it's finally time," he thought to himself. The lights were off and the blinds were closed on all the windows, letting only a few rays of sunlight in to brighten the room. It was times like these that made him realize how close and yet how far and end to all this was, but this... this was one of those big steps. One of the milestones that marked actual progress towards him being done with all this, and the sooner that was done the better.

But the day he could finally stop wasn't here yet. Because Rubrum had a phone call to make.

There was an ugly scraping sound as the stool he was sitting in was dragged across the room's floor to the nearby nightstand where the phone was resting. In his right hand: nothing, hand open and fingers poised to grab the phone. In his left hand: a fake mustache he'd bought from a nearby novelty shop with money he'd stolen from a random passerby. With a swift motion his left hand reached towards his head and breached the darkness of the shadow obscuring his face from the hood he wore to affix the mustache to his unseen upper lip.

It was done. With that piece in place he could get into proper character.

"The glue on this thing kinda smells off," Rubrum thought as an offhand remark he picked up the phone with his right hand. With the receiver held to the side of his head he reached forwards with his left to dial in the numbers to make the call.

He stopped dead in his tracks when he realized something.

The phone was a rotary phone.

"... Oh my fucking god I don't know how to use this," he realized. He went slack; enough that the receiver fell from his hand to end up being dangled by the cord connecting it to the phone. "What the f- there's no buttons, it's just a wheel! Why!? It's the fucking future, why is this still a thing!?"

Of course he knew what a rotary phone was, but like everyone else in his generation he'd never bothered to learn how it works because such things were seen as ancient in his time. And here he was, sitting there slack-jawed like and idiot unable to cross the next item off his list because he didn't know how to use an antiquated piece of technology.

"Dammit dammit dammit if I screw this up because I don't know how to use a fucking rotary phone..." He got up from the stool, fake mustache and its strange-smelling adhesive all but forgotten. For the first time in what felt like years anxiety, a new type of anxiety to join the heavy sense of loathing he felt everyday, began to assault Rubrum as he nervously paced around the room. The rotary phone continued to sit there, receiver swinging on the cord like it was waving at him. Mocking him.

Goddammit it was the bike all over again. He had to do this because it was on the list and he had to do everything on the list because to not do everything on the list wasn't an option because he had to do everything on it but he couldn't because he didn't know how the phone worked and-

Rubrum stopped and took a calming breath. The red energy angrily crackling along his body and causing the surrounding walls and flooring to warp from his sheer presence receded back into his body, and the room stopped being damaged. He shot a panicked glance over to the rotary phone. It seemed fine.

"Alright, cool it, man, you don't wanna go accidentally vaporizing the whole building 'cause you had a panic attack, we're past those." The reassurances did very little because he was still pacing. He'd actually started pacing faster, actually. As if in a panic. "Okay okay, uh, okay I can just ask someone how this works, can't I? No, there's no time and I'm not supposed to technically be here so it'll look real suspicious to the staff- I can just illusion up some random guy and I'm not that strapped for time. Maybe. Lemme look at this thing."

He approached the object of his grievances with trepidatious steps. For how old it was it looked well-maintained, which made Rubrum think, much to his chagrin, that maybe the phone was an aesthetic choice to go with the place. Which didn't help at all with the fact he needed to figure out how this thing worked, so he cut out this line of thinking and leaned closer to it.

"Okay, I'm a marginally smart guy, I can probably figure this out," he muttered to himself. "Worse comes to worse I can just illusion a guy and have him talk to him. Not exactly the plan, but whatever, same result so it doesn't matter. But how does this work...?"

Phones had buttons. You pressed the buttons to form a certain string of numbers to call a certain phone. Basics of how a phone worked. He did have the number and knew exactly what to call. The problem... was that rotary phones didn't have buttons. The numbers were arranged in a circle on the phone's face and there was a plastic wheel over the numbers, with a large hole punched in over each number. Zero through nine, a pound key and a star key. Twelve holes in total in the wheel.

Now how the hell did it work?

"Okay, I know from movies you're supposed to put your finger in a hole and kinda rotate it to the right," he continued to mutter. "How do I know what hole to use, though? And how far do I rotate it? Oh, man..."

If the stakes weren't so high perhaps he'd be laughing at he absurdity of the situation. Unfortunately he did know what the stakes were, and that knowledge was causing Rubrum to visibly sweat at the moment. He worried for the state of the fake mustache as a result.

"Maybe all the holes are just there to show you where the numbers are?" he guessed. "Like... like maybe you put your finger in the number hole... what's it called, pound key? Maybe you put your finger in there each time 'cause it's a number symbol and you rotate it to the right a certain number of tics. Then you pull out, let it reset, and go again."

Yeah. Yeah, that made sense. You're dialing a number, of course you have to use the number hole. It made complete logical sense.

Steadily with a finger that definitely wasn't shaking, Rubrum inserted his index finger in the hole over the pound symbol on the phone. He rotated the ring a little bit - he heard it. A single click. He rotated it more. More clicks ensued.

He kept doing this until he heard the desired number of clicks he assumed corresponded with the number he was attempting to insert, and then removed his finger. The wheel rotated back to the left until it was back in its original position. He repeated this action, rotating the wheel from the hole over the pound symbol until he got the right amount of clicks, and then reset. This was done until he'd finally dialed out the whole phone number. And then, with bated breath, he picked the receiver back up and held it back to his head.

It wasn't dialing a number. There was just a single, continuous droning noise on the other end.

"I hate everything," Rubrum growled out. He had to fight not to slam the receiver back down on the phone, lest he accidentally destroy it. And fight to not accidentally crush said receiver in his hand. He took a calming breath and endeavored to try and re-analyze the situation. "Alright, what if... what if you're supposed to put your finger in the hole over what button you want to dial... and then rotate it all the way 'til it won't rotate anymore? Then you let it go back to the neutral position and do the same for the rest of the numbers?"

It sounded crazy, insane, even, but at this point he'd try anything if it got the damn phone to work. So he did so; rotating the ring over and over again until, once again, he... assumed , at least... that the number had been dialed. Once again he found himself holding his breath as he held the receiver back up to his head.

It was dialing the number.

"I'm a goddamn genius."

For two days he been sitting here. Eating room service. Watching "Not Kamen Rider". So far it was nothing but proof that Sorun had the best job in the whole universe, and on a whole, he was okay with that.

Seriously, this might as well have been a vacation compared to an actual job. Sure, he couldn't walk around and do stuff, but... TV. After he'd been on a ten-month dry spell. He could probably sit in that bed for a whole week if he really wanted to doing nothing but watch TV at this point.

"Seriously though," Sorun began to wonder to himself as his head swiveled over to the phone on the nearby nightstand, "not that I'm complaining, but I'm really starting to wonder what's taking this guy so long to-"

The phone started to ring.

"Oh, that's my cue!" Springing into action with all the grace of a slug Sorun rolled off the bed to grab the remote that fell somewhere on the floor, finding it after a few moments and hitting mute on the TV. He stood back up and made his way to the phone, sitting down on the bed while picking the receiver up. "Uh, hi, Sorun speaking. Is this, uh..." He took his attention away from the phone to examine the name that'd been scribbled on the palm of his hand with a marker. It was smudged. Damn. "Er... Reuben Umali Brum? The fabric guy?" Sorun squinted at his palm. "Am I reading that right?"

"MMMM YES hello~!" Sorun recoiled from the receiver, nearly dropping it, even. He hadn't expected the voice on the other end to be so... overtly flamboyant. "Yooouuu must be that delivery boy Honey had mentioned to me!"

"... Just get through the phone call, man." Repressing the deep sigh that desperately wanted to leave him, Sorun pinched the bridge of his nose and said, "Yeah, that's me, so she said she was interested in the partnership and wanted me to bring back-"

"Yes, about that...~" There was a sound like somebody clearing their throat from the other end of the line. "I'm afraid I've changed my mind on the matter and will not be engaging in that partnership."

He knew he had to be professional. Sorun knew that. He was on a job and people with jobs did professional things because jobs were professions. And yet even knowing that Sorun couldn't help the frustration that began to bleed into his tone when he responded with, "What?"

"I know, I know, it's such a shame! Honey is such a beautiful artist with her work and I remember falling in love the moment I laid eyes on it, ah, but alas...~" Sorun could almost picture the person on the other end swooning over their own words, and all it did was add to the vitriol collecting in him. "Another fashion firm had contacted me recently and made me an offer I just couldn't find myself the heart to refuse, so I'm afraid I'll be going over to them instead."

The plastic casing of the receiver cracked under Sorun's grip. "Are you serious, man, I've been waiting here for you for two days only for you to call and tell me this?" In truth he was less upset about that since it may as well have been a vacation waiting here, but more upset that Honey was apparently being shafted because this guy took a better deal with someone. Which... oddly rankled Sorun more than he'd like to admit. But he was too mad with the voice on the phone to even think of that at the moment.

"I know this may be upsetting to hear, darling, but that's the business, you know. Please be sure to pass along my sincerest apologies to your employer for the trouble."

"You-"

Sorun wasn't able to finish. The call cut off right there as the person on the other end disconnected, leaving a continuous tone to ring out through the receiver.

"And people said I couldn't act," Rubrum snickered out after setting the receiver back on the phone. He made a light chuckle and reached up to pat the fake mustache affixed to his upper lip in silent praise for providing the atmosphere needed to pull off such a flawless lie. Truly, he'd have been lost without it.

But, the time for this particular lie was over, and he was no longer in need of the fake mustache. So with zero fanfare whatsoever he tore it right off his face.

In hindsight, somewhat of a mistake. One Rubrum realized when there was an audible tearing sound when the mustache was removed.

"The hell!?" Rubrum hissed out in pain, rubbing at his lip as he stared down at the mustache in his hand. Flipping it over revealed there wasn't any blood stuck to its back. Somehow . "What'd they back this thing with, fuckin' epoxy?" he grumbled out as he threw the 'stache over his shoulder. Then he looked over at the plastic sleeve resting on the nightstand the mustache had come in, only to reel back in shock when he saw the warning label on the side that might as well have been microscopic. "They super did-!"

Rubrum's mouth snapped right shut when he heard the doorknob to the room's door begin to turn. Silently and robotically his whole body turned towards the door as it opened, revealing what looked like a completely ordinary Station Square dweller and his family right behind him.

"Yeah, I don't know, honey, the guy at the front desk said-" The man turned his head from assumedly his wife and kids and looked into the room. He looked shocked and confused when he saw Rubrum just sitting there near the phone, and then enraged as he charged into the room, shouting, "Hey, who are you and why are you in our room!?"

There was no response given by Rubrum as he jumped out of the stool to dodge the suitcase that had been thrown by him. Nor was further commentary given when he charged towards the room's window and leapt right through, leaving behind a completely flummoxed family of four right behind him.

"The fucker hung up on me."

The nerve. The utter audacity. Sorun had never been hung up on before but now that it'd happened finally he found he decidedly did not like it one bit. But even that feeling was nothing compared to the anger he was feeling for being all but snubbed by a fabric guy of all people. He hadn't felt this insulted in an least two months.

Surprisingly he wasn't mad enough to not hear the sound of breaking glass from what sounded like a room right above his. He'd have to be completely deaf not to hear the sound of, oddly enough, somebody screaming as they fell by Sorun's window. He'd turned to see the commotion, blinking rapidly in surprise, but if somebody had fallen past his window he'd been too late to see it.

Ignoring that somebody probably just committed suicide near Sorun, he turned his eyes back to the phone, eyes shining green. That dull tone was still blaring out through the receiver, and all it did was remind Sorun more and more of what just happened. He could picture it all now: him going back and getting yelled at by Honey for screwing up a simple job and having to pay for a hotel room for nothing, followed by her sulking for the next week because of the lost opportunity. He could tell she'd really been looking forwards to those silks.

Two days of his time and Honey's hopes dashed because some prick decided to turn to a bigger buck.

"Fucking eccentrics!" In anger at the whole situation, Sorun had slammed the receiver back down into the phone.

In hindsight, somewhat of a mistake. One Sorun realized when he slammed down too hard, causing the receiver to smash through the rotary phone. And then the nightstand under that, causing it to split in two and fall to shambles.

The angered breathing coming out of Sorun hitched into stillness the second he realized what he did. He stood up straight, looking down at the destroyed nightstand and phone in surprise, the receiver still in his hand with the disconnected cable dangling off of it. A few moments later his expression softened into one of annoyance mixed with resignation.

At the same moment that happened, his green eyes went back to being blue. After that the coughing started - loud, hacking coughs that had Sorun doubled over and caused him to drop the receiver in his hand. The coughing attack was one that only lasted a few seconds, but ended with Sorun feeling a bit winded and panting heavily as he looked down at the destroyed remains. The mild throb in his right hand from doing the act had already faded.

"Still... still getting worse." He straightened back up once his breathing had calmed down. His earlier expression had now turned into a morose one. "Man... if the hotel complains to Honey this is for sure coming out of my pay."

What a waste of a trip. He'd figured even after everything he'd walk away from this at least getting paid, but now he wasn't even sure of that. And to make things worse there was... what he'd just done. With the nightstand.

Silently, he gazed down at his hand. He didn't know what to think about the fact the fingernails on his right hand had darkened to a black color, but were quickly turning back to their normal, pale color. Despite how odd it looked he didn't find himself very surprised at the sight. He didn't know what to think about that, either.

"..." Sorun sighed and did his best to put it out of his mind as he pocketed his right hand. "Let's just grab the damn pizza and go home," he thought to himself as he hunted around the floor for the discarded Emerald.

The first thought that went through Sorun's head when he stepped through the portal was, "How the hell am I supposed to spin this with Honey?"

On the upside she was a rational person. On the best of days. It was hardly Sorun's fault the deal fell through when he didn't even get a single convincing word in the conversation, and the guy had made it sound like he made his mind up before he'd even picked up the phone. There was a solid chance she would see it from his point of view and understand.

But there was a chance she wouldn't. And then she'd start yelling at him, and Sorun would have to stand there staring blankly at the wall as he did his best to just wait out her tantrum until she finally calmed down. He was almost positive his job wasn't on the line as a result of all this, so that was a strong positive. 'Bout the only positive in this whole experience. Sorun didn't even know what he was more upset over - that he felt guilty over how all this turned out and that this trip was for nothing or that Honey missed out on those silks.

The warm pizza box he held in his left had wasn't of much comfort to Sorun on the matter. Maybe if he were a pizza guy it would be, but he'd always been more a burger and fries guy, minus the burger. The others would like it, though, which is what Sorun cared about most. They deserved the break and seeing them all smile was about the only salvageable moment he'd be able to salvage out of this whole trip.

He didn't think he'd be staying around for a pizza party, though. Beyond not being the biggest fan of pizza, he just plain didn't like being in this place. Too many reminders in the ol' HQ of what he used to do here and everything associated with that. No, he'd just drop the pizza off, bid everyone adieu, and go home. Even better maybe nobody was there so he could just dump the thing off in the fridge, because he wasn't seeing anybody so far.

Oh, no, there was someone there. He found Sonic in the meeting room, the one with the big oval table and the chairs. Funny thing, though. Sorun didn't remember Sonic having green fur.

"Hey, wait a minute."

Sorun froze, sheathed katana in left hand and hot pizza in right. The... assumedly not-Sonic, he had on a leather jacket with flame decals and wore shades for some reason, was leaning back on one of the chairs with his feet kicked up on the table. He, too, froze when Sorun walked into the room, only moving to lower his shades down so bright blue eyes could look over at Sorun's darker blue eyes. He didn't make any further movements outside of that. Actually he seemed even more confused than Sorun felt from the look he had on his face.

Now that he thought about it Sorun actually did recall something Tails had told him that one time, about there being an evil Sonic from what basically amounted to an evil mirror universe of Mobius Prime. He faintly recalled it being mentioned he was green. So once he'd gotten over the hurdle of overcoming his shock Sorun was able to quickly put together who this person was, at which point his mind started going into overdrive while the two continued to stare at each other with frozen expressions and bodies.

"Ssshhhhit what do I do about this?" He wouldn't admit to feeling uneasy. No, by now Sorun was way past that. He was feeling anxious enough that he wouldn't be surprised if he started sweating because from what he remembered the evil Sonic was supposed to be on par with the original. Which was bad. Because Sorun was currently standing in the same room he was in. "If he's even remotely as fast as Sonic I don't have time to drop the pizza, draw the sword, and swing at him. I don't have time to make a portal and get the fuck out of here. Cut the Emerald into myself? Fuck. No. No time."

It was coming back. The dread. That hopeless feeling he was supposed to have left behind. He couldn't figure out a viable way out of this and he hated that. He was trying to keep his breathing under control as best he could. That, he was managing somewhat finely. The edges of his vision darkening wasn't something he could help. Or his heart beating so quickly. He couldn't help it.

"What do I do what do I do the fuck do I do here?" Couldn't fight, too weak, too slow to run, nowhere to go, nothing he could do, goddammit this was supposed to stop happening -

"Uh..." The not-Sonic was starting to talk. What had been his name? Scour or something? "So who are you?" He sounded nearly identical to Sonic but there was something under his voice that marked him as someone else. Something in his tone that Sorun could pick out. He sounded meaner.

Sorun didn't answer. Mind going too fast, thinking up so many paths out of here only for his rationale to shoot them all down as no good, doing his best to try and get the terror going through him under wraps as he desperately searched for a way out of this. The evil Sonic person was starting to look annoyed and all it was doing was making Sorun's heart go faster and his body to heat up in fear when he spoke again.

"Look, I asked a question here-"

"No hablo ingles."

There had been absolutely no rational thinking behind Sorun's choice to utter those words. No thought process. No plan. The words that came out of his mouth were the result of a desperate mind running feverishly trying to think of something to do, some way to exert some control over the situation to get this feeling of helplessness to lessen so he could just think straighter and maybe figure something out, but when the green Mobian sitting there spoke the words had just... flown out. A panicked gut reaction that'd been made more out of reflex than anything.

Miraculously it got the not-Soni - Scourge, he just now remembered the name - to go back to looking confused. Sorun's confidence had completely shriveled and died the moment he saw him sitting in that chair and put an identity to him but with that one action there was the faintest glimmer of hope.

"Committed now, god, goddammit, run with it, run with the fucking foreign pizza delivery guy story and hope he sees me as harmless enough to let me go." It was a way out. Maybe. Not a move Sorun would have made if his faculties were in good enough check but he was too far to back out now.

So that was the game. Forget Scourge, forget why he was here, forget all that. Convince him that Sorun was just some random no-name delivery guy that didn't even speak the same language and hope he just let him go. Getting out was all that mattered to Sorun. He didn't even care if it wasn't in one piece - he could fix that with the Emerald later if it got that bad.

"Excuse me?" Scourge blinked in a confused way, then lifted his shades back up to cover his eyes. He shifted a bit in his seat - Sorun did his upmost best not to stare at the two long, diagonal scars on his torso. "No hablo what now? Huh?"

"Watashi hontoni no saikou zetsubo ningen so ware katedo sumero sumo do wa." The biggest problem with this plan was that Sorun didn't actually know any language other than English. He knew snippets of other languages at best from media consumption. Japanese the best from anime consumption. Little Latin from his mom. But he couldn't actually speak any of it or even knew what the hell he just said. Scourge didn't know that, though, so as long as he kept stringing together foreign words that vaguely sounded like a sentence he could probably pull this off. "Donde estas el Pax Romana la Hegelian Dialectics."

"I seriously don't understand a word you're saying." The confusion wouldn't leave Scourge's face. Probably a good sign. He'd stopped propping his feet on the table and was just sitting straight now while looking at Sorun. Wasn't sure if that was a good sign or not. "We even speakin' the same language here? How'd you even get into this place?"

"Derivery! Peeza derivery ," Sorun answered in his best Japanese-to-butchered-English accent. "Subarashi derivery-u man-u. Za warudo besto."

"What even...?"

A door opened nearby. The door to the lab. He almost thought it was Tails that walked through, because the person who walked through certainly looked like Tails, but last Sorun checked Tails wasn't dressed to the nines like a damn Bond villain. Red jacket with metal studs. And was that... a fucking toupee on top of his head? Between his ears? Damn thing wasn't even yellow like the rest of his fur, it was dark gray. Probably wasn't even real.

Never before had such a strong desire to rip something off of someone surged through Sorun before seeing that hairpiece. The fear of horrifically dying was helping keep it at bay.

"I had a look through the computer in their lab, Scourge," the not-Tails said as the door closed behind him. Sorun didn't even need to look at him to tell it wasn't really Tails. His voice was completely flat and cold, almost bored. And it seemed he shared Sorun's affliction of resting bitch face syndrome. "Childish security measures, really. Encryption was third-rate and I managed to just guess the passwords, so whenever you want-" He stopped when he noticed Sorun. His face didn't change to match the confused look Scourge was holding, but he did raise an eye ridge. "We have an intruder?"

"I ain't even sure," Scourge replied, sounding lost. "He just sorta... showed up. Outta the blue. I think he's a pizza delivery guy."

"A delivery man. Really," the evil Tails drawled out. Cold, piercing eyes scanned over Sorun's whole body, hands clasped behind his back at the fox looked him up and down. "What drove you to that conclusion?"

"Well, he's got a pizza. Not getting a word he's saying but I think I picked up 'delivery' in there somewhere." Scourge shrugged. "I dunno, just kinda fits. You order a pizza through the computer thing they got back there?"

"I most certainly did not." A more critical glare was forming in not-Tails' eyes. "He doesn't look like any delivery man I've ever seen. And I don't know of a pizza delivery profession that has one carry around a sword."

Now Sorun was pretty sure he was sweating. Fox was probably as smart as this world's one, and Sorun didn't have any hope of outsmarting him. But he was too deep now. The best hope he had was to keep riding it out and hope the cover story held.

Scourge shrugged. "I dunno, man, you know this world's almost as messed up as ours. They probably have to carry around weapons in case they get jumped by a bandit or robot or whatever else is wrong with this place. Look, if you're gonna be so suspicious then go and check it."

Tails With a Bad Haircut looked over at Scourge. "Excuse me?"

"You heard me." He lazily gestured over in Sorun's direction. "Go on, chop chop. I wanna see where this goes."

A bit of a scowl formed on the evil Tails' face, but regardless he turned back towards Sorun and approached him. He stopped right in front of Sorun, with his face scrunching in disgust when he eyed the white box in Sorun's hand. "Well?" he asked. "Let's go, give it to me. Quickly."

Wordlessly, Sorun handed him the box. It was quickly snatched out of his hands by the Tails that wasn't Tails, who gave him a decidedly calculating glare before turning his attention to the box in his hands. His hands moved to open it, the appendages moving with trepidatious speed that matched with the slight look of anxiety his features carried as he moved to open the box's lid. With the way he was moving Sorun would have figured the fox was assuming there was a bomb or something in that box.

In fairness to him if Sorun knew beforehand what he'd be walking into it would have been something he'd probably have done.

The box's lid was flipped open. Unsurprisingly there was nothing but an ordinary pizza on the inside.

Not-Tails' face alit with surprise. "Hm. Curious."

"What? What? What is it?" Scourge asked, sounding impatient.

"It actually is just a pizza."

"Ooh, lemme see." Scourge was standing next to the not-Tails now. Sorun hadn't even seen him get up or shift positions. The only evidence he'd moved was a green speed trail that disappeared completely the moment Sorun had registered its existence. And while his heartrate continued to spike further and further as he silently watched on Scourge had taken a slice of the pizza and took a bite. He made an approving hum and nodded. "Wow, hey, this is actually pretty decent. Go figure."

Evil Tails gave the green hedgehog the same look that disappointed parents often gave their children before they beat them with a belt. "You ate it. Just like that," he stated, not sounding surprised in the least. More nonplussed than anything else. "Despite the fact not a single person here ordered pizza, nor even have the means to, prompting so much suspicion on whoever this person is I'm genuinely shocked he's not in binds yet, you ate it. Did it never occur to you once that maybe this was a ruse?"

"Eh? Ruse?" Scourge had finished off that slice of pizza. He was already going for a second.

The beginnings of frustration was worming its way into not-Tails' voice. "From perhaps the Freedom Fighters whose base of operations we've appropriated from? Hmm? The thought never once crossed your mind they sent some fool who can't even speak properly to poison us and-"

"Ha! Ha ha ha! 'Poison us'! Hah, man, that's a riot. Great one." With a half-eaten slice of pizza in one hand Scourge had draped his free arm all carefree-like over the evil Tails' shoulders. Sorun hadn't missed how the fox had instantly gone stiff, or the fearful look that had briefly flickered in his face. "Miles, c'mon, you're a smart cookie. Ya know these good-for-nothin' goodies ain't gonna do something as nasty as poison us. That's too us! It sounds like something Alicia'd do."

"Alicia did poison some of our political rivals back when we had those."

"Yeah, see, that's what I'm sayin', there's no way they'd do that 'cause we do that."

In the midst of their conversation Sorun's mind was whirling. Continuing to struggle past all the panic and fear to think. The fact their attention was off of him and on the pizza right now was the most reprieve he'd gotten since entering the room. Allowed him some breathing room to think, to even out his breathing just a bit to try and clear his thoughts and get his heartbeat under control.

Wasn't working. His chest was starting to hurt at this point from how hard his heart was going, could even hear it in his ears, but in a weird way the pain helped him focus on the current issue. The momentary distraction was helping. He thought as quick as he could to try and come up with a plan.

"If I had just a second I could turn Yamato back into an Emerald. Use Quicksilver. Use the pointy end of the Chaos Emerald to gouge out Scourge's and Miles' eyes. Find a safe corner, end time stop, turn Emerald back into sword. Cut self open, store Emerald inside body, use Devil's Body. Go back to Scourge. Break kneecaps. Everyone else'd be helpless after. Don't know numbers, doesn't matter. Break them, too. Should be safe after."

His best and only shot. That or just running once he had a moment, but there was... something in him that didn't agree to that. Something beneath all the fear that was angry, furious, even, that all this was happening and wanted to do something about it. But wild instincts and a need for survival were mixed in, tearing him between running or ending them all once he poked their eyes out.

The internal arguments and struggles Sorun were wrestling with were moot, though, because of one solid reason: for as good as he'd gotten mentally switching out the powers with the Chaos Emerald, there was still a one-second stall time between transitioning powers. That was a second where the sword he was holding would turn into a big, glowing gem, which may as well have been a signal flare to Scourge's eyes. A second before he'd be able to stop time with it. And for Scourge's speed a second to Sorun was practically a year for him.

He needed Scourge's eyes off of him for just a moment, and the bastard had eyes on him constantly since the moment he walked into the room. Even now while he was talking with Miles at least one of the lenses of his sunglasses was visible to Sorun, meaning he was still in his view. He wasn't turning his back to him. Bad luck on Sorun's part, or maybe a sign of experience on Scourge's. Whatever the case he wasn't turning around and Sorun didn't have any way to force him that he could see.

"Whatever, whatever, look, it's free pizza so stop thinkin' so hard on it." With that, Scourge turned his attention back to Sorun. "Which by the way means I ain't payin' for this. Didn't even order it in the first place."

"Arigato muchacho. No pay. Oui." Fuck it, this worked too. He'd take just leaving if it meant it got him out of here. "Gomen, devo andare. Exodus und all das."

Sorun started to back up a few steps. So far so good; Scourge didn't seem to care all that much, because he wasn't paying him any mind even if he wouldn't turn away. It was Miles that was concerning Sorun. His eyes wouldn't leave his, and he had a deeply discerning look on his face that Sorun had found disturbing.

He hadn't even managed to back up five steps before Miles spoke whatever was on his mind.

"He's faking not being able to speak our language."

Sorun froze. His heartrate was spiking in his ears again, becoming deafening. The discerning glare Miles had became accusing. Scourge had blinked, switching his attention between Miles and Sorun, and then looking back at Sorun. He imagined Scourge was probably squinting his eyes from the other side of the sunglasses.

"... You sure?" he asked. "'Cause, uh, it's a whole lotta gibberish comin' outta him, this guy."

"It's so painfully obvious I'm insulted in not having seen it sooner," Miles grumbled out, almost spitefully. "He's been following our words perfectly. Eye movements, subtle facial shifts, increased or decreased breathing rates after certain words are said, it's all there. His 'language' is a messed jumble of different languages, likely used to throw us off."

"Hah?" Scourge craned his head down at Miles. "Different ones?"

"From the varying phonetics and pronunciations I heard at least seven. I recognized at least one. Antoine speaks it."

"Oh, yeah, those weird words." Scourge looked back to Sorun. "Say it ain't so, delivery guy. Tell me you weren't trying to two-time me here."

"..." The last time Sorun felt his heart sink like this it was when he was strapped to a table convinced he was about to be electrocuted to death. "Damn fox," he thought, glaring down at Miles. He had the audacity to look smug about it, sending up this cruel little smirk, and if he weren't so overcome with terror at the moment Sorun would feel angry over it.

But he was. Scared for his life, enough that it was honestly hard to stay on his feet. The edges of his vision were blackening even further, and breathing was taking most of his effort. But for as hard as all that was, he was even more terrified of what would happen if he made Scourge wait too long for an answer. So he forced himself to speak. That alone was taking everything Sorun had.

"L-look man... I'm just a delivery guy," Sorun stammered out, eyes darting back and forth between the two. "I don't, I don't know what this all is but it's got nothing to do with me, okay? I just deliver stuff."

"Sure, pal, sure." He was standing besides Sorun, now. Scourge. With an arm draped all friendly-like over his shoulders, with Sorun's body petrified with fear. Once more he hadn't seen the movement it'd been so fast. "I mean, props, that was almost a half-decent play 'cause it was so annoying trying to understand you I was gonna let you go just to get you outta my quills. Buuuuut now we gotta problem, don't we?" From the corner of his eyes Sorun saw Scourge giving him a predatory grin. All his teeth were sharpened to points. "Gonna have to ask you what you're doing' here deliverin' pizzas."

"I just make delivers for the guys that work here sometimes." Pretty much a fib but Scourge didn't know that. That was all Sorun could manage. He wasn't able to think about the words he was saying. "It was a regular thing, I come here once a week with a pizza, I-I don't even know who you are or why you're here."

"Hm... ah, well..." Scourge's arm was lifted off Sorun. The green hedgehog gave sort of a lazy shrug, stepping back a bit while interlacing his fingers behind his head. "If that's true, then... you must be pretty close with those Freedom Chumps, huh, guy?"

Lie. Lie, lie, lie. "They just pay me for pizza, I don't-"

"Nah nah nah nah, nah. Nah. C'mon, we're past lying here." Scourge's grin widened, showing off those sharp teeth of his. "Not claimin' to be an expert or nothin', but I got a pretty good lay of the land. Not a single pizza joint a hundred miles of here, so you must got somethin' special goin' on to make a journey like that all the time. And it ain't gonna be just anyone those idiots are gonna trust to... eh, well, maybe they would. But I gotta figure you gotta be at least on a first-name basis with 'em all if you make such regular deliveries." An airy sort of chuckle left his throat. "Eh? Mr. Delivery Guy?"

"If it helps," Miles added, almost sounding creepy with how gleeful he seemed to be finding the situation, "I was looking through the computer in their lab and came upon a personnel database and found some rather interesting files. About a human Freedom Fighter they used to have named Sorun."

Goddammit.

"That right?" Scourge leaned forwards on the balls of his feet, humming while looking Sorun over. "I don't know a whole lot about 'em, but I can spot a human, and you're lookin' pretty human-y, here, guy. Your name wouldn't happen to be Sorun, now, would it? Huh?"

"Nnnno..." Sorun denied. It was a weak denial, though. Said in a weak voice. From the smiles both of the Mobians were wearing it was clear they saw the lie. "My name's not Sorun, it's... Caeruleus."

For the first time since this interrogation started Scourge's grin dropped. "I said quit lying, so knock it off with the language shtick." The grin returned, and he began slowly stepping forwards. "But I mean, come on, it's obvious. Look at you. This coat?" He stopped right in front of Sorun, poking him in the shoulder. "Look at this coat. This coat's fly. There's no way some background extra like a pizza delivery guy'd be wearing somethin' this distinctive, right? Former Freedom Fighter, though, hey... I can see it." His eyes flickered downwards. "Weird sword's kinda a dead giveaway, too, now that I think about it."

Sorun had ended up stumbling back from the pokes on the shoulder Scourge had given him. He was becoming lightheaded. Staying on his feet was becoming a challenge, the breathing was getting worse and he couldn't even think coherent thoughts at this point. He was pretty sure he was shaking at this point.

"Alright, alright, quit it with the huffin'. Geez." Stepping back a bit, Scourge turned back to Miles. "Well hey, listen, I wasn't planning on taking a hostage, but if this guy's just gonna wander in here, I mean, we just gotta, right? We can probably get those guys frothing at the mouth with this." He turned back to Sorun, grin ever wider. "And hey, tell ya what! That pizza? Not bad at all! So I won't even break your legs over the whole lying thing!"

It was too much. Too much. Everything was spinning, vision blurring so much that nothing was clear. Skin so hot it felt like it was on fire, chest nothing but a loud, constant throb. He couldn't even breath anymore, like a dam somewhere inside of him had burst and was smothering him. Too much. Too much pressure, too much fear. Sorun couldn't take it anymore.

"I... I can't..." He swayed on his feet, quickly feeling his balance losing him. He couldn't even tell when he'd fallen over - his vision was too blurred to make out the change in scenery. He hadn't been able to feel the impact. All of it, everything, the world around him. All fading. "It's too much, I... it... help..."

Everything went dark as Sorun lost consciousness.

He'd fainted from fright.

A/N- I kinda thought about Sorun faking a heart attack as a last-ditch attempt but it felt too campy at that point. I'm already walking a tightrope between comedy and seriousness here. But yeah, here's the Scourge fight everyone wanted for some reason. All wrapped up in a single chapter and everything.

Chapter 95

Recursion Error

Episode 95- Stranded. Again.

At this point in his life Sorun had seriously considered that'd he'd already fallen as low as he could ever fall and it would only be up from there, but no, somehow he always managed to find a brand new low. The bedrock just didn't exist. He didn't believe in it anymore.

He felt sick. Not in the emotional sense - though there was plenty of that seeing as he fainted on the spot and got captured as a result, feeling that brand of sickening shame was all but a forgone conclusion - but in that, he actually felt sick ever since he woke up from that. Genuinely nauseous. Weak. The feeling hadn't really been going away in the few hours he'd been awake after that.

The fact his arms were bound to his sides by rope probably wasn't helping the matter. Certainly wasn't helping his mood, and the only silver lining Sorun could see was that all they'd done was kidnap him and tie him up. Or that they'd decided to leave him in some kind of poorly-lit backroom somewhere with stone walls of all things. The kind of dark stones they used to build old timey castles. And as far has he knew structures like that weren't really around anywhere, so... he was operating under the assumption that after he went to sleep they dumped him off in their own zone. The Moebius Zone. And he didn't know what ended up happening to his blue Chaos Emerald, too, so that was great.

Stuck in a whole different zone in some dingy room with a bunch of evil doubles of his friends while tied up. Fuck everything.

Could have been worse, if barely. They could have just stuck him in a broom closet somewhere. Or a cell, which made Sorun a bit surprised they hadn't, though the room he was currently sitting in wasn't all that much bigger than a cell would be, so he supposed it wouldn't do to be that optimistic. Wasn't even a bed in here. Just a few wooden crates lying around, a swinging lightbulb for light, and a table. Sorun elected to just sit on the ground while leaning his back against a crate. The person he assumed was only here to watch him was sitting on the table while looking down at him.

He chose not to speak to her.

There was a clicking sound, made by the Mobian's mouth out of boredom. She had one leg swung over the other, arms crossed as she looked down at him with equally bored, blue eyes. Sorun didn't know who she was, but at this point he was reasonably good at identifying Mobian species and concluded she was probably a fox. He thought. The red fur and hair was throwing him off but the ears and the one tail were extremely similar to Tails', so he thought it was a good guess.

What did draw his attention was the outfit. Black leather bodysuit and black boots. It was so out there he couldn't help but do a double-take on it, but even so he had to concede it was, somehow, more modest than the outfit that... that one echidna from the bad future that didn't exist anymore wore. The one whose jaw he broke. He forgot her name.

It was probably real leather, too. Moebius was supposed to be some wacko mirror world to Mobius so Sorun wouldn't at all be surprised to learn they actually stripped skin off Mobians to process them into clothing here.

Evidently, while Sorun was perfectly content to just sit there in silence, stewing in extreme displeasure over this whole situation, and no small amount of anxiety, she wasn't. Because she made an annoyed sound and snapped out, "What, you're not gonna say anything?"

"Yeah." Honestly, Sorun was surprised at himself for giving such a measured response. He still felt sick, he still felt, plainly, bad about what was happening, embarrassment and humiliation notwithstanding to being kidnapped, but with how many times something like this had happened now he was starting to fear he was getting used to it. Or, more likely, because Scourge wasn't here. Because he didn't have some instinctual feeling screaming at Sorun that he was standing in front of someone who was probably going to kill him faster than he could blink and he couldn't do a thing about it. That overbearing presence that green hedgehog alone carried.

"You're real boring for a hostage, you know that?" the probably-fox noted.

Baleful eyes looked up from the wall they'd been staring at to meet the Mobian's eyes. A clever witticism didn't jump out in Sorun's mind to immediately use to counter her words, and he just wasn't in the mood to expend brain power on thinking one up. The more common ones, the "go to hell" snapbacks and the such, had always been too grossly overused and predicable in Sorun's eyes. He didn't have the pride to spend on petty insults people saw coming from a mile away so he tried his best to stray away from ever saying them.

The bad part about that philosophy was that now he was just staring silently at his watcher and Sorun'd realized all too late that it was probably coming off as creepy and maybe was even worse than just telling her off.

"You're a creepy one, huh?" she remarked. "But you seriously don't have anything to say? Nobody back in... what was it, New Mobotropolis now? Nobody there had anything to say about me? Nothing?"

It took a few more moments of Sorun scrutinizing the Mobian for some things to finally click in his mind. "Oh, wait, you're Fiona?" he realized. "Yeah, Tails talked about you for a bit." It also meant his guess on her being a fox was spot-on, so he congratulated himself a bit for that.

She smirked a bit at hearing the recognition. "Yep, that's right." She stopped, looking at Sorun to gauge him for a reaction. The problem was he had absolutely no reaction and just continued to stare blankly at her. It caused Fiona's smirk to drop off somewhat and made her continue with, "And...?"

"And what?"

"And... do you have anything to say about that?"

"No?" He was more confused than anything else at the question. "Why would I care about who you are? I don't." He certainly cared about the kidnapping thing, but he felt that went without saying. But everything else about Fiona were details he couldn't care less about.

The red fox's smirk was all but gone now, her face making it look like she'd been caught off her guard. "Well, um. No reason," she said. "I kinda just thought you'd have something to say 'cause of the whole... Tails told you everything that happened, right? The whole thing that happened between us?"

"That?" It made Sorun blanch a bit. He felt awkward just thinking about that conversation. "I mean, listen, real talk, I was kinda on his side 'til he mentioned you were about as old as Sonic and I am, at which point I did a whole one-eighty and thought to myself, 'ah, this poor idiot didn't have a chance.'" Something Sorun had said caused an amused look to grow on Fiona's face, so he continued. "Like, I get it , kinda. Kids are stupid, I saw kids do stupid things all the time where I come from, and genius or not Tails is a kid, so I get him thinking there was something between you two when there wasn't a chance in hell there was ever gonna be anything there. I can't even be mad about the slap part. Sometimes kids just need a reality check."

There was the whole "leading him on" thing Tails had mentioned that Fiona did to him, which, to Sorun's ears, did sound like textbook manipulation which he did have an opinion of, but he kept those thoughts silent. Because it was looking like Fiona was liking some of the things she was hearing, and he needed whatever he could get at this juncture. Probably wouldn't do him good to make her upset and lose interest. So he'd speak from the heart, but only the parts she probably wanted to hear. Maybe he'd see an opportunity out of this yet that way.

"Ha! Yeah... nice kid, but you're right, he needed one." After making that laugh she'd leaned forwards on the table she'd been sitting on, the smallest of smiles forming on her lips. She looked the slightest bit interested in him now. "You know, I gotta say. You weren't what I was expecting when I heard Scourge kidnapped a former Freedom Fighter."

"The 'former' bit in there didn't tip you off to anything?" Sorun asked her.

Fiona shrugged. "Should probably have, yeah, but I hung around with them to know what their whole deal was, you know?" She made a shaky gesture with her hand. "Like... just how they ticked? The whole hero thing they had goin' for them, how they were likeminded on a bunch of stuff. You, though," she shook her head, "all the vibes I always felt off of them? I'm not getting any of them off you."

"Yeah, probably 'cause I quit," Sorun said to her. "I got out of that gig as soon as I could. You think I even wanted to be a Freedom Fighter in the first place with those guys? That job was a nightmare. I got out just so I wouldn't have to deal with shit like this anymore." The ropes binding Sorun's arms to his sides rustled in response.

For some reason his words just made Fiona make an even odder expression as she looked at him. "You don't even talk like them," she noted. It made Sorun wonder if swear words really did have such a profane effect on Mobian culture, because he never heard them come out of anyone's mouth. And he did his best not to add them to the world with marginal success. "What were you even doing with them in the first place?"

"That's a really long story I don't have the patience to get into. Feel like it'd take a million words to get it all out," Sorun grumbled.

Fiona's response was to gesture around to the room they were in. "Not like you're going anywhere," she pointed out. "And besides, I wanna hear it."

A scowl formed on Sorun's face. "Okay, lemme rephrase it: you kidnapped me, so no."

"Pfft, fine. Prude." If there was any interest in Fiona's expression, it died away right there. Sorun didn't see it as being favorable to his position so he tried shifting gears.

"Why'd you all even bother kidnapping me?" Sorun asked her. "I lied about the language thing, yeah, but I honestly am just a delivery guy. I don't exactly have what'd you call intrinsic value." What he really wanted to ask was what happened with his Chaos Emerald, but given the situation he'd pretty much given up hope on getting that thing back. Which sucked - he needed that.

Fortunately, and likely due to boredom on her part, Fiona seemed to be in a talkative mood. "It's mostly because Scourge figured you were well-off with all the Freedom Fighters. Literally the first thing he did after we caught you was go and brag to them that he had you as a hostage. He must have found what he was looking for because he came back laughing his head off. Said it really set them off."

Well, that was great. Now everyone knew he got himself got by a bunch of evil doubles. Bad enough it was going to cause trouble for a lot of people, but now he had that level of embarrassment to stack on top of everything else. "What are you guys even doing stealing their HQ in the first place? Don't you have a whole zone of your own to fuck around in? Why'd you bother coming to Mobius?"

That question, for whatever reason, caught Fiona a bit off guard. No, more than that - she looked outright uncomfortable, enough that she glanced away from Sorun. "That was all Scourge's idea," she admitted.

Scourge's idea. Meaning his and not anyone else's. And seeing how he was comparable to Sonic, probably even stronger if he heard the stories right, he could see why saying "no" to him wasn't a good idea in practice. Sorun rolled with the questioning, finding traction in the topic. "You don't sound like you approve," he noted.

"Of course I approve of anything he says!" she snapped at him rather quickly, looking back at Sorun. "It's just that we have a good thing going here on Moebius-" Ah, so he was in their zone after all, "-and have the whole planet eating out of our palm after Scourge conquered it." He conquered the whole planet. That was sobering. "He just... it's this thing with him. He doesn't want to be seen as just 'evil Sonic', and most of this is just proving to everyone that we're all our own people. Mostly to himself," she muttered off to the side. "I'm not sure how far he's gonna take this. Maybe he'll try conquering Mobius, too. Try and cement him as being the best version of Sonic around. That everyone here is the superior versions. Wouldn't shock me."

So obsessed, was the conclusion Sorun came to. He was obsessed at solidifying his own identity separate from just being a Sonic. Sorun wasn't even sure he could blame him - with how many Sonics he saw during the multiverse road trip he counted it fortunate he never saw an alternate Sorun in any of those worlds. Doubted he or anyone else from Earth even had alternate versions anywhere since it wasn't even connected to this multiverse. But if he had... Sorun didn't know. It was a weird thought that made him a bit uncomfortable. The mere thought would make him question his own validity as a person if there were naturally doubles of himself out there just walking around.

For all the things he hated about this world in general, Sorun could give it one compliment. All the evil people, for all their wrong, were shockingly easy to "get" in a sense. Eggman did everything he did because he was an egomaniac that liked hurting people. That was it, cut and dry. Oddly refreshing in a sense. And Scourge was doing this for... what, validity? Self-esteem? Some inferiority complex? Because he was just naturally an asshole due to being from the evil world, whose existence alone brought up all sorts of questions he didn't wanna think about? He didn't know. It's what he got from just listening to Fiona, but he wasn't sure how reliable that was.

He let out a sigh. Didn't really matter in the end. He didn't need to get in the guy's headspace to know he'd kidnapped Sorun and, as a result, Sorun would likely hate him forever now. Hate him about as much as he was scared of him, at any rate, because unless he had his full suite of powers, or at least a handful of the more useful ones, that was a force he was just flat-out not winning against. And without even that one Chaos Emerald all he had going for him was dry wit.

That and the... other thing. That let him punch through a whole nightstand, among everything else that'd been going on. But that was unreliable at best and Sorun didn't even know what the deal with it was.

"Well, that's good for him," Sorun noted in a dry voice. "But outside of annoying the Freedom Fighters," Sorun continued, and he knew that was a lie. He'd like for them to be annoyed but they were probably way beyond that hearing what happened with him, which in itself was as endearing as it was irritating, "not really seeing what kind of strategic value holding me has. You kidnapped a package courier, not the king or someone like that. And you stole their HQ - they already had plenty of motivation to fight you all, more even if Scourge is gonna commit to this invasion idea," Sorun pointed out. "Seriously, you don't really get anything holding me here."

Wasn't true at all; a hostage people cared about was a hell of a bargaining chip and knowing the Freedom Fighters they'd fight tooth and nail to get a hostage back even if it was some random joe schmoe that got grabbed off the streets of New Mobotropolis. And he actually knew them so there was an emotional connection to consider. Quite honestly they lucked out nabbing him, a fact Sorun loathed to admit. But he was hoping Fiona didn't realize any of these facts. That'd he'd be more trouble keeping than he was worth and that it'd maybe be best to let him go.

"Nah. I don't think so." Sorun bit back a curse hearing that - she wasn't biting. "Never know when a hostage could come in handy. Maybe they'll catch one of our guys and we'll need to do a prisoner swap. Maybe Scourge'll feel like cutting some of your fingers off and showing the Freedom Fighters just to see the looks on their faces." Fiona shrugged while Sorun stared with a blank expression. "But hey, them's the breaks. Sorry." She didn't sound sorry at all.

"... You all suck." Sorun wished he had the energy to say something more than that, but he didn't. Between the sick feeling and the dread this situation was putting him in there just wasn't anything in the tank for anything else to be said on his part. The situation as a whole sucked, but between them kidnapping him and everything Fiona said these people just sounded plain awful.

"Yeah, and you're the one sitting there all tied up. Must suck to suck." With that, Fiona slid herself off the table. She stepped towards Sorun and bent down so they were eye level, a mocking smile on her face. "I gotta go swap out with the next person set to look after ya, so try not to get too uncomfortable, okay?"

The look Sorun gave her couldn't have been more dry if he tried. "I don't think it'll be that hard. You didn't even tie me to a chair. You just left me on the floor."

"Good boy." She patted him on the cheek. If she wasn't so much stronger than him by virtue of being a Mobian he would have bit the hand. "And you really shouldn't be complaining that much," she continued, stopping at the doorway to the room. She looked spiteful now. "The digs you're getting here are better than most prisons."

And with those rather scathing-sounding words she left, locking the door behind her and leaving Sorun to stew in his own maelstrom of brewing emotions. Feelings and thoughts all of which culminated into Sorun sighing and thunking his head on the crate he was sitting against. He did nothing otherwise.

It occurred to Sorun that maybe he should try escaping at some point. He could liken the will to escape his bonds and leave this place like a flame, and like a flame it was snuffed to oblivion when he thought further ahead and wondered what he was supposed to do about the fact he was stuck in another zone with no Yamato.

He didn't know the lay of the land. The general disposition of people, locations, hell, he didn't even know the layout of the... what he assumed was a castle but he only saw this room so he didn't really know. Escaping this place didn't necessitate escape from the situation as a whole - whereas if he stayed his greatest chance of escaping would be to wait to be rescued by the others. Stay in a place they knew to look in instead of making them look all over for him. He was stranded otherwise.

That's what really rubbed Sorun the wrong way. Being in a situation where he had to be rescued due to his own inefficiencies. It was demeaning. Humiliating. He'd say humbling, but Sorun had already reached lows so low he wasn't even certain he could be humbled any further by life. And he hated that. Almost more than what was happening to him. And knowing them it'd be fucking Sonic to the rescue.

Getting rescued by him of all people. As far as Sorun saw it was worse than being kidnapped. Having to rely on him .

If there was a saving grace, it was that the evil knockoffs hadn't actually done anything to him other than tie him up and leave him in a room. Yet. He was hoping some of the things Fiona said were just to scare him, but he'd seen too much evidence to point to the contrary. Scourge had conquered a planet. Was the opposite of Sonic, who Sorun doubted would kill to save his own life. Scourge and Miles had talked of poisonings, at least on the part of one of their members. But they were aware and didn't seem to mind.

There'd been killings. Had to have been if he really conquered a planet. So if they were really willing to go that far he didn't see how torture wouldn't be on the table. And that was the last thing he needed, more sympathy and worry from others because he'd been hurt. It'd probably hit Nicole worst of all, and to Sorun that was infinitely worse than whatever they'd do to him. Especially since he could just fix whatever damage was inflicted if he got his hands on a Chaos Emerald. And mental scars could be cut out.

But... there was nothing to do but sit here and hope for the best. Because Sorun lacked the strength, ability, and technique to get out of this.

He looked towards his current watcher. They were rotating them out, every six hours it seemed since that was how long Fiona stayed before leaving. He didn't know if this one had stayed as long, there was no clock, but it felt around six hours. He didn't know why exactly they were having someone guard him constantly instead of just throwing him in a cell somewhere and leaving him. He doubted they didn't have a facility like that, or couldn't make one on the fly. More likely it was because he'd popped up in the Freedom HQ without using any entrances and they were worried he had some ability they didn't know about, not knowing anything he could do was linked to the Emeralds. So a guard seemed to be a precaution more than anything.

It made Sorun scoff. At least that detail hadn't been in that damn database. He couldn't understand why Tails hadn't scrubbed his fucking profile after he left.

Unlike his last guard, this one wasn't as talkative. It was Antoine's evil double. Who, for whatever reason, was dressed like a biker of all things, leather jacket and all. And an eyepatch over his left eye. Still carried around a saber, even if he wasn't dressed for the part for that weapon like the real Antoine, but outside the clothes and eyepatch this was was a deadringer for his Antoine.

Kind of had the air of a jackass around him, too, but Sorun wouldn't be surprised to learn if everyone on this miserable planet did.

The coyote shifted where he was standing, leaning against the table across from Sorun with an irritated expression on his face. He looked towards the one door leading into the room, looking like he was about ready to bite it in half. "Where iz zat woman?" not-Antoine grumbled out.

Ah. So it had been six hours and he was waiting for the next person to switch out with him. Sorun'd be a bit upset, too.

"You can't speak very well either, huh?" Sorun observed. Not-Antoine's single eye snapped in his direction.

"What was zat?" he demanded.

"Your language. It's fucking butchered," Sorun clarified. "The real Antoine's the same way 'cause his parents tried teaching him two languages at once and now he just speaks both badly, but I kinda figured that circumstance was so specific there was no way it could be repeated on a double from another universe. But you have the same speech impediment he does. I just think it's weird."

"... Ze 'real' Antoine." Not-Antoine's face wrinkled in disgust saying the words out loud. "What makes him real et not moi?"

"Well... the Antoine I know's from the Prime Zone. I was lead to believe that was the first, original zone. And every other universe in the multiverse is an offshoot of that one. This is the information that was provided to me," Sorun said. "And what I've been lead to believe is that this zone only serves to be a 'mirror' of sorts to that world. Everyone here is supposed to be an opposite of the original." He leaned forwards a bit, torso tilted towards the ground so that he was forced to look up at not-Antoine. "By that logic, doesn't that mean that your entire personality is based off the opposite of his? The 'real' one? How much of you is you and not just the opposite of the real Antoine?"

He didn't respond immediately. His one eye was narrowed at Sorun, and his fingers were tapping away irritably on the surface of the table he was leaning on. He didn't look pleased at Sorun's words, but there was something else in his gaze Sorun couldn't place. "You zound like Scourge," not-Antoine said, and Sorun realized what that gaze was. He was perturbed at being reminded of something.

"Him? From what Fiona told me he's obsessed about carving out his own identity and not being stuck as just an evil Sonic. Wants the same for all of you, in fact. Said so herself," Sorun continued. Not-Antoine made a "tsk" noise and turned his head away. "He wondered the same thing, didn't he? Brought the question up with all of you? Is that why you follow him?"

"We 'follow' him because zat hedgehog iz a seekopath who mutilates anyone who doez not go hiz way!" not-Antoine hissed out, turning his head back to Sorun. His teeth were bared as he continued to growl out, "You zink we care? Zat any of us cared zere was a different world with different us's? Non, nevair, but him , he iz ze one obsessed weeth hiz image! We were all fine here!"

The coyote exhaled, and then took a breath while shaking his head. Sorun watched on silently, straightening his torso out as he watched the Mobian compose himself before saying his next words. "Besides zat point," not-Antoine said, "I would wonder how 'real' zat Antoine iz when hiz friends had not even notice-ed I had been replacing him for half a year."

Hearing that, Sorun's eyes narrowed. With those words he'd suddenly been reminded of what this Antoine had done to his at one point. "Right... you abducted him. Stuck him in this zone and pretended to be him for six months," he bitterly mumbled out. "You almost destroyed his whole life doing that. Why?"

"Because I was zick of playing ze underling to Scourge. Because I thoughted zose imbeciles in le Freedom Fighter would not be ze noticing ones, and I was right. Eet was not even zat hard replacing him. Eet was pazetic. I am surprise-ed he even managed to survive living here for zo long." Not-Antoine made a scoff at the mere memory of the event. But then he smirked a bit at some other memory. "Ahh, and I had put zo much of ze planning and ze scheming into ze new life I was to make zere. Such a pity zey caught me when zey did, but at least I got to see my poor, pazetic double's face as hiz fathair laid zere dying right in front of him."

The sentence reached Sorun's ears. He'd heard it, and processed the words he heard. It was a piece of information so disturbing and shocking he'd actually jolted a bit where he sat, and after Sorun felt his entire body go completely still as he looked up at not-Antoine. "What?" he asked, voice toneless. A tiny electrical spark of green bolted over his blue eyes.

"Oh, zat. He did not tell you? I am not finding myself so surprise-ed." He waved a hand casually. Casually . Like the death of someone's father deserved such a casual gesture. It was a sight that felt violently wrong to Sorun's eyes. "He had zuch a high position in ze Acorn Kingdom's military. A position I wanted and deserved. Whatever life zat position would have given me would be infinitely better zan whatever life I could have here; it's why I swapped weeth him in ze first place! And why would zat cretin's fathair evair suspect hiz own flesh et blood would be poisoning him? Everyone would 'ave thought ze old feool would die of natural causes and I would have been promoted if I had not been caught."

That was wrong. That was so wrong. Him . He was wrong. Everything about him was wrong.

"You..." Sorun twitched, as if he'd been violently struck. "You stole six months of his life and killed his dad... for status...?"

"Of course I did! What, did you zink-?"

The rest of the words were lost on Sorun. Not-Antoine was still talking, he could see his mouth moving and could vaguely hear something in the background that sounded like sounds, maybe words, but it was all being drowned out. It was the first time Sorun had ever heard Antoine's dad had died. That he'd been been assassinated from some poser trying to replace him for a comfier life than what he had in this zone.

His heart was beating hard in his chest. His blood - it was flowing much faster than it should, but Sorun didn't care. Couldn't even register it or the sounds coming out of not-Antoine as he stared at him. He felt... when was it? When was the last time he'd felt so angry? When the Neo-Walkers tried to deprive him of life? When he'd seen the husks of all his friends strung up on a wall behind Enerjak? What Sorun felt now, sitting there completely still while staring at not-Antoine, all those feelings seemed tame in comparison. This was something new he'd never felt before in his life that exceeded all of that anger. This wasn't even close to anger, or wrath, or fury, this... this was...

Rage .

It was the oddest thing. Never before in Sorun's life had his thoughts become so clear than when this feeling of absolute rage began to flood his very being. A state of focus so sharp and clear it felt almost surreal. Almost peaceful , of all things. It was a jarring juxtaposition to the absolute rage and hatred coursing through him, a feeling that should have harshly clashed with the fact that, sitting there, Sorun felt calmer and had a more clear head than he ever had in his entire life. He couldn't understand the phenomenon, and wasn't even sure he wanted to. It was serene. And sitting there, in what may as well have been a state of rageful zen, a single thought coursed through Sorun's entire being so thoroughly and completely it was almost as if he were that thought.

He wanted to hurt the person standing there in front of him bragging about the fact he'd poisoned the father of one of his best friends. Laughing about it to Sorun's face. It wasn't just a passing thought, or a random whim. It was an absolute fact. Sorun was going to hurt this person.

Drip.

Drip.

Drip.

"Huh?" Whatever not-Antoine was saying, he'd stopped mid-sentence. He looked confused when he looked over at Sorun, still sitting there on the ground and tied up, and noted, with even greater confusion, there were two changes. One was the stream of blood steadily flowing out of Sorun's nose and dripping onto the stone ground below them. The second was that his eyes had turned from a dark blue to a glowing green.

"Hhhh..." A rattling breath left Sorun when he stood up straighter. Green trails of light followed his eyes as he stared at not-Antoine with oddly calm eyes. "You did all that, huh?"

Creeeak...

Not-Antoine's single eye darted downwards. He grew the slightest bit alarmed when he saw Sorun's right hand. The fingernails had turned completely black and were extending. Lengthening into sharp claws jutting out of the tips of his fingers.

And then Sorun shrugged and the ropes binding him snapped completely off.

The one-eyed coyote that had been watching Sorun tried to move and do something the second the ropes came off. There hadn't been a chance. Sorun had sprung right up off the ground and leaped at not-Antoine with speeds and unnatural movements that couldn't be classified as human. The saber attached to his side and been torn off by Sorun and tossed to the back of the room. And then his left arm grabbed not-Antoine by the throat, shoving him forwards and against the table he'd been leaning on, trapping him between it and Sorun.

Gagging out, expression twisted in pain and anger, not-Antoine tried lashing out at Sorun. He didn't like that. So he'd plunged that sharpened, black nails on his right hand down and through not-Antoine's left shoulder. The leather of his jacket and the Mobian's flesh parted almost too easily, allowed Sorun to sink his whole fingers into the shoulder.

The anger in not-Antoine's face faded. Now it was just pain and anguish, and he'd made a high-pitched whining sound as his struggles against Sorun weakened greatly.

"Settle down there, coyote," Sorun demanded in a soft voice. Surprisingly, the struggling did almost cease entirely, though Sorun wasn't sure if it was because of the pain or fear. There was both on not-Antoine's face.

In response to the struggling stopping, Sorun tore his clawed fingers out of not-Antoine's shoulder. Two things happened: not-Antoine jolted and shouted out in pain, and some of the blood had flown out from his shoulder due to the force he'd pulled it out. More than that, some of it had spattered onto Sorun's face. Just a few drops had accidentally wound up in his mouth.

Sorun almost gagged from feeling the blood hit his mouth and almost spit it out, but then stopped. The blood, what little there was, didn't taste how he'd expect. He'd tasted his own blood and had known what to expect, but this wasn't it. Not this tingly... almost tangy taste. Nor this sensation. Like the blood was charged with something.

It was... good?

In his confusion a few locks of his hair fell in front of Sorun's face. What immediately caught his attention was a few hairs in particular. The blood that wound up in his mouth, he'd accidentally swallowed it on reflex. And he saw, right before his eyes, the moment he'd did that a few, just about three or four, of his black hairs had turned white. A miniscule, negligible change. But a change nonetheless. And he felt just the slightest bit stronger.

"Huh. Ain't that interesting?" He filed the information away for later. He was more focused on the coyote squirming in his grasp, and so looked back down at not-Antoine. The shoulder wound he'd inflicted was bleeding profusely, already beginning to pool on the floor. One of his claws had probably nicked the subclavian artery, if Mobians even had those. He assumed the anatomy was close enough to humans that it was the case. Wouldn't be bleeding that heavily otherwise.

Didn't matter. His gaze shifted to not-Antoine's face. He was wide-eyed, panicked. Breathing heavily to the point he was wheezing. It felt satisfying.

"Hhhh..." Sorun's clawed hand began moving, the tips dragging along the surface of not-Antoine's jacket as they approached his face. The coyote began squirming a bit more harshly, but stopped cold when the claws began dragging themselves along his face, gentle-like. They stopped at the eyepatch. "Dear, oh dear. What happened here?" Sorun asked as he tore the eyepatch off, casting it off to the side.

It was about as bad as one would expect. The eye was completely gone, and there was a large, jagged scar going through the eye, starting above the brow and ending just above his cheek. And the scar itself... the certain way the edges were frayed. Sorun felt like he'd seen such a wound before.

Oh. Wait. He had. On Eggman's robots.

"I recognize this kind of wound. Did Scourge do this to you? Spin Dash you right in the face?" Sorun asked. Not-Antoine remained silent. "That sucks, man. Though..."

The tip of his index finger, and the black claw jutting out of its tip, drifted over to the empty eye socket. Not-Antoine began squirming again, more fiercely this time, when the tip slowly pushed into the eye socket. "Antoine's a sweet guy, you know? One of my best friends here. And you almost ruined his life. Killed his dad." He could feel warm flesh pulse around his finger as he slowly lowered it into the empty socket. Heard not-Antoine softly whimper below him. "Ya think I could reach all the way to the hole in the back of your eye socket where the ocular nerves of your eye are supposed to feed through to your brain? Think I could scrape away at your cerebellum from here? Or maybe..."

Suddenly, he stopped. His finger exited the eye hole - in addition to the blood clear, viscous fluid had coated the finger, though he could see from here no damage had been done to the empty eye socket. The finger hovered to the other side of the coyote's face, who went dead still when he saw the single claw hovering over his one good eye.

"You don't really need to see, do you?" Sorun asked. The finger began lowering. "Father-murdering bastard like you doesn't seem to be putting your eyesight to good use anyways, so why should you get to keep it? Antoine's father isn't seeing anything anymore because of what you did."

"Non, n-non, don't, don't do it, please, no-" Sorun's left hand tightened around not-Antoine's throat, causing him to let out a strangles gasp. He was shaking now, his eye quivering as the claw lowered and lowered. Airy gasps continued to leave him when Sorun felt the slightest pressure in his finger from the tip of his claw making contact with the eye. The slightest push and-

"Drop him. Now."

Sorun's head picked up. He hadn't heard the door to the side of the room open. Nor had he even heard the footsteps. Curiosity got the better of him and he lifted his claw off the eye before he'd managed to pierce it, making not-Antoine sag in relief in his grasp. Sorun looked towards the speaker standing in the doorway.

Hmph. The blue jumpsuit was new but the person looked exactly like Sally, just with a slightly different haircut. And the dangerous look in her eyes he wasn't used to seeing. He'd recognized the voice but he should have guessed it was her alone from the fact she managed to make it there without Sorun hearing her. From what he'd heard her name was Alicia for some reason he didn't care for.

She was in the way, though. He didn't like that.

"Hhhhh..." Another rattling breath left Sorun, glowing green eyes blinking, as he considered the request. "Sure."

He decided to test something risky to see just how much this form and a few drops of blood got him. So he'd released not-Antoine's throat with his left hand, only to then grab his face with his clawed right hand. He twisted around and attempted to throw the coyote - to Sorun's mild surprise he actually succeeded, managed to toss not-Antoine at Alicia. It'd worked. In fact it almost worked too well, because when he hit her they both tumbled right through the door and sprawled out into the corridor beyond, going as far as to hit the wall.

Not-Antoine ended up laying against the wall. Alicia was flat on the ground, groaning and shaking her head in an attempt to recover. Sorun had rapidly stepped out of the room to approach the two, but stopped when he noticed an object laying next to Alicia: a leather whip. She'd probably dropped it after he'd thrown not-Antoine at her.

Not wasting a moment he'd scooped the whip up, stepped over Alicia's body, and then rapidly wrapped the whip around her throat. With that done he pulled it taut, constricting the Mobian's throat and lifting her head off the ground. She gagged out as a result, making wheezing gasps as she, in a panic, scratched and reached out towards the whip around her neck. She wasn't able to get up to do something about it. Sorun kept her pinned by pressing his foot on her back.

Another groan had caught Sorun's attention. Not-Antoine was starting to get up, and though his one eye was bleary and slightly unfocused, he was still looking at Sorun. Another rattling breath left him as he clenched both ends of the whip choking Alicia with his left hand. His right, clawed hand flicked forwards, grabbing not-Antoine by the throat and slamming his head into the wall. He pulled him back and slammed him again, and this time it'd been hard enough that some of the dark stones comprising the wall were dislodged and fell to the ground. In that same instant he was limp, falling unconscious, at which point Sorun let him go. He fell limply onto the ground.

Below him the gasping struggles performed by Alicia were growing weaker. Her arms were quickly losing steam and beginning to sag, and the wheezing was growing quieter. When he leaned forwards to look at her face he could see her eyes were half-lidded, like she was on the verge of growing unconscious. A few seconds after that observation she did go unconscious, eyes closing and arms going completely limp. He waited a few seconds to ensure she wasn't faking it, and then released the whip, ceasing the strangulation and letting Alicia's face flop against the stone ground.

He waited a few more seconds, just in case. She wasn't getting up.

"I just wanted to give a fucking pizza to my friends." Hissing out hatefully, he kicked out at Alicia's side hard enough that her unconscious body rolled over onto her back. "Fuck... fucking... alright playing prisoner ain't an option anymore, so, so what, what do I do, the hell do I go-?"

Footsteps. Approaching from behind Sorun, around a corner. He whirled towards it, cursing and glancing around at the same time. He internally cursed again when he realized there wasn't a hiding spot: it was just a narrow, stone corridor. It was either hide in the room or...

Humming, he glanced up at the ceiling. And then Sorun looked down at his right hand, tipped with black claws. He flexed the fingers in consideration. This wasn't a normal thing he could do, but as he was right now, with these few white hairs, he might be able to with the strength he had at the moment.

He decided in a split second to commit to the idea and just hide in the room if it didn't work out. So with that thought he jumped. High enough that he managed to reach the ceiling to the corridor, after which he dug his claws in through the stone ceiling. To his surprise it worked - he'd anchored himself and managed to stay suspended. He couldn't hold in the bemused huff that left him as he pulled himself higher to get as far off the ground as possible. Just in time, too, because the one making those footstep noises had finally rounded the corner.

Sorun couldn't help the surprised smile that slowly spread over his face. It was Miles.

The initial expression that had been on the little fox's face when he rounded that corner was alarm, maybe a bit of concern. Alerted from all the sounds of struggling, most likely, just happened to be around and had come to investigate the noise. But then he saw the two bodies lying in the corridor, and that alarmed look fell away to panic when he rushed over to the two of them. From his perch Sorun had noted, oddly, that after Miles stopped to look at the two bodies he looked towards the empty room with the door broken off, and saw it was empty.

And now he looked concern. Not at his two "friends", though Sorun didn't even think that term was applicable because he wasn't even looking at not-Antoine and Alicia anymore. No, his sole focus was on that empty room that Sorun wasn't in right now. Because he was hanging off the ceiling right above Miles. It somehow set Sorun opinion of him even lower, but at the moment something like that wasn't much of a concern to him.

He let go of the ceiling, dropping right behind Miles. He'd heard, obviously, from the way he went stiff and his ears went straight up. A chilling breath left him as he reached out towards the fox shoulder with his right hand. He grabbed it, gently, squeezing down with just the barest amount of pressure, enough to let him know he was there. Miles didn't so much as move.

"Hello... friend."

Roughly, he spun Miles around so they could look at each other face-to-face. He became startled at the sight of Sorun: from the glowing green eyes and the wide smile to the front teeth stained red from the blood dripping down his nose and onto his face. It must have been quite the sight, Sorun imagined, but for him the face Miles was making was an even better one. Wide eyes, the concerned, almost squeamish look. There was absolutely no aggressiveness in that look; he could almost feel it, weirdly enough. No fight whatsoever in that face. Maybe it was because he was focusing on the two bodies behind Sorun, or maybe he was a coward at heart, but there wasn't a single inkling of violence in the young Mobian in front of him. He was just scared.

For some reason Sorun found it funny.

"Y-you... you escaped," Miles stuttered out, stating the very obvious. He didn't even so much as take a step back, just remained rooted in the spot.

"Hhhhh..." Slightly, Sorun tilted his head as he looked at him. He couldn't very well leave, not now that he'd seen him. He'd alert others and they'd start looking. If he alerted Scourge... well, then that was the end. But oh, after what he'd did, Sorun wondered just how far he could take this...

"Well, it seems... it seems we underestimated you, somewhat. Ahem." Now Miles had taken a single step back, eyes darting around nervously while Sorun stared on. "See-seeing the, er, state, as it were, of my compatriots it would seem engaging you is unwise, so I would like to negotiate-"

Before he could take another step back Sorun reached out with his left hand to softly grab Miles' shoulder again. He made a small "Eep!" sound of surprise and froze completely, breathing coming out heavily as he gazed at Sorun with dread-filled eyes.

"Negotiation? That's a lotta syllables, Miles. The situation at hand doesn't need a fancy word like that," Sorun said to him, making the fox gulp. "It's simpler than you think."

"I-if this is about the kidnapping then I can assure you-"

"Sh-sh-sh, Miles, hey." Sorun leaned in closer, making Miles tilt his head back. "Listen. You're a smart cookie. Ya know how this goes."

There was a change in Miles' expression. Some of the fear ebbed away, and his gaze against Sorun hardened. It was a radical enough shift that Sorun's own smile had dimmed down from the unexpected sight.

"You can cease the bluster, Sorun. We both know a threat like that is meaningless."

And now the smile was wiped completely off Sorun's face, replaced by a perplexed look. "That so?" he asked, wondering just where the hell he was going with this.

"Please. Look at those two." Miles' eyes darted beyond Sorun, to the two fallen bodies behind him. "Rendered unconscious with the barest injuries. I only needed a second's glance at them to confirm you employed only mild force to incapacitate them." The eyes rounded back at Sorun. He was actually starting to look smug now. "And come now, we both know you were a Freedom Fighter. And we both know their type. They're not the type to employ any more force than required. I should know. My inferior other operates with that lot." He actually had the audacity to take a step forwards, expression growing more confidence as the shakiness left his voice. Sorun continued to stare, stunned. "If you were with them you must meet the same standards. You're from that zone, after all, so I shouldn't even be that surprised. So we both know threats of violence are just that: threats with no foundation to stand upon. Especially on one as young as me.

"So, in lieu of all that, I surrender." He even went as far as to raise his hands up, confidence practically oozing off of him at this point. In fact, Miles' face was almost smug-like, and he'd continued in a dry voice, "After all it would seem you have me completely cornered. It's only right I give up so we may discuss terms."

He thought that since Sorun was a Freedom Fighter in the past he wouldn't hurt a defenseless person. It took a second for it to register with Sorun, and when it did he couldn't believe it. He didn't even seem to realize Sorun wasn't even from the Prime Zone, as if that actually mattered. The evil double from the evil mirror world was assuming Sorun was from the world where he perceived everyone being a good double and that Sorun was among them. That he wasn't the kind of person that would hurt a helpless child. Because that was probably something they did here.

That was laughable. Sorun had seen Mobians just as bad as the ones here in Mobius Prime. The kindness he'd grown accustomed to wasn't ubiquitous across the whole species over there. It made him wonder if things were the same here and if there were good seeds spread along the planet. Maybe they weren't, and that's why the not-Tails standing in front of him seemed so sure, so confident, in his assertions. That Sorun had been a Freedom Fighter. The Freedom Fighters were their opposites and therefore naïve, merciful fools. He'd been one so he must also be the same. The logic was there.

"... That's a wild theory you got there, Miles," Sorun admitted to him. "You must really hate your prime variant, huh? To have that low an opinion of him? Of everyone there?"

The confident grin Miles held turned downwards. "Of course I do. You can't understand the depths of humility I suffer sharing a name and face with that dimwitted hack," he almost snarled out. "Intelligence near-equal to mine, and what does he do with it? Fiddle with planes and gadgets all day long instead of doing something meaningful with his gifts. He's a disgrace that squanders everything people like us deserve."

"People that are smarter than everyone else in the room?"

" Of course , Sorun." Miles rolled his eyes. "I didn't aid in conquering this world on a whim. It was a feat worthy of someone of my stature, of my intelligence! Because unlike my cretinous double I actually know what what my value is!"

Maybe Sorun had been overthinking all of this. Maybe he really didn't need to look past the concept of "cartoonishly evil double from another world". Because after talking with not-Antoine and not-Tails and seeing Scourge that's what it looked like it amounted to. Just a world of bad people with twisted logic Sorun could barely follow. Barely. The sad part was he almost understood these people more than their doubles he was friends with because, after all this time, he still found difficulty in comprehending how people could be so kind. What these people were displaying, the greed and megalomania, that Sorun could follow easy enough.

Too bad for Miles, though, because he was wrong about one thing.

"I wanna pose a question to you, Miles, and I want you to think really hard on this one," Sorun began. Miles' expression was slowly slipping into a cautious one after he began speaking. "Do you think it's weird there isn't a Sorun in this world? What do you think that means?" He leaned closer to Miles, who flinched back. "I'll tell you. I'm not from the Prime Zone."

Before anything else could be said, before Miles' face could even shift back into a panicked one, Sorun's balled fist flew out and nailed him right in the stomach. Miles wheezed out as all the breath left him, his body folding over Sorun's fist as he leaned forwards.

"You shouldn't make such assumptions," Sorun whispered into his ear as the fox struggled to breath. "Now, fact of the matter is you kidnapped me. I've some grievances to air."

His fist pulled away from the winded fox's stomach, only to then punch him square in the face so hard he flew into the room. He landed on the ground flat on his stomach with a pained cry, facing away from the doorway Sorun had just punched him threw. Panicked, wheezing sounds were leaving him as he tried breathing again, and at the same time he tried crawling away.

He didn't get far. Sorun's foot impacted the small of his back, halting him in place and making Miles scream out just as he managed to get a new breath in.

"From where I'm from there were people that got off on the idea of torturing kids. I'm not one of them, but you really pissed me off with what you pulled." He removed his foot from Miles' back and knelt down on a single knee. His clawed hand burst forwards, each finger digging into Miles' right shoulder all the way up to the second knuckle. Miles screamed again, a high-pitched, frightened shriek as he clawed desperately at the floor in a vain attempt at getting away. "I would have been home free if you hadn't opened your fucking mouth in front of Scourge and gave me away."

There was a sudden pressure Sorun felt at his waist. He looked down, giving an unimpressed look at the pair of tails that had wrapped around him in an attempt to throw him off. His left hand roughly gripped the tails' bases and squeezed down, hard enough that Miles made an anguished noise. "I'll tear these off if you try that shit again, Miles." Predictably, the tails went slack and unwrapped themselves.

Through it all, Sorun found that the smile from earlier wasn't returning. In fact, he was wholly frowning. This, what he was doing. Almost no satisfaction from any of it. Not like with not-Antoine, against that table. Not when he was choking Alicia out. Oh, there was some down there that Sorun recognized, but just barely. And it wasn't just due to the fact it was being muted from the sheer rage he felt just being in Miles' presence. The thing squirming beneath him and crying out in pain from the fingers digging into the shoulder, he was young. Weak . Not in brainpower, certainly not, but in physical ability he just wasn't mature. To say nothing of how easy he'd given up without even a fight. Something Sorun, begrudgingly, could respect having been in similar situations, but even so...

Still. The anger was still there and wasn't being erased, and what he was doing right now was relieving that somewhat. And he had questions that needed answering besides. The questions alone were the only reason it was even still carrying on at this point, because otherwise Sorun would have just ended it already.

"Okay, Miles, let's talk a bit." He pulled back on the shoulder he was digging into. More strangled gasps of pain from Miles as his torso was bent upwards, hands clawing desperately at the air for something. Sorun used his left hand to firmly hold Miles' left shoulder to keep him in place while his right hand tore the fingers out from his right shoulder, eliciting another cry. Crimson fluid began dripping down and staining his red jacket from the wounds as Sorun continued. "I just need to know- I can't take you seriously with this."

It was that damn hairpiece on top of his head. That gray toupee that clashed with the yellow and white fur. Sorun didn't know why, but it annoyed him, so he reached forwards with the clawed hand to tear it off.

... It wasn't coming off, Sorun discovered with a slightly startled expression. It was actually his hair, rooted to his scalp. He'd actually styled his hair and dyed it this way.

"Fuck off, I can't believe it." A disbelieving scoff left him as he shook his head. "Alright, whatever, forget about that. Now..." Ignoring the whimpering sounds coming out of Miles Sorun gently wrapped his clawed fingers around his throat. "Just tell me what I need to know and this doesn't have to get any worse."

"I-I'll, I'll tell you anything, anything you want, just, just stop, it hurts please stop I'll tell you anything-!"

"Sh-sh-sh-sh, hey, none of that. C'mon." The black claws gently scraped along the surface of his throat. Some kind of noise, an alarmed, frightened-sounding thing, left Miles as he made a jerky nod. "Okay, see? Need answers, not whining. So... I already figured out I'm in your world. Moebius. This place, what, it's your base of operations?"

Another jerky nod from Miles. "It's our, ye-yes, it's, it's where we live and conduct our business. The-the castle, it's-"

"Castle, got it, moving on." Miles' mouth had shut so fast when Sorun spoke again he heard his teeth clack together. "How'd you get to Mobius? I've got experience with zone travel, and it ain't easy, I'll tell you that for free. And I figure the why of it is Scourge trying to feed whatever mania is driving him, but I need a how here, Miles."

"The devices, we'd... it hurts, please..." Sorun squeezed on his throat slightly. "A-a pair of devices, the Globe Posts, we stole and repurposed them to cross the dimensional barriers! It's how we infiltrated their HQ!" The hand grabbing his throat fell away some, though still hovered near. Miles seemed to take Sorun's silence as a sign to continue, but then he said, "But if y-you're thinking of using them to go back then that's irrelevant!"

"Irrelevant, hrm?"

"Yes, yes I mean it!" Miles screamed out when the clawed fingers went back to his throat. "The Freedom Fighters, they used a pair of their own posts to come here! I... Alicia and I helped them get here!"

The claws around Miles' throat pressed down every so slightly, the tips making pinpricks in his neck. The yellow fur around the points was slowly turning red. "I don't believe you," Sorun said. Helped the Freedom Fighters breach their own castle? Sounded as far-fetched as it got for him.

"It's true, it's true!" Miles shouted out - about as well as he could with the hand on his neck. "You don't know what it's like being an underling to that deranged psychopath Scourge, and he has so much power we could never do anything! We took a chance! The Freedom Fighters agreed to leave us all alone as long as they get Scourge and we stay in Moebius! It was his idea to invade in the first place, not ours!"

It being Scourge's call to invade Mobius tracked with what Fiona said. None of the rest of Miles' words did, because it honestly did sound made-up to Sorun. Convenient. Even if the timing worked out, between the invasion and Sorun being captured to Miles here finding a chance to reach out to the Freedom Fighters. He didn't buy it, and besides that he just didn't trust an evil version of Tails.

"Liar."

"I'm not!" It felt like Miles wanted to shake his head, but it seemed the claws in his neck impeded him. "I only brought your attention to Scourge so we'd have collateral to get the Freedom Fighters to be more amenable to a deal! That's all this was, Sorun! I'm telling the truth! We were going to give you back unharmed once Scourge was defeated!"

"Fiona never mentioned this."

"She wasn't part of the deal, she isn't one of us- OW, PLEASE!" he squealed out when the claws deepened.

"You're missing that all-important vital ingredient called proof, Miles," Sorun whispered, hissing directly into his ear. "That or trust. And if you think I'm gonna trust a literal evil genius then you're acting your age for being so naïve."

"It's... it's the truth, Sorun, I-I swear it is." By now Miles' voice was little more than quiet whines. Tears were streaming down the side of his face, staining his fur. "Ple- I wouldn't lie, not on this, there's no reason, please..."

"Liar, liar."

The room shook. By that, Sorun realized it was the entire castle that shook. There was sound, too, muffled thuds from what sounded like above him, a few floors up, maybe. A few more thuds after, though no castle shaking this time. Rapid in succession, a familiar cadence that Sorun recognized... the sound of somebody rolled into a ball and smashing their body into something rapidly. Even from all the way down here he recognized that sound, even the extremely faint vibrations that reached all the way down here.

Either Sonic was here or Scourge was fighting something. Both situations, possibly. Worst case was even if it wasn't the Freedom Fighters there was someone attacking, and maybe Sorun could slip out in the confusion. It was an opportunity he couldn't afford to miss.

But that meant he had to leave now. And regardless to the veracity of his claims, he was done with Miles.

"Okay." The pressure behind his claws slowly began to increase as Sorun pressed his fingers down on Miles' neck. "Bye."

"W-wait! Wait wait wait, no!" The fox was grabbed at Sorun's wrist now, trying to pull him away, but it wasn't any use. The whining sounds he'd been making became weak and feverish, his eyes screwed shut from the pain. The tears were still flowing out of him. "Don't, don't please I'm begging you, don't kill me please I told you everything don't..."

Sorun ignored him. The pressure increased more and the claws dug slightly deeper into his neck, ever closer to the major veins and arteries. Miles was making full-on crying noises now, weakly beating at the arm while continuing to blubber incoherent pleas. They were continually ignored.

"Hey, maybe dial it the fuck back and chill out?"

Sorun looked away from Miles. He saw himself, crouching a bit away. Blue eyes and normal hand, all black hair. He looked about as mad as Sorun himself felt.

"Why? After everything he did?" Sorun thought back to Sorun, clawed hand refusing to leave Miles' throat. "You can't seriously think I'm gonna let everything he's done slide."

"You really think Nicole'll ever look at us the same way if she finds out you killed a kid? Or anyone else for that matter?"

"..." His mirror image had a really solid point. He didn't want to admit it but he did. And more than that Sorun doubted he would even get any satisfaction out of it, because what he was currently doing sure wasn't giving him any.

"Just incapacitate him, man. It ain't worth it."

It certainly wasn't. He didn't want consequences like this following him back to his day life. So, with that in mind, Sorun made a small smile at the back of Miles' head. "Just kidding...~" he said in a playful voice, releasing Miles' neck and causing him to sniffle out a small sigh of relief. Which was immediately followed by Sorun grabbing the back of his head and slamming his face down so hard into the ground the stone flooring cracked.

The other Sorun stared. He stared down at Miles' now-prone form, and then stared at Sorun, expression blank and stony. When he spoke, he sounded more annoyed than anything. "Okay, when I said incapacitate him, I didn't mean give him a concussion."

"I didn't give him a concussion," Sorun argued at himself, sounding offended. "Look, see," he continued, reaching down to peel one of Miles' eyelids open, "Mobians are freakishly tough, there's no way that- ooh."

Ah. No, yep. He could already see the fox's eye was dilated and unfocused. He made a low, pained moaning sound, twitching on the ground but otherwise not reacting all that much to Sorun holding his eye open. He was very likely concussed.

"'Ooh, I didn't give him a concussion', what did you actually think would happen?" Sorun said to himself as he released the eyelid and stood up. "Look, it's fine, kids have a crazy high amount of neuroplasticity, they walk off concussions all the time. Plus he has brains to spare anyway. You're being serious right now? What do you want me to do, un-concuss him? Agh, fine, just... let's just go, I wanna leave this place."

Of course he was sick of this place. Who wouldn't? Even another second in this dungeon would be too long, so he turned to leave. One step out Sorun paused, looking behind him and sending, while not a look of concern, at least one that was the slightest bit thoughtful when he looked down at Miles. "Um... try not to fall asleep. Might not wake up, Miles," he said, though with how he was squirming on the ground and muttering quietly like that he wasn't even sure he heard him.

Sorun decided that the warning was sufficient and finally did leave the room... only to find himself standing right across from not-Antoine's unconscious body. The earlier anger flared up in Sorun again, and he found his eyes being drawn to not-Antoine's right hand, currently laying on the ground.

"I don't know if you're like this because of the circumstances you grew up in or if this world really is so fucked that people here are just born evil. Don't really care." He crouched down and grabbed the hand's wrist with his left hand while grabbing not-Antoine's index finger with the right clawed hand. "You killed my friend's dad so you never get to hold a sword with this hand again."

With a sharp jerk the finger was torn off. There was a wet pop! sound, followed by the sound of some blood splashing on the stone floor. Apparently not-Antoine was so out of it he didn't even react, though Sorun didn't care regardless as he let the wrist he was holding slip out of his grip so the hand flopped back down on the ground. Then he looked down at what he was holding.

It was a furry finger resting in the palm of his hand. Wasn't much to say about it. There was still a bit of blood dribbling out of the end and dripping off the side of Sorun's hand. His first reaction was to just throw it away in disgust, but then... but then he noticed the few hairs on his head that had turned white, though by now they were rapidly darkening to the point they'd go back to black in a second or two. And then he looked back down at the finger with a contemplative look.

"... I really shouldn't, but..." Blood was power, apparently. Mobian blood, at least. They were probably so chock-full of Chaos energy he could actually get something out of them. And if just a few drops got him this much, let him manhandle Mobians like they were nothing... "I mean on the one hand it's super fucked up to eat something that used to be part of a person. On the other hand I really don't care about that guy. Plus... well, it's not technically cannibalism since I'm not a Mobian..."

Looking a bit squeamish, Sorun glanced back at not-Antoine. And then he looked back at the finger.

"I might need it is the thing," he rationalized to himself. "Ah, but... if the others see me carrying around a severed finger they'd freak out. This is super gross though... but if I have to fight someone again..."

With a disgusted grimace on his face, Sorun tossed the finger away. "I'm not fucking eating people," he mumbled to himself, shaking his head. He would cross a lot of lines for a lot of things. Had crossed some lines. This particular one was... one that didn't set well with him. The mental image of somebody eating a piece of him , or even worse one of his friends, nearly sent him recoiling and suddenly Sorun was glad for having tossed the finger away. Wasn't worth the risk of his friends finding out and thinking differently of him anyways.

"You're absolutely sure?" Sorun mumbled to himself, staring after the finger while resting a hand on his head. "Yeah, yeah, we'll... we'll figure something out if anything goes wrong. Alright. Alright, yeah. Let's go. Yeah."

The castle was a big place. That one fact was very evident as Sorun found himself wandering the place, searching for the source of the fighting he'd heard earlier. He'd found some steps that carried him up and kept traversing floors until he'd found windows indicating he was on the ground floor, and from there he'd kept going. Once he'd gotten to that main floor the evidence of distant fighting became much more apparent. Far-off, barely-perceptible rumbles and the occasional shouting. The words themselves were indistinct due to distance, but to Sorun's ears the voices were familiar.

"Alright, so... so maybe Miles was telling more truth that I thought 'cause, 'cause it sounds like the others are... they're somewhere there..." Somewhere ahead, past this dark corridor of stone that looked like all the rest in this damn castle. All the Freedom Fighters' voices, somewhere ahead. He was pretty sure he even made out Silver's voice somewhere in that mess. It was uplifting to Sorun, hearing all that, knowing they'd come for him.

But the appreciation was falling short because, at the moment, Sorun was barely moving on his feet. The green glow had long ceased, returning his eyes and hand to normal. With it had gone that unnatural strength from before, that vigor, the dulling of that nausea from earlier. It was back in full force now; worse, actually. A constant throb of weakness and sickness that continued to assault his senses. It wasn't enough to debilitate him but it was hard not focusing on it all the same and was doing its best to slow him down.

His nose hadn't stopped bleeding, either, so that probably wasn't a good sign.

"I-I just, I... I gotta... it's just a bit further..." He stumbled forwards a few more steps, lightly panting while staring ahead at the source of the noises. Past this hallway, around a few more bends. They were all there. "You, you don't have to fight, okay? It's fine, they're here. Just go a bit further and-"

Nope, it wasn't happening. He'd gasped out loudly and collapsed on the nearest wall, breathing out loudly in exhaustion as he stared forwards. An awful sensation hit him, forcing Sorun to cover his mouth as he coughed out violently enough to make his vision swim and ears ring. After the attack ended he took out a shaky breath and settled back against the wall, looking down at his hand. It was drenched in more blood than it had been before. "Goddamn it..."

The hand flopped uselessly to his side as Sorun's head rolled back in the direction of the hallway. There were still sounds of fighting down there. Fighting Scourge, probably, if he was in this castle. Which was likely seeing as this was his home. And in his state Sorun would be less than useless in that kind of fight. "Ah, screw it, I'm sitting the fight out. They can sort it all out and get me later," he decided.

That was fine. It worked out. They always pulled wins out, and if Silver was there helping it was basically a guaranteed victory. It was what the hopeful part of Sorun's mind was reassuring him. So as far as he was concerned he was good as rescued. They'd beat him and then come to save him. Come to save him and see him in this week and bloodied state despite not having actually been hurt.

He made a lamentable sigh as he stared down at his bloodied hand. "They're gonna be so pissed I hid this from them... oh man. Nicole will probably go ballistic. Might even kick me off onto the couch. Can she even do that, it's my bed."

Bzzt

An exhausted sigh left him. "What is it now?" He internally groaned out as he looked to the side, down to where he heard that buzzing sound. On the floor, there. There were a few green electrical sparks crackling along the ground. Sorun found it considerably strange considering it was a stone ground and he doubted there was electrical wiring there.

Actually, that one specific spot on the floor was starting to glow green, and the amount of electrical sparks was starting to increase, much to Sorun's tired chagrin. And a spot in the middle of the phenomenon that had something really concerning to Sorun, and almost familiar. A small section of the stone, a pinprick of space, where, instead of stone, it was a green, bottomless, ever-flowing surface. A portal. It looked like an incredibly small portal that was forming on the floor right next to him.

And then, just as Sorun had noticed it, the pinprick near-instantaneously expanded into a large circular portal that was about the size of a portal he would make. He hadn't expected that. Nor the two bodies that tumbled out of it so hard they crashed against the ceiling.

"What even...?" Momentarily stunned from this new and wholly unexpected development, Sorun found his eyes trained up towards the ceiling, almost against his will he'd been so drawn to it. The crash from earlier had kicked up a fair amount of dust from the impact point, but enough of it had cleared that Sorun was able to recognize one of the figures up there. It was pretty much just Sonic but without a mouth and made of metal. He'd seen it once before. "What the- I don't- wh- how-?"

As Sorun's mind feverishly raced to try and understand what was happening in front of him, and doing a fairly poor job of doing it, the robot tossed down the second person that'd flown through the portal with it, said person slamming their back onto the ground right in front of Sorun. He also recognized this person at a single glance of the black fur and red stripes.

Red eyes opened up on Shadow's face and glared up at the robot floating up near the ceiling, a snarl permeating his face. And then he looked slightly to the left and saw Sorun staring down at him with a wide-eyed, confused expression. The snarl disappeared entirely, replaced by a shocked, equally confused look he was now sharing with Sorun as they stared at each other. Seconds of time passed, Sorun standing there and Shadow lying there, both completely motionless and both desperately trying to process the sight their eyes beheld.

Of course they were so distracted by the sight of the other that neither of them noticed it when Metal Sonic smashed into the wall right besides Sorun. The human himself hadn't been harmed, though he'd still been surprised enough that he'd reflexively jumped away from the wall, hitting the ground in front of him and rolling a bit. He managed to stop and prop himself up on his knees just before he'd accidentally rolled into the still-opened green portal, making Sorun breath a sigh of relief when he saw the open green hole just inches away from him.

He then fell in when Shadow's body was thrown against him, causing the both of them to tumble through the portal.

Lots of colors as Sorun fell through the portal. Mostly green at first, and a bunch of formless shapes that were all indiscernible because he was falling head over heels and couldn't get his bearing on a single thing. Then a lot of blue. Still incomprehensible from the falling, as well as thoughts such as, "What is- wait- what is this-!" and "Oh god oh god oh god what the hell what the hell what the hell" going through his mind. There simply wasn't room to think beyond recognizing he was falling, and everything was green, and now everything was blue.

His body finally hit something - he was no longer falling. There'd been a brief moment of panic before Sorun realized it'd been a soft landing. Familiar sensations hit him: the lack of being able to breath for one, the sensation of a cool substance covering his body another. The slight sting in his eyes, the taste of salt in his mouth, the heavy sensation he felt when trying to move his limbs. Opening his eyes revealed a blurred, blue sight. Upwards was brightness. Downwards was as infinite black he immediately looked away from.

Underwater. He'd fallen through the portal into landed in water. The ocean, it tasted like.

A muffled sound managed to reach Sorun through the water, and at the same time he saw the surface of the water be disturbed as something fell through it. Even with his vision blurred he could immediately tell it was Shadow's body. Motionless and unmoving. Some worry flared through Sorun, though he managed to push it to the side as he stared back up at the surface.

The robot was there, image wavy and blurred from the ocean water, but Sorun could make him out. Floating above the surface of the water via the jet engine that comprised its torso. It quickly jittered - its left arm spasmed as a small explosion blasted out its shoulder, and even from below the water Sorun saw a fair amount of sparks fly out from the explosion. He could also make out the robot's piercing, red gaze, seemingly staring at Sorun from its own position. Whether it actually did manage to see Sorun or not, he couldn't tell. When its shoulder sparked again Metal looked towards it, and then seemed to come to some conclusion as it turned around and flew off... somewhere. It moved so fast Sorun wasn't even sure what direction it'd moved in. Didn't matter. It was gone.

Usually the sight of the killer super robot leaving should have been an anxiety-relieving sight to Sorun. It wasn't in this case, oddly enough, as the most immediate problem of the ocean and trying to figure out what the hell just happened was still there for him. And his lungs were starting to burn besides the fact, though before Sorun endeavored to swim up to the surface he noticed Shadow's body drift past him, falling downwards. He still wasn't moving.

A green light illuminated the water around Sorun's face as he dived down with surprising ease to grab at the hedgehog's wrist. In this endeavor he succeeded, after which he swam up to the surface. No sooner had he breached the surface of the water than he was, once more, heaving large gasps of air to rapidly relieve the burning sensation of suffocating. He tried pulling Shadow up, holding his head above the water in the hopes he'd gained some lucidity, but it seemed he was completely out cold because his head kept lolling to the side and he wouldn't open his eyes. Worse than that was Sorun found himself momentarily sinking back below the water before forcing himself to swim back up, making him continuously gasp out and breath heavily as he looked around.

There was nothing. In broad daylight with barely any clouds in the sky Sorun didn't see anything from his position but endless, blue ocean. The only plus side was that the surface was calm and there were barely any waves, but that barely helped with- "Wait, there!"

He'd seen it when he swiveled around in the water. A small island yonder way. He wasn't able to see any details beyond that - it was land, and as soon as the concept of island land registered with Sorun he immediately began swimming towards it. About as well as he could while dragging Shadow in tow.

It was swift progress, at least, swimming to the island. Much more swift than Sorun reasoned he could move, though at this point it didn't surprise him. The aching exhaustion that was rapidly beginning to assault him was equally unsurprising, but he pressed on regardless. The weight he was carrying along with him was a good reminder of why he needed to get to that land. The water continually splashing him in the face and threatening to drown him was an equally well reminder. So he ignored the aches his entire body felt as he pushed on towards the island. He took a bit of solace in that the blood had been washed off and it felt like his nose had at least stopped bleeding.

Eventually, after however many of those torturous minutes he spent swimming, he made it. Washing up on the shore of the island, gasping and panting while on all fours, slowly crawling forwards while dragging Shadow besides him. The green glow was starting to fade from his eyes, and along with it the added strength, though once he'd managed to reach a dry patch of sand that the tide didn't reach he'd uttered one last, pained, exhausted shout as he threw Shadow on the sand in front of him. He'd managed to throw him a grand total of two inches away.

Good enough, Sorun had thought to himself as he rolled over on his back to face up at the sky. Once another wave of ringing ears and blurred vision came and went the only sounds left that reached his ears were the waves slowly rolling over the nearby shore and his own labored breathing, and while he was struggling to get it under control, with minimal success, it wasn't fixing the exhaustion wracking his body. Or his desire to throw up. Or the aches in his muscles.

Goddamn, but was he tired.

"Hey. Hey, me." Sorun rolled his head a bit. He saw himself standing over in his peripheral vision. "Come over here and look at Shadow. You have our actual, physical eyes and I can't see him."

Sorun's response to himself was to groan outwards. He didn't want to, but the desire to just lay there and fall asleep was override by his worry for Shadow. So with great difficult he ignored his body's protests and tried to stand up. This failed, resulting in Sorun falling onto his knees, making him growl in frustration before resigning to just shuffle over to Shadow's side while digging a twin pair of trenches in the sand with his knees.

He arrived at the body after a few short moments, noting, rather enviously, that the hedgehog was flat on his back and sleeping. He glanced towards his face - there was a moment where Sorun's vision flashed, and suddenly Sorun's breathing seized when Shadow's face became enraged and a crown that hadn't been there previously was suddenly there. He rapidly blinked his eyes and shook his head. When he opened his eyes they were back on the beach and Shadow was still laying there, still and asleep. There was no crown.

Actually, he was very still. Much too still, much to Sorun's growing worry. His mouth wasn't moving at all. Worse, he realized when he looked down at his chest, was that it wasn't rising or falling.

"I think this might be one of those medical emergencies mom warned us about," the other Sorun noted, crouching down on the other side of Shadow's body. He looked up at Sorun. "Man, sucks that we forgot all those CPR lessons she gave us, huh?"

"God, I didn't think I'd ever need it!" Sorun shouted out in horror, going as far as to grab at his hair in panic. "What do I do!?"

"W-well, fuck, man, is he even still alive!?"

Immediately Sorun's hands when to Shadow's nearest arm. He ran his fingers along his wrist, grumbling in frustration when the golden bangle got in his way. He froze when he felt it. A pulse. "Yeah," Sorun gasped out as he let the arm drop back in the sand, "he's still alive."

"He's not breathing, though," Sorun noted when he looked back down at Shadow's chest. He poked at the white tuft of fur on his chest. Still no movement.

"Yeah-yeah-yeah, yeah he's, uh, he's drowned, I think. Yeah."

Sorun's head bobbed up and down in understanding. "That makes sense, yeah. I think we need to give him mouth-to-mouth if he has a pulse but isn't breathing."

"... I don't want to do that."

At hearing that, Sorun's head snapped up to Sorun, who gave Sorun an unbelieving look when Sorun saw Sorun giving Shadow a hesitant look. "What, why!?" he shouted.

"Nicole might get upset."

Sorun sputtered. "It's a medical emergency! I think she'll understand!" he screamed out, gesticulating wildly with his arms.

"No no no, wait, hold on." Sorun held an arm up to calm Sorun. A contemplative look crossed his features. "What if... what if I just punch the water out of him?"

" What ?"

"Yeah, just, you know..." Sorun mimicked a punch for Sorun to see. "Just punch him hard enough that the pressure forces the water out of his lungs."

The look Sorun gave himself was one of profound disbelief and disappointment. "You can't do that, man."

"You don't know you can't punch water out of a drowned person."

"You're right, we don't know! We used to know but then you decided memorizing 'Warhammer 40K' lore was more important than retaining mom's CPR lessons!"

Ignoring Sorun, Sorun committed to his plan, wholly confident that it would work and prove himself wrong. A fist formed as he rose it directly above Shadow's chest.

"He's gonna fucking die because of us."

"Shut up, he's got alien bullshit, watch, it's gonna work."

It didn't work. His fist weakly slapped against the wet hedgehog's chest, after which he doubled over from the weakness permeating his body. Sorun stared on at the display, expression unchanging.

"Told you. You can't punch drown water out of people."

Sorun picked his head up, teeth bared and snarling in defiance as green light flared in his eyes. "Fucking... watch me!" he shouted out, raising his fist up once again before hammering it down on Shadow's chest.

The difference was immediately noticeable. The strength behind that one, solid strike was so intense that Shadow's chest had caved in, and his limbs had sprung out. The sand around them also jumped up from the sudden force that was carried into the ground, momentarily forming a crater around Sorun and Shadow before the sand fell back down to fill it. It seemed to do the trick, though, as immediately after Shadow's eyes shot wide open, after which he sat up and vomited out lungfulls of water out on the sand.

After voiding all of the stray water from his airways, he began breathing heavily to regain the oxygen he lost. His eyes drifted to the side, widening in surprise when he saw Sorun on his knees right besides him, watching him with wide blue eyes. Sorun then proceeded to raise both arms in victory, face unchanging from looking exhausted and half-dead, before promptly falling over on his back to lay besides Shadow.

No words were passed between the two. For entire minutes they remained where they were, Shadow sitting besides a sprawled out Sorun, both breathing heavily from exhaustion. Weakness present in both of their faces, more noticeably in Sorun's. In Sorun's case a good chunk of that exhaustion was cooling down from all the worry and panic from the whole drowning thing in addition to the fact his body felt like he'd just ran a thousand marathons at once. Shadow's breathing eventually slowed down to a somewhat normal pace, though he remained silent while patiently staring down at Sorun, seemingly waiting for his own breathing to normalize. It did, after about maybe five minutes. It was only after that that Sorun decided to speak first.

"You... you good?" Sorun mumbled out, head turning away from Shadow to look up at the sky. He winced at the sun shining at his face.

"... Fine. Thank you," came his reply. He sounded faraway, as if not believing the fact Sorun was there besides him. He couldn't imagine why; he was right there, after all. "How... how are you here?" he asked, almost in a hesitant manner.

"No, no no, that's not the question that needs to be asked." Sorun tried raising his arms up, but failed halfway and let them flop back to his sides. "What needs be asked is WHAT just happened!" he attempted to shout out. It came out more winded than he intended.

Shadow made a bitter sort of frown. "I got distracted seeing you and got blindsided as a result. It was a stupid mistake I won't be repeating-"

"Not that!"

The hedgehog stilled. "I don't understand-"

"You, the-the robot, portals, beach, ex-explai-!" Sorun cut himself off with a series of exhausted coughs, while Shadow silently watched. Once the coughing finished, Sorun continued in a weak voice, "I-I can't, just, just talk, please."

At first, nothing. When Sorun wondered why and tilted his head a bit, he saw Shadow still looking down at him. Glancing at his entire body up and down, some undiscernible expression on his face. He blinked, somehow looking equally as satisfied as he was unsatisfied, before a deep sigh left him and he looked forwards at the ocean.

"Dr. Eggman has been experimenting with technology that can be used to breach dimensional boundaries. For whatever reason he built the prototype into Metal Sonic. I'd only discovered all this after G.U.N. sent me to investigate the strange energy readings that device was outputting," he explained. "That machine wouldn't stop activating the device. I lost count of how many zones we fought in until we ended up here. What happened with Metal, by the way?"

"Dunno. You damaged it or something, I guess," Sorun said. "It didn't portal out or anything, it just flew off somewhere."

"Hm." With that short sound of affirmation, Shadow glanced down at Sorun. He didn't make a remark on it until a long amount of time passed, at which point Sorun realized he was still being stared at by him. He grew uncomfortable enough that he made the complaint vocal.

"There something the matter?"

"... You were gone." Sorun blinked in confusion at the remark. "And now you're not. What happened?"

"Ugh, man, it was this whole thing," Sorun replied in an exhausted voice, head rolling back forwards to look at the sky. "Went to an alternate future, then went to the real future, then took a multidimensional road trip, it was real fun, you would have loved it." A beat passed, after which Sorun rolled his head back to Shadow. "I'm joking when I say that it was fun; it was a genuinely awful experience."

"When did you return?"

"Like... a month and some change ago. My life was actually going real great until this happened."

A moment of silence passed before Shadow spoke again. "Nobody told me."

"I mean, I don't exactly advertise my life to other people. Kinda just keep to myself, y'know?" By now enough of Sorun's energy had returned that, with some difficulty, he managed to sit upwards so the two of them could sit side by side.

"Not that." Shadow shook his head. "Nobody told me what happened. Why you never left for home. I was under the assumption you had left until I saw you fighting Enerjak. Before I saw you disintegrating at the bottom of a cave and they had to seal you inside of that giant Emerald. And then you'd disappeared before all our eyes while inside it. I'd assumed you were gone forever until I saw you in that hallway. It's why I was so surprised."

That was fair enough, Sorun supposed. Suddenly it made complete sense to him why Shadow looked so bewildered seeing Sorun just sitting there next to him. Though he didn't see why he was bringing it up. "And...?"

"I'm just..." He made a short sigh, seemingly appearing unsure of what to say. "I would have appreciated it if somebody had kept me appraised of what was happening. I feel kept out of the loop."

"Well you're never really in a position to be in the loop to begin with." When Shadow sent him a sharp glare he elaborated with, "I'm just saying. You never visit the town."

"I have absolutely no desire to visit unless it's mission-imperative." When he saw Sorun giving him a flat look, all Shadow did was stare back towards the ocean. "I see your point."

"'I see your point,' sh'yeah," Sorun mumbled out, staring out towards the ocean with him.

Once more silence settled between the two, with the quietness only disturbed by the sound of the waves slowly and repeatedly rolling over the shore. There wasn't even the sound of gulls in the air aside, nor even the whistling sound of wind rushing past them. For a deserted island beach in the middle of nowhere it was decidedly peaceful, at least until Shadow spoke again.

"What were you doing there?" he asked. "In that place? It didn't look like anywhere on Mobius I've seen."

"Nah, it wasn't. That was Moebiussss... that sounds the same, doesn't it, it was the evil mirror world with an E in the name. The one Scourge is from. I got kidnapped."

Shadow's eyes flickered back in Sorun's direction. Aside from his stiffening the slightest amount he didn't show any outwards reaction to the answer. "Kidnapped?" The tone he used sounded like it demanded explanation.

"Yeah, that idiot kidnapped me because he thought it'd be funny to make the Freedom Fighters upset," Sorun elaborated. "I think all the others were in the process of rescuing me, but then by some miracle you and the robot ended up dragging me into your fight and now we're here. So thanks for that. I guess."

"Hmph." The answer seemed to satisfy Shadow, though not much as he still shot a disapproving look at the beach. "I wouldn't call this much of a rescue," he said.

"No chance this is some remote island on Mobius?" Sorun asked.

"Not likely," Shadow answered with a shake of his head. "For all intents and purposes we seem to be marooned in the middle of nowhere in an unknown zone somewhere in the multiverse. And without Metal Sonic anywhere in sight we're stranded. Indefinitely."

And that just happened to be the one thing Sorun feared the most. He couldn't even bother wondering how the fight with everyone between Scourge went, because it seemed he was lost somewhere in the multiverse. Once again. And without so much as a single Chaos Emerald to help him on his way home. And with how many times the world seemed to go out of its way to bury Sorun's head in the sand, all that accrued experience from the abuse dolled out on Sorun merely caused him to sigh loudly as he leaned back onto his elbows from where he was sitting.

"Man, I hate that this keeps happening to me..."

A/N- So in the original comic the reason Shadow was around at this juncture was because he was looking for the Special Zone since the Chaos Emeralds were there. As of chapter one of this story, though, that place doesn't exist after it completely collapsed due to Rubrum killing Feist, so some details had to be fudged to make this work. In broad strokes it doesn't change all that much.

And yeah, I know technically Shadow and Metal Sonic fall into comic Sonic X world before going to the Sol Zone, but I just didn't wanna deal with what was essentially filler that didn't have any bearing on the main story.

Chapter 96

A/N- Listen, I can explain why this one took so long.

Ragnarok came out, okay, I needed to take a bit to play it.

Recursion Error

Episode 96- The sand is made of pain

In the world's endless campaign of kicking Sorun around for no discernable reason it forced yet another torture upon him: wet socks.

It was a familiar unpleasantness, one no person, regardless of how cruel and depraved, should ever endure, and so Sorun decided he wouldn't be one to endure this particular torture. Not today. So to that end his socks and boots had been laid out on a nearby rock on the beach to dry in the sun. Along with his coat, shirt, and vest. All that remained on his person were his wet pants and underwear, which, while not as incomprehensibly uncomfortable as wearing wet socks, didn't feel all that good anyways. But the problem was Shadow was there with him and Sorun's pride wouldn't allow him to strip down to his underwear in front of him. So the pants stayed on. He'd endure the torment.

Shadow, the utter psychopath that he was, chose to keep his shoes and socks on. Sorun couldn't comprehend how as he watched the hedgehog set up a fire pit on the beach, though at the moment it was just a half-finished ring of rocks with a few sticks thrown in the middle. And as Shadow tossed in another handful of sticks Sorun couldn't help but comment on the fact that he was wearing wet socks.

"I know those shoes are still wet, Shadow, I'm telling you just put them on a rock or something. It ain't worth it," Sorun told him, standing nearby with his arms crossed.

The sticks were tossed into the growing fire pit. Shadow glanced over at Sorun, saying, "I'm not stripping naked in front of you. I'll put up with it."

"Naked, right, sure, yeah," Sorun drawled out, acutely aware of the fact that Shadow only had on the shoes and gloves and not a single other article of clothing, not unlike most Mobians. The Mobian Standard. After all this time he still didn't understand the logic behind it, even if the fur proved sufficient in covering things up. At that point claiming a pair of shoes and gloves was the line between decency and nakedness when literally nothing else was covered just seemed pedantic to him.

But it was whatever. If Shadow wanted to suffer under wet socks that was his business.

"You don't have a right to sound so disapproving when you're still wearing those damp pants," Shadow said back to him, fully turning to face Sorun.

"And you know why I refuse to take the pants off," Sorun argued. "Unlike everyone else back home."

Shadow faltered. "... What?"

"Yeah, I'm entirely convinced the average Mobian doesn't actually know what a human looks like naked," Sorun explained. "I mean I kind of get it but at the same time that's just a really awkward thing to explain, so... you know, I just don't. And I'll take looking annoyingly mysterious over having to deal with the alternative."

"... It's a fair point," Shadow decided, turning back to the fire pit. Scoffing and rolling his eyes in response, Sorun stepped closer so that he was standing right besides him.

"So is there an actual plan for how we're getting out of this mess?" Because he definitely didn't have one. Nor could Sorun even begin to formulate one, because his experiences with being stuck on deserted islands and different universes was fairly dismal to begin with. And he didn't have any magic rocks to bail him out this time around.

Shadow made a small hum, staring at the half-finished fire put, before responding. "We're going to wait until tomorrow to see if Metal Sonic turns up, or if possibly inhabitants of this world come here to investigate any disturbance we may have caused. In the event neither possibility happens..." He closed his eyes and paused for a few moments to think. "I'm fast enough to skate over the water's surface. If nothing happens by tomorrow I'll choose a direction and keep going forwards until I hit land. Assuming this world is actually populated I'll find a way to procure transport to come and rescue you off this island. We'll acquire temporary lodgings afterwards and proceed from there."

"And if there aren't people in this world?" Sorun asked.

"Then we'll rethink from there. Regardless, once we're off this island we'll need to pursue Metal Sonic, since that engine of its is our most direct route back to Mobius. It didn't use it to escape, which has me assuming I either damaged the machine sufficiently enough for it to malfunction or there was a limited amount of charge. In the event," he continued, making a short sigh, "that it gets the engine working and strands us by leaving this world, we'll have to hope this world has its own form of Chaos Emeralds. If I can get my hands on one then I can just simply teleport us back to Mobius."

A bit of surprise bloomed on Sorun's face. "You can just do that?"

"Of course I can do that," Shadow scoffed out. The tone he used made it sound like he was almost insulted Sorun thought any different.

"Oh. Huh. Here I thought I was special in that regard..."

Shadow's eyes snapped open. "Excuse me?" he said, giving Sorun a sharp glare. "You, too, are capable of this? The sword, I presume?"

"Yeah it's a bit wonky and finicky but-"

"You had the sword the entire time?"

Sorun shook his head. "No, uh... some stuff happened and I got the ability to use Chaos Emeralds without absorbing them. Doesn't hurt me that way," he explained. "It's how I kept myself afloat, actually. Got a delivery job."

"You used it to deliver packages ..." A disgruntled sigh left Shadow, followed by him raising a hand to pinch at the space above his nose. He didn't sound so much as disappointed as he sounded annoyed. "I suppose you were that energy signature jumping all over the world that had those analysts in G.U.N. being driven mad. Or more specifically the Emerald."

"..." Sorun's eyebrows knit together. "They're tracking me?"

"Tracking the Emeralds," Shadow corrected, "ever since they scattered after the... Enerjak debacle. We have three currently, but the equipment is limited in some aspects. They actually were not too sure what you were since the energy signature of that sword is... radically different from a Chaos Emerald, I was told, and they couldn't figure out why it kept switching between the unique signature of the sword and the Emerald. The only thing stopping them from sending me to investigate was that it kept relocating itself to New Mobotropolis."

"Yeah, I sleep there." The way Sorun's brows were furrowed and the slightly suspicious look he was growing didn't waver as he gave Shadow a serious look. "Should I be concerned that G.U.N. is stockpiling Chaos Emeralds?"

"No, of course not." Shadow actually seemed surprised at the question. That was a new one - Sorun wasn't even aware he could make such a face. "Sorun, they're endeavored to the defense of the world. I'd much rather the Chaos Emeralds be located in a vault than in Dr. Eggman's possession to do with as he pleases."

"I don't disagree with that sentiment..." Sorun carefully stated, "it's just... Overlanders being Overlanders, you know there was the whole race war thing I just can't help but think-"

"That was a different time, back when there wasn't a unilateral threat the entire world needs to be united against. It's different now," Shadow said. "There's nothing as egregious as anti-Mobian sentiments within G.U.N. They would never have hired Rouge and I as agents otherwise."

"Okay, sure, but I can't help but notice that my Mobian employer has a real hard time garnering any business over in Overlander territory. She complains about it all the time," Sorun informed him.

Shadow scowled. "As someone who would know infinitely more than you by virtue of actually living in the environment in question, I am telling you, Sorun. G.U.N.'s interests lie with the wellbeing of the whole world, for Overlanders and Mobians. Where is all this coming from?"

"I'm from Earth, that's where it's coming from." A life of living on Earth and getting a general outline of human history taught enough to Sorun that absolutely no government would ever, ever put others' interests before their own. True for any nation that had ever existed on Earth. He didn't see it being any different here, especially from the mutant humans that started a race war with the Mobians before a mad scientist brought the whole world to heel. Even the idealistic part of him was staying silent in the face of that, and that voice always tried to have a say.

The scowl that had been on Shadow's face lessened somewhat, but only just. "I'm not going to pretend to know what the governments of your world got up to, Sorun, but whatever you're insinuating is nothing but paranoia with no foundation whatsoever. Every Emerald in our possession is potentially one less in the hands of that madman."

"... So you monitor Northamer too, huh?"

Shadow blinked. "What?"

"It's not just Overlander territory G.U.N.'s using its equipment to monitor for Chaos Emeralds? It's Northamer, too?" Sorun repeated. "You just said you were tracking me living there."

"It's a satellite network with global coverage, Sorun. They monitor any places of interest and it just so happens that one of the world's largest collective governments live there along with a number of persons of interest. Namely Eggman, who you know is based in Northamer," Shadow replied. "They have the same procedures for the continent Station Square rests on, for the lands bridging the western and eastern continents together, for every notable population center. There's even been collaboration between G.U.N. and the Republic of Acorn in the efforts of thwarting Eggman; G.U.N. has been very open with their capabilities in that regard."

Information he would probably know if he were actually still a Freedom Fighter. That did serve to lessen Sorun's paranoia over the matter a great deal. Not completely, but it did get him to ease his stature. "Answer me one question, then. If the Republic ever obtained an Emerald would G.U.N. ask them to surrender it?"

He didn't miss that Shadow was looking at Sorun like he'd just said something moronic. "No. Of course not. For the same reason they didn't ask for it in the past when the Republic possessed the gray Emerald before the Special Zone was destroyed and all the Chaos Emeralds scattered. For the same reason they didn't ask for it when you were there with it. It's an overtly hostile action that would dissolve peace between the two nations, and G.U.N. knows better than to assume it can claim ownership on all Chaos Emeralds. If anything it would be advantageous for multiple nations to possess the Emeralds if only to ensure they're not all grouped together. Even in that event G.U.N. keeps each Emerald sequestered at separate sites."

"... Yeah, alright." It was a hefty amount of solid points. Enough, in fact, that it made Sorun turn away from Shadow while rubbing at the back of his neck, almost sheepishly. "When you lay it all out like that, then... I'll take your word for it." Something that, even after all that, Sorun felt iffy on, but at the end of the day Shadow seemed to trust the Overlander government, and he was the straightest shooter Sorun knew in this whole world. And it did sound like things were relatively well since the governments were cooperating. He'd take a chance and believe Shadow words that G.U.N. was looking after the whole world.

All the same Sorun chose not to tell Shadow about that eighth Chaos Emerald he brought back from the future.

"Welp, this has been enlightening, Shadow, but I need to go get us some food," Sorun suddenly said, reaching up to interlock his fingers behind his head. "So I'ma go do that. Fortunately," he continued, glancing around, "it doesn't seem like there's any coconut trees on this island. Just normal trees."

"I hardly see how having less food sources is ideal."

"You're not missing much, trust me," Sorun said. "Worse comes to worse, though, we could probably just fish for... hey, what's stopping you from just tossing a Chaos Spear into the ocean? Just blow up a bunch of fish for us to collect that way?"

By now Shadow had knelt back down to continue setting up the fire pit. "You seemed like you needed something to do," he dryly stated, not even bothering to speak over his shoulder as he continued setting rocks and sticks down. Sorun's eyes narrowed at his back, and he resisted the urge to stick his tongue out at him before turning around to venture further into this island.

So the island wasn't that big, Sorun had found out after some wandering. Not so big in that he could walk from one end to the other in about three minutes. No indigenousness life either, he had noted, except for the trees and grass in the middle. But even those were sparse. Not even so much as a bird in the sky.

That probably wasn't a good sign, but then again Sorun wasn't an ornithologist so maybe it was normal. Migration patterns or whatever. Or maybe there weren't even birds in this zone, he didn't know. For all he knew this world was just 'Waterworld' and he and Shadow just happened to find the one patch of land on the whole planet. These were fears that were quickly dismissed because they seemed too far-fetched.

"Geez, can't believe I'm in this mess," Sorun mentally sighed out as he leaned against a tree. As far as he could tell there wasn't anything edible on the island, so they probably were going to have to resort to Shadow throwing explosive bolts in the ocean until some food floated up. Which wasn't a prospect Sorun was looking that forwards to, eating a fish cooked on a stick, but desperation was desperation. At the very least the hunger was helping keep his mind off everything else that was wrong with this situation.

In response to that thought, his stomach growled. He knew he should have snagged a slice of pizza off that pizza he'd been delivering before going to the HQ.

Sighing, Sorun slid down the tree to sit against it. It wasn't a hunger on the level of starving, but he could see it getting there relatively soon. It hadn't even been twenty-four hours since he ate anything, he did have a small bite to eat before leaving that hotel, but even then-

"Waaaaait a minute..." Sorun's head suddenly perked up when his left hand just happened to brush over something. Something with a shape his fingers vaguely recognized. He looked down to his left, eyes nearly shining when he saw what he suspected he had felt.

Mushrooms. A patch of them growing at the base of the tree he was sitting against. "Oh, sweet, mushrooms are a kind of food," Sorun thought to himself as he grabbed a few of them, yanking them out of the ground and bringing them up for a closer look.

As far as mushrooms went, they were about what one would expect. Same mushroom shape and everything. Coloring was a bit weird, the caps of the mushrooms were white while the stems were blue, but Sorun chalked that up to it being a species from a different zone.

"I think Antoine actually cooked with mushrooms that one time, didn't he? Those were halfway decent." With that in mind, and without a second thought, Sorun popped the mushrooms into his mouth. "... Yeah, no, these ain't those. They're pretty awful."

It was a raw, earthy kind of taste that had Sorun wrinkling his face with a hint of something at the end of that taste he just couldn't identify. And the texture, it nearly had him reeling. Not out of revulsion, but from how irregular it was. The texture between eating a carrot and eating a steak. The never before seen in-between texture.

He swallowed it anyways, but quickly came to the conclusion he just wasn't strong enough to handle any more mushrooms. "I guess my basic-ass palate just ain't up to snuff. Man," he thought, looking down at the remaining mushrooms, "maybe Shadow'll eat 'em, though. Huh, that's weird."

The mushrooms were swaying in the wind. Which was strange, as there was no wind. But the mushrooms swayed anyways, moving to and fro in a rhythmic pattern. It was almost like they were bobbing themselves to some unhearable song set to the beat in the back of reality, far enough in the recesses of the world that nobody could hear the melody. The mushrooms could, though, as was their nature. Sorun bobbed his head to the song he couldn't possibly hear. The reverberations thrummed through his soul.

One of the mushroom caps opened into a mouth.

"Soooorrrunn..." the mushroom spoke out. Sorun's head-bobbing ceased. "Where ya goin', Sorun?"

"Going? I don't know, mushroom man," Sorun answered. "Going nowhere, I guess. Nowhere to go. The island's, like... like the circumference, y'know? It's real small. Real small." He pinched his thumb and finger together for the mushroom to see. "Like I don't even remember what a circumference is but I'm pretty sure it has something to do with circles and a circle's basically a rectangle with infinite angles."

"Goin' straight to the grave, that's where you're goin', Sorun," the mushroom said.

"Haw? Nah, man, come on that ain't true."

The mushroom extended, stem lengthening so that the mouth could become closer to Sorun's face. "Come on, Sorun, you're seein' the same signs I am, pretty fuckin' obvious somethin' ain't kosher here. Humans ain't s'posed to be able to toss people through doors wit' one hand. Humans ain't s'posed to be growin' claws an' bleed so much for no reason. Oh, but hey, we seen some o' those signs 'fore, 'aven't we, Sorun?"

The song breached reality. It was there, just barely within the range of his hearing. Overbearing beats and slow, violent drums that didn't sound natural in any way possible. The mushrooms kept swaying to the beat of that noise, growing more and more violent in rhythm as the talking mushroom grew longer and longer to meet Sorun's face. It was so unnerving that Sorun just couldn't look away.

"You're talkin' crazy, man, people get nosebleeds all the time. It's dry season or somethin'."

Still swaying to the loudening beat, like the mushroom was disagreeing with Sorun, it said, "Dry season ain't it at all an' ya know it, been ignorin' the signs for weeks now 'thout sayin' a thing. Know wha' 'appen the las' time this happen, Sorun, and you're windin' right down the same road as las' time."

It was overbearing, the beat. Becoming louder, the tempo increasing at the same rate as the mushrooms were swaying. The mouth was widening, teeth growing and sharpening to points as the talking mushroom settled right in front of Sorun's face.

"There ain't no extra life this time 'round, Sorun, an' ya know that. Already on ya third life and you already fuckin' it up. Know what 'appens in games when ya run outta extra lives, don'tcha, Sorun?"

"So many words, man. You gotta stop worrying about stuff you can't save," Sorun said. And then he leaned forwards and bit the cap of the mushroom off the stem. The song blaring in his ears cut off instantly, just like that. Though the mushrooms were still swaying.

The mushroom was still trying to talk, even still inside of Sorun's mouth. His teeth crunched down on it, causing it to burst inside his mouth. Crimson fluid dripped between his teeth and past his lips, the cerulean fluid leaking out of his mouth and splashing down on the swaying mushrooms below to dye them yellow. The sun above shone off the new glossy, liquidy layer, making the mushrooms shine green as the purple fluid ran down them and soaked into the ground.

After swallowing the talking mushroom, Sorun asked the rest, "Hey, could you guys put that song from earlier on? It was kinda a banger."

The mushrooms swayed to the unheard beat. The mushrooms said nothing, for they were naught but mushrooms.

"Yeah, I guess mushrooms can't talk, huh?" His time here was done, Sorun had felt, so he'd risen back to his feet. The tree he'd been sitting against nodded at him as he did so, surely as a positive sign of reinforcement that Sorun had been making all the right choices. He was sure of it. There could be no other way.

He turned around.

Oh, sweet, his house was here. Just sitting there amidst the other island trees and grass. He walked up to it, thanking the door when it opened up for him before he made his way inside the home.

"Huh?" He looked around. This wasn't his house. But it was his house? He didn't know. This was certainly all the furniture his mom had picked out and placed haphazardly. Oh, there, on the rug - there was the ketchup stain on the rug from that one time because he didn't listen to his mom say not to eat food in the living room. Kinda weird, though, he was pretty sure this wasn't the rug he picked out with Nicole.

Humming, Sorun looked out the window. Rest of Detroit looked normal for the most part, lots of people walking in the streets and driving on the sidewalk. Business as normal, it seemed. He shrugged off any concerns that'd been growing in him and turned towards the kitchen. He was still pretty hungry.

The fridge. It was straight to the fridge, Sorun went, straight to the fridge for something to eat. He'd take anything at this point, even scarf down a block of cheese if that was all there was in there. He didn't know if mom went grocery shopping yet or not. Ooh, maybe she'd gotten a bag of those frozen shrimp she got sometimes, he really liked those.

There wasn't any bagged frozen shrimp when he opened the fridge. In fact, there wasn't any food in there at all. The only thing inside the fridge was a single carton of orange juice.

"Ugh, finally." Sustenance was sustenance, whatever, he'd take it. He grabbed the carton with one hand while closing the fridge with the other and then reached into the nearby cupboard for a glass. "Hey, uh, mom? You home yet? Mom?" Sorun turned his head away from the cabinet to call further into the house. "You... you wanna talk again like we always do? Mom?" His finger tapped nervously against the cabinet door. "So there's, um, there's this girl, right? Her name's Nicole, she's really great. Like a million times better than whatever I deserve, so, uh, can-can she come over? Like, not for dinner,

'cause... 'cause she doesn't do it, I can explain that part, but I'd still like it if you two could meet, you'd really love her. It'd be great. Mom?"

Nobody responded to him. The house was completely silent.

"That's... that's fine, I-I guess you're just not home yet. I'll just, er, wait, 'cause you're running late again and... I really just wanna talk, but, but it's fine, you'll be home later. We'll talk later."

He grabbed a glass out of the cabinet. After closing the cabinet door he relocated himself to the kitchen table, where he sat down while placing both the orange juice carton and the glass on the table's surface. He hesitated for a few moments after, breathing a small sigh before unscrewing the cap off the orange juice carton and tipping it over to pour the contents into the empty glass.

Nothing flowed out from the carton.

"... Eh?" Confused, Sorun pulled the carton away from the glass. He shook it a little bit, growing even more confused at feeling the heavy weight of the carton. He held the opening up to his eye to examine it further. "The hell, man, it feels full- agh!"

It apparently was full, just not with orange juice. Sand, of all things, flowed out from the carton and onto Sorun's face. He became startled enough that he tumbled out of his chair - only he didn't collapse onto the kitchen floor. There was more sand under him. Not floor. It was all sand.

Startled once again, Sorun sat up with a short shout, looking around wildly. The house was gone, walls gone, ceiling replaced by blue sky. And all around was sand. Nothing but sand and more sand as far as the eye could see.

Oh, and an ocean. He just noticed that after looking to the left. He calmed down immediately upon seeing it, standing up to take a look at it. The ocean - constantly undulating, moving as if it were alive. He could see every color imaginable glowing off its vibrating surface, sunlight glinting off its surface and stretching off into forever like a never ending white serpent.

Shuffle, shuffle.

Sorun jumped at the sound, body turning midair to face the sound of the skittering noise. He looked around at the beach to find what was making the noise, and at first found nothing. But then he looked down and found it: a splotch of red on the sandy ground.

There it was. A crab. Scuttling along in the sand, just outside of the range of the colorful waves washing over the beach's shore. It continued scuttling until it was directly in front of Sorun, where it stopped. The two stood there in complete stillness, man and crab, regarding each other in silent consideration.

But then, a sudden shift. The crab rose its claws up in a threatening manner, its eight legs spreading and body lowering slightly. Sorun made a small "ooh" sound, widening his own stance and flattening his hands while bringing them up to his face in his best imitation of a kung-fu stance. Neither opponent moved, each waiting for the other to make the opening attack.

The crab leapt.

Crab

The dweller of the abyssal deep

The power of the crab surprised even Sorun, as it managed a leap of strength so impressive it was on a direct collision course straight for Sorun's face. One of its claws extended outwards with the intent to pinch him, sunlight glistening off the claw's carapace and reflecting incandescent rays in every direction. Every aspect of the crab, from its movement to form, was the very definition of perfection. It was, by definition, the ultimate example of its species.

It was the first time in his life, upon observing this magnificent crab, that Sorun had ever felt such feelings of utter adoration and respect for a crustacean. He viewed the flying crab in reverence, silently thanking both it and the universe for providing such an opportunity to witness such beauty and perfection.

He uppercut the crab out of the air. It fell into the sand, dead.

"God I'm so fucking cool," Sorun thought to himself, blowing onto his fist and rubbing it on his chest for a job well done. He turned his back to the fallen crab, choosing to step forwards further down the beach, and then stopped after a few steps when Sorun realized he didn't actually know where he was going.

Click.

Sorun's head perked up. That sound... one of a peculiar nature. It was some weird combination of a clicking and popping sound. Like a chicken making a clucking sound but more... clicky? It was otherworldly, a kind of sound Sorun had never imagined possible. His curiosity got the better of him; he couldn't let what was possibly the discovery of the millennium, whatever made that sound, to go undiscovered. So he turned around to see what made that sound.

The crab was gone. In its place was... well, Sorun wasn't entirely sure.

He thought it was Knuckles at first. The colors were there, the features right, but the proportions were not. It looked like somebody had made some kind of caricature drawing of Knuckles and it'd jumped off the page and into real life. Like Doodlebob from that one episode of "Spongebob" but red and vaguely Knuckles-shaped. Except he was... squatter. Rounder. Limbs noodly-er. And his eyes! Those perfectly round, shining eyes that seemed to be popping out of his eye sockets looked as innocent as they did haunting.

The creature clicked at Sorun again. The way its mouth moved was abnormal. It didn't "move" open so much as it seemed there were only two positions for its mouth: open and closed. Two complete binaries with no intermediary. Maybe he really was a cartoon come to life.

"My brudda!" Well, he sure as shit didn't have Knuckles' voice. What accent even was that? Jamaican? No, too off. "I have found you at last!"

"Wow, man." Sorun squinted his eyes and leaned forwards to get a better look at Doodleknuckles. "Knuckles, you're... just wow. I can't believe it. You're less ugly, it's amazing."

"My brudda," he repeated, once more making that eldritch clicking sound. "Now dat I have found you I must ask. Do you know de way?"

For what seemed like such an innocent and simple question it carried a certain kind of gravity behind it that nearly swept Sorun off his feet. He couldn't understand why, just that it did. That there was power in that five word question, arcane and unknowable to a simple three-dimensional being such as Sorun. Even pondering its very meaning sent his brain throbbing, his mind recoiling at the sheer implication behind it, sent his organs recoiling in outrage. As if his body rebelled at the very idea of him even considering attempting to answer a question so far beyond his understanding.

He took a stab at it anyway.

"The way, huh?" Sorun blinked long and hard at the question, leaning backwards to look at the technicolor sky with his hands interlocked behind his head. "Who can say what way is even the right way? Pre-destined paths and destiny in general have certain connotations regarding a lack of autonomy and freedom that I'm not really a big fan of. 'Thout the freedom to do whatever we want what's the point? Where's the life? You're seriously gonna take my advice after hearing all that?" His head nodded back down to Doodleknuckles, wide grin on his face. "Fuck my way. Don't go down whatever way someone tells you to go down. Carve a path and find your own way, man."

"But de way, my brudda! Do you know de way?"

Instantly the smile dropped off of Sorun's face when the question was repeated at him. Thoughts of violence began swirling in his mind. "You fucking ingrate. I give you all that and that's what you have to say to me?"

"Because of de way, my brudda! I need you to tell me!"

The hands that had been interlocked behind Sorun's head fell down to his sides. They balled into fists as he glowered at Doodleknuckles. "You know, for as long as I've remembered I've always had the compulsion to do the exact opposite of what people tell me to do. Can't help it. I just like annoying people." He tilted his head backwards, eyes sliding down to look down at the caricature. "So you know what? I do know the way. But I'm not telling you."

The thing's mouth opened the exact same way as it always did when he spoke, and even thought there was no visual discernable difference, it still somehow managed to convey the sensation of being shocked. "But we are bruddas! Why would you betray me like dis!?"

"I'm still pissed over the Enerjak thing. Fucking fight me if you care that much."

Doodleknuckles' mouth closed. A pair of lines that seemed to be eyebrows materialized just above his bulging eyes, slanting in a way that conveyed anger. "Dis insult will not be forgiven, my brudda. Dis will mean war with de entire tribe."

There was a shift. On a dime the skies turned dark and red. The calm waters of infinite colors turned dark and murky, and began to violently crash against the now stark-white beach as the two stared each other down. And eclipse settled over the sun.

"That's the way, that's what I wanna see." Fists still balled, Sorun began stomping forwards towards Doodleknuckles. The probably-echidna moved in kind, his body not actually moving on its own, but sliding forwards while hopping up and down as if some giant, invisible hand was moving it forwards like a puppet. The detail was inconsequential to Sorun - he just needed to satiate this overwhelming urge to punch him. "Told ya that ya gotta carve your own path. Starts here with me."

The fight started when the two had neared each other, and Doodleknuckles had been the one to make the first move. He spit at Sorun.

Sorun blinked. The globule projectile was slow in its travel, and was easily dodged. Easily enough he'd simply turned his body to the side by a slight degree and watched the spit wad impact the ground next to him. He blinked once more, and turned back to Doodleknuckles, face set in an almost lost expression.

What did that even mean? Did he think so little of Sorun that he thought simply spitting at him would be enough to deter him? Or did he look down at him so much he didn't even consider him worth fighting? That he felt so insulted in his presence he needed to spit like that to establish their standing? No matter the reason it caused unadulterated rage to swell withing Sorun as a furious snarl grew on his face.

He lunged forwards, gripping Doodleknuckles by his stubby and near-nonexistent throat. His back landed against the sand, the caricature gagging out as Sorun straddled him from above, doing his best and succeeding at strangling him, his bulging eyes bulging out even more. One of Sorun's hands left his throat and balled into a fist, and then just as quick flew forwards and smashed right into Doodleknuckles' face.

It broke apart completely, like a ceramic vase full of muscle and white meat. It smelled like crab for some reason.

After that, breathing in a slightly heavy manner, Sorun dismounted the dead maybe-echidna. He continued to lightly pant, only regarding the dead body for a few seconds before looking up... only to pause when he noticed he was surrounded by more. Tens, maybe even dozens more of the Doodleknuckles. All staring at him with those vacant, bulging eyes. All facing him. With the way they were positioned there was no direction Sorun could run in to escape.

Not that he even wanted to. The primal, instinctive side of Sorun that had been whispering violence in his mind and had become excited when he killed the first Doodleknuckles was firing up again. The desire to run just wasn't there. The only desire he did have was to do that again. To all the echidna caricatures surrounding him.

So, when they all at once, simultaneously, screamed at the top of their lungs and began moving towards him in that strange, motionless motion of theirs, Sorun didn't run. Instead a toothy smile spread over his face and he burst forwards towards the nearest Doodleknuckles. He'd jumped on him before he could make the first move, fists flying down to cave in the thing's face as another Doodleknuckles jumped on his back. And then a second. And a third.

Eventually Sorun was dogpiled by the entire group of Doodleknuckles, forming a large, red pile. It didn't deter the human, though, as a pale fist shot out from the top of the pile and dislodged one of the maybe-echidna from the top. His torso burst out after.

Screaming, Sorun continued to wail on all the Doodleknuckles. But more kept coming. Bursting from beneath the surface of the sand and wading out from the crashing waves. Tens and hundreds of the things, all adding to the pile, burying and smothering him. More and more, no matter how many Sorun punched and killed, it wouldn't end. The weight from all the bodies being added becoming overbearing, what little light there was left fading as their bodies blocked out the light. But no matter how many were added he continued to fight and punch away, no matter how more and more ineffective it was becoming.

And then, a change. A sudden shift, like gravity had been reversed. The bodies underneath Sorun began falling away. And then he fell away, too. Past all the bodies. Past the beach. Past the world itself, into the deep dark black.

It was just him falling down here. The others, the Doodleknuckles, they weren't falling with him, didn't exist. Maybe never even existed. It was just him falling straight down, arms and legs extended out like some skydiver as he stared down at the infinite expanse below him. An what a view it was: swirling coronas of blues and purples, giant flares of orange and red in the far distance, green clouds of speckles light intermixed between the colorful sights and the infinite black filling the void between it all. Endless nebulas and cosmic dust clouds. Sorun was falling through it all. Falling through the forever - through the universe.

In retrospect, the novelty wore off after a few minutes and Sorun found himself yawning in boredom as he continued to fall. But then he'd heard that large caw in the distance, and the drowsiness left his eyes as he looked towards the source.

There, in the distance. Two figures highlighted in the backdrop of a nearby nebula. A normal fox, the animalistic kind he'd see on Earth. Normal except for the fact it had two tails. It was lying there in front of another animal that was standing over it. A large black falcon with fourteen eyes. It stared down at the fox lying below it, hatefully.

The falcon's head shot forwards, beak tearing into the fox's abdomen. The fox screamed in pain and anguish as the falcon pulled out its guts and pierced its organs. The fox tried to fight back; its claws slid harmlessly off its attacker's feathers. The black falcon continued digging into and killing the fox, strikes becoming more feverous and frenzied with time. In the process of mutilating the fox the falcon was screaming, too. Angered, furious screams that grew louder and louder each time the beak dug into the fox's body, growing more anguished over time before turning back into furious noises, the strikes becoming less and less precise and more messy and rage-driven as it abandoned pecking the fox apart and resorted to simply tearing at its body with its beak and talons. By the time half the fox's body was an unrecognizable mess of gore it was already dead.

As Sorun fell past the two, the black falcon rose its head up from the pile of carrion to look at him. Its fourteen eyes, five on either side of its head and four more on top, all blinked at Sorun at once, the falcon itself remaining silent as it stared. Seemingly dismissing Sorun, it went back to eating at the fox's corpse.

"Huh. Neat." Sorun looked away from the two and down towards where he was falling. There was a sun there. "Not neat."

It was a big sun. Big and red, and he was falling straight towards it, towards the mass of coronal ejections that twisted and turned around it like living tendrils reaching out towards Sorun. The sun blinked, and now there was black pupil in the center. One the size of a whole planet staring right at Sorun. And on Sorun's part there was no reaction. Nothing but quiet acceptance as he relaxed his body and fell right into the scorching red eye that stared at him with scorn.

A pair of crimson eyes stared down at him with exhaustion and mild confusion. Some disappointment may have been brewing within them as well.

There'd he'd found him. Lying on the beach. Surrounded by an innumerable amount of crab corpses of all things. Crabs which Sorun seemed to have punched to death, as if Shadow could even understand how that came to be. Nor why Sorun was now flat on his back and seemingly mumbling in his sleep about some indiscernible nonsense.

He wasn't in the mood to put up with it. Short of kicking him, which would be counterproductive given the current situation, he'd decided to go to the ocean, scoop up a handful of seawater, and bring it back to Sorun while continuing to scowl down at him.

"Awaken, fool," Shadow ordered, and then flung the seawater at Sorun's face.

Sorun's eyes shot open and he sat upwards with a startled gasp, panting heavily as he glanced around. He seemed confused at first, seeing the legion of dead crustaceans littering the sand around them, and then he'd looked up at Shadow with even greater confusion. "Wha-what happened, what's going on?"

"You tell me," Shadow said. "You were gone for half an hour and when I came to look for you I happened upon you fighting the entire island's population of crabs to the death. You lost. I had to step in and finish them off when you collapsed halfway through the fight so they wouldn't pick you apart."

There wasn't even embarrassment on Sorun's face. Just a profound look of disappointment and even a fair amount of loathing, which Shadow supposed was appropriate. "I lost? Against crabs? Not even Mobian crabs, but like... like just normal crabs?"

"Yes."

"H-how?"

"I couldn't even begin to tell you," Shadow replied in an honest tone. "It was a display of ineptitude so astonishing words would fail to accurately describe it. I've seen drunkards at the base who moved with more articulation than you demonstrated. What exactly overcame you?"

Sorun gestured in a vague direction towards the center of the island. "Some bad shrooms over... over there. Somewhere. I ate some. Don't eat 'em."

He'd scream if dignity allowed it. It did not. "You consumed unidentified fungal matter while stranded in an unknown world?" The amount of training, natural instinct and common sense Shadow possessed all told him such a thing was one of the worst possible ideas one could have. As a consequence those same conditions were making it so that he literally couldn't comprehend how such a decision had been made by Sorun.

"Yeah."

That wasn't a satisfying answer. "And what was your plan if you had been poisoned ?" he nearly growled out through grit teeth.

With a sullen expression and defeated eyes, Sorun's arm fell back to his side. "... I'm not smart," was the only excuse he offered.

Objectively untrue, but at the same time it was hard for Shadow to refute this claim. Because Sorun was a walking paradox he evidently needed to watch like a child. He got himself killed the last time he didn't do that and he nearly did again. "Let's just count ourselves fortunate that they weren't toxic," he grumbled out, not willing to waste energy on the matter, and then bent down to pick up one of the crabs. "Even more fortunate is that we can eat these. I finished the fire pit."

Sorun blanched a bit. "We don't have anything else?"

"You're eating the crab," Shadow said, gaze snapping to Sorun.

He gulped in response. "I-I'll eat the crab."

Sorun ended up eating the crab. And a few more besides.

It wasn't bad, surprisingly. The opposite, actually: it was actually really good. Apparently Shadow thought so, too, because he was wolfing them down. A whole lot of them, actually. Probably three times as many as Sorun ate. He didn't know if the guy had just been hungry or if it was some alien DNA quirk thing he had going on, but he suspected any question regarding it would be ignored so Sorun remained silent.

And beyond that there was a certain campy feel to the whole thing. Sitting there in front of a fire, sun setting down from somewhere behind the island. A bunch of crabs impaled on sticks set over the fire. Crab leg in hand as Sorun continually glanced to the side at the growing pile of crab shell husks next to Shadow.

They'd been partaking in small talk for a lack of anything better to do. Swapping some stories: Sorun told a bit about Silver and what they'd been up to on the Cosmic Interstate. Shadow had shared a story. It got weird.

"... So you just, just yanked his hair out and..." Sorun's expression became lost. Like he was staring at an impossible puzzle as he looked at Shadow. "Why?"

Shadow bit into another crab before responding. "Because Snively was irritating and those few hairs on his head bothered me. Because it was aesthetically displeasing. Because he'd crossed me and needed to be warned never to do so again."

"No I get that, but... but why did you keep the hair?" Sorun asked. "Like you seriously just held onto them all the way to the Freedom HQ? W-why? Like what were you planning to do with it?"

Shadow paused halfway to bringing another crab up to his face. His mouth was set in a neutral expression but his eyes were the faintest bit wider than usual. Sorun didn't know what emotion expressed. It couldn't be embarrassment, could it? He doubted Shadow was capable of such a thing. "I'd... been preoccupied with more important things. I suppose I'd forgotten to relax my grip," he confessed. "It's hardly my fault. How was I to know that madman put tracking devices in his individual hairs?"

"Absolutely nothing could have ever prepared me for that sentence." Really. Nothing at all. It was impossible to react to such a revelation because there was no appropriate reaction to something so absurd, and yet Sorun somehow took it in stride because this was his life now. "What were you doing that you were in such a rush anyways?"

"It was a personal matter."

"Alright." An answer like that implied he wanted it left alone. Sorun respected the wish as he idly flung the crab leg about. "Could really go for some of that ketchup I stole from that guy in that one zone," Sorun mumbled out as he turned the crab leg over in his hand. He'd stopped being hungry a while ago but the urge to play with a pointy leg wouldn't leave him, so at the moment he was kind of just turning it over a bunch.

Shadow threw another empty shell in the pile. He glanced at Sorun, a bit curious. "You stole condiments? Why?"

"..." Sorun looked back at the fire. He'd been telling him a bit of what had happened to him to pass the time, mostly the traveling with Silver. He decided to go ahead and lay out what'd been on his mind for a while. "Don't tell Silver if you ever meet him but I robbed a lot of people while we were trying to get back to Mobius Prime," he admitted. "Every single world used a different currency so I had to just so I could feed him and afford hotel rooms."

"But why the ketchup?"

"It was good ketchup and I didn't like the guy who had it." Shadow didn't comment on that. "Lotta times I'd try to just steal food over people's money. Wasn't that hard with time stop. Every time Silver asked I just lied and said I was getting handouts from sympathetic people."

"You don't sound that regretful."

"It's not like I ever did anything permanent. Times were desperate." He looked back at Shadow. "You get it, right?"

He didn't answer at first, just stared at Sorun all contemplative-like. Then he looked back towards the fire, picked up one of the sticks and pulled a roasted crab off of it. "I can't fault survival," was his response as he pulled the crab in half. Sorun took it as acceptance.

"I'm less interested in that and more in how you wound up in an 'alternate future,' as you said."

Sorun hesitated. He wasn't not fine with the topic, but he also wasn't too keen on seeing Shadow react to the whole King Shadow situation. For sure he was leaving out the part where Sorun decapitated him while he was helpless, but that didn't eliminate the broad topic, which was the main issue. And besides that there was a bigger topic that had Sorun wondering why Shadow wasn't asking about it.

"You really wanna ask about that?" Sorun asked him. "Not about the whole reason I had to stay on Mobius in the first place?"

Now it was Shadow who hesitated. He'd paused in his movements, eyes flicking from the crab to Sorun. There was a twinge in his facial expression, eyes tightening a bit. If he didn't know better Sorun would say he looked almost unsure of what to say to that.

"I assumed there was nothing to talk about," he said, awfully carefully. "The others had appraised me of... of the broad strokes, as it were. Of your home."

"... You're right. There ain't nothing to talk about over it." Silently, Sorun was thankful that he just didn't want to bring it up. It was the kind of wound he just didn't like talking about, and it seemed to make even Shadow uncomfortable of all people, as if such a thing was actually possible. He shifted back to the topic he asked about earlier. "So basically back in the day Sonic messed around with things he shouldn't have and it broke some other things. Big time anomaly, blah blah blah, I fixed it so it isn't a problem but apparently it would have been and Sonic had to go and fix his own mistake. Which ended up obliterating this timeline and supplanting it with another; I only got spared because the Master Emerald saved me." He shook his head, groaning out, "It was a pain and a half dealing with, let me tell you."

Shadow's response was a "hmph" noise as he bit into the crab. And then he asked, "What changed?"

"Just Sonic not being there. It messed the world up even more 'cause he wasn't there to do his hero thing so you had to step up and sort it all out. Spoiler alert you became a fascist dictator and took the world over."

Shadow almost dropped the crab he was holding. Almost . His self-discipline was either superb or the crab was just that good. "I... what?" He blinked his eyes a few times while considering the words, looking puzzled and just the slightest bit disturbed. "Truly?"

"Mhm. You even had a torture chamber and everything," Sorun informed him.

The information made Shadow flinch. "I didn't...?"

He knew what he was trying to ask. "Not to me, no." If he didn't know what to look for Sorun wouldn't have noticed that Shadow looked relieved. The way he ever-so-slightly went slack in posture. "Others? Yeah. There was a lot more blood than rust on all those shackles. And I saw the result of at least once case."

Shadow's eyes flickered downward. He suddenly didn't seem so hungry as he set the half-eaten crab down. "I'm unsure of what to say to that," he admitted. "There wasn't... just Sonic not existing? That was the only change?"

"To be fair think of all the times he saved the world, and now picture what the world would be like if he was never there," Sorun reminded him. "I don't know what the world looked like before dictator you took it over, but it was probably really bad. And you did... I hesitate to say the word 'fix', but you managed to bring the world back to some semblance of order. Probably really impressive considering what you had to work with. I wasn't considering it back then because I was only focused on trying to make everything normal, but with how screwed up and fractured the world was and him waking up in the middle of all that I can kind of see how he'd arrive at a bunch of the conclusions he came to."

"... Maybe," Shadow agreed. "The situation my world was in compared to his are so radically different I'd be shocked if there wasn't some major personality drift of the sort. It's just disconcerting to know I apparently could have slipped to such a position."

"I don't know if this is any comfort but he admitted it right to my face he ultimately just wanted to save as many lives as possible. In... some messed up way he succeeded. So there's that," Sorun offered. "Just leaned so hard into the whole supreme ruler thing, though, couldn't believe it. There was this, er..." Sorun paused momentarily and gesticulated randomly at the air, "this statue I saw. Like he forced this religion on everybody I think, saw people praying to and worshiping to this statue of, I think it was a human girl? Maybe an Overlander? Gave her angel wings and everything, it was really freaky."

When he heard that Shadow froze, which for Sorun was a weird sight. Because he'd never seen him taken so off his guard before, and until now Sorun didn't think for someone like Shadow it was something possible. But he didn't comment on what he heard Sorun say at first. Didn't even look at him. He just froze, what seemed to be out of pure shock if the widening eyes said anything, and then his head slowly dipped downwards so that he could stare at his shoes.

A minute passed. Then two. By then Sorun began to realize there was something up with what he said, about that statue, and he began to think he treaded on ground he shouldn't have. By minute three of him just silently sitting there it was growing worrying to the human. He wanted to speak out, but just didn't know what he was supposed to say.

Finally, thankfully, Shadow sighed out. It was a deep, weary sounded that made him sound a hundred years older than he was and Sorun didn't know how to take that, so he remained silent. "She was..." he began, more mumbling than anything else, "... it was very likely that was Maria."

Nervously, Sorun tapped at his knee. He wasn't used to hearing Shadow speak like this. It was uncomfortable to hear. "If this is something better left alone-"

"It's not exactly a secret," Shadow sighed out. "Just personal. And after everything you saw you deserve some explanation. More than others at least." It took another minute of him staring at his shoes to begin talking again. When he did, he didn't so much as look in Sorun's direction. "I already told you everything involving Space Colony ARK, my creation, and Dr. Gerald. Do you remember?"

"Hard to forget a thing like that."

"What I chose to leave out was the reason behind my creation in the first place," he continued. "Maria was Dr. Gerald's granddaughter. She was also afflicted with a disease that would eventually take her life. All of Dr. Gerald's research and even my inception was all in the effort of finding a cure to help her and anyone else with her affliction." He shuffled in the sand where he was sitting. "She was my first and only friend."

Slowly, Sorun breathed outwards. The conversation was veering in familiar territory and he didn't like it very much. "Think I can see where this is going. Been in a similar spot with a friend."

For the first time since the conversation started Shadow looked at him. "You have?"

Sorun nodded in affirmation. It wasn't a story he felt comfortable sharing but at this point he felt obligated, with everything Shadow said. "Back on Earth there was a girl around my age. Never met her in person, we were online buddies. She was good - real good . Pretty much on my level and I was world-class," Sorun said, small smile on his mouth. "No matter what game we played we always tied in everything, and she was pretty funny besides. I used to think she was just talented with games like I was, but, uh... then one day out of nowhere she spills it all." The smile dropped off her face. "She wasn't good like me 'cause she just was. She was as good as she was 'cause she had nothing else to do all day. She was a terminal patient withering away in a hospital bed. Kept going on and on like she couldn't stop once she got started, talking about all her medical issues and how she felt bad about how much money she was draining out of her parents for treatment, when she started crying I didn't know what to do, because what was I supposed to do? I was some guy on the other side of the country behind a screen, I couldn't say anything. I just sat there like a idiot for a whole hour without saying a single thing."

Shadow didn't respond, choosing to just continue to look at Sorun. Intently, with a sympathetic look on his face.

"And she tells me there's this surgery," Sorun continued, "she says the doctors told her it's her one chance. Her family can't afford it though 'cause her treatment up to that point hemorrhaged their funds and the surgery was a new, experimental thing their insurance wouldn't cover."

"Her life was in danger because nobody could afford treatment?" Shadow sounded particularly rankled at that. "Why does something like that even need to be afforded?"

"My country had issues, it was a whole thing, I don't wanna get into it," Sorun explained, though Shadow didn't look particularly satisfied at it. "The surgery's upwards of around fifty grand, and I got no idea how anyone's supposed to wrangle together that kinda scratch. 'Cept... there was a tournament coming up. For this game called 'Smash!'. Grand prize was fifty K. She couldn't make it because you had to physically be there to compete, and besides that she just didn't have the stamina to compete with players like that consecutively. But I did.

"Somehow I managed to convince my mom to sign a bunch of forms and drive me over to the tournament so I could compete. Spent weeks beforehand training for the event - god, Shadow, never worked harder in my entire life," Sorun groaned out, "but it was my friend and she was dying, so I had to. Tried to rope David into it but his family wouldn't go for it, so it was all me. And that tournament..."

He could picture it like it was yesterday. The strain his mind felt from the hyper-intense focus, synapses firing and brain feeling like it was overheating from how fast his thoughts were running all day. Fingers cramping from the twitch-reflexes and fast movements. Lungs burning from how hard he'd been breathing to give himself as much oxygen as possible. He'd nearly passed out by the time that damn tournament ended.

"Before coming to Mobius it was quite literally the hardest thing I'd ever done in my life. But-" Sorun breathed outwards, sounding tired just thinking of it, "-I did it. I won the tournament and got the grand prize. For a lot of people fifty thousand dollars was literally life changing money, and I gave it all to my friend's family so she could get the surgery. My mom, uh... after all was said and done she was she was real proud of me. She was a doctor, so, so I guess she understood."

"... And?" Shadow asked after a moment's consideration. "Was it enough to save her?"

"No, she died halfway through the surgery," Sorun bluntly replied. Shadow simply blinked - his approximation of shock. "Only found out about it later through an email her parents sent me. Pretty sure they hated my guts since she would've lived a few years otherwise." He rose a hand up and let it flop against his thigh. "Doesn't... doesn't matter, I guess, everyone ended up dying in the end anyways but... whatever. Doesn't matter."

"I'm... unsure of what to say," Shadow admitted after a moment of silence. "There had never been a time where Maria had been bedridden due to her illness. It was a progressive disease but she was young enough that it wasn't debilitating in any significant way yet. If there were some surgery that could fix it Dr. Gerald would have taken it in a heartbeat, but not if it was a risky, experimental surgery with a large chance of failure. She meant too much to him."

"Yeah. I can see it. After that whole thing, having to read a bunch of hate-filled words written to me by a pair of heartbroken parents I can get why somebody wouldn't wanna put a loved one through a risky surgery. They did, but... I dunno, guess they were that desperate. For hope, I guess." He limply gestured to Shadow. "He do it in the end? Fix her?"

The answer was delivered just as bluntly as Sorun had said it. "No. Dr. Gerald never found his cure."

Sorun's head solemnly turned back to the fire. "No time?"

"There might have been. G.U.N., who'd contracted him to create a weapon and provided the ARK and all its facilities, became aware his projects completion. My completion. And they never trusted Dr. Gerald on the best of days even though they'd been the ones to sponsor his creation of a bioweapon - perhaps wisely due to his secret pact with an alien. So they came to a decision. Without any warning the ARK was raided by soldiers. Research was seized. Assets and personnel liquidated. Maria was shot for helping me escape while Dr. Gerald was captured and later executed. Maria's sacrifice was meaningless as I was caught and put into cryo sleep regardless."

"..." Sorun's eyes flickered over to Shadow. "I get you have your reasons, but... why did you bother joining them if they're responsible for killing your friend? For something as shallow as that?"

"It was fifty years ago. It's different people leading the organization and between them and the Freedom Fighters I'm fine where I am," he answered. "It doesn't erase the mistakes of the past, but I didn't see the use in burning bridges without good reason. They're useful besides." He paused. "It was her last wish. For the world to be protected. It needed to be obligated one way or another so I chose G.U.N."

He didn't know how to take that. From a logical perspective it made complete sense, and in that way it somehow made sense to Sorun that Shadow made that choice. In a certain light it could even be seen as mature. Respectable. Sorun himself, he wasn't sure he would be able to make the same choice. In fact, he was pretty sure he wouldn't.

"Well, you're probably a better person than me in that case," Sorun admitted. "Don't think I'd be able to do the same thing. Join a government body that killed my best friend, even if it were fifty years later and the people running it were completely different."

"You wouldn't?" Shadow asked. He sounded surprised.

"Hard to say if I'd ever forgive a group for doing something like that regardless of who are and who aren't in it," he said. "That probably puts me in a bad light, I dunno, it..." Sorun cut himself off with a dry, humorless chuckle, "it's a weird thing. But then again you almost blew the world up over it 'fore you came to your senses so maybe I shouldn't talk you up on having the moral high ground."

"I changed my mind," he quickly dismissed. "... After some convincing," he'd quickly added.

"Pft. I'd say those two are up their laughing at us but I know for a fact she ain't there with Maria."

"A believer of the afterlife? You?"

"Nah, all perceptions of religion got blasted out of me the moment I landed on Mobius," Sorun told Shadow. "That being said higher powers with very punchable faces flat-out told me every living thing goes back to the Chaos Force when they die, and this is true for everything in every zone. But humans like me from our zone out in the middle of nowhere don't have Chaos Force links so we don't get an afterlife like everyone else. Found that out the hard way." The fire continued to crackle softly with Sorun staring at it while Shadow stared towards Sorun's face. "... I try not to think about it," Sorun admitted. "How when all my friends die they get to go to an afterlife but when I die I just get sent to oblivion."

Shadow hesitated before responding. "That's-"

"I mean I don't think it matters. Wouldn't be surprised if it's less an afterlife and more when someone dies and their soul goes to the Chaos Force it's one of those your-personality-is-disseminated-to-join-the-greater-whole deals. Or maybe it ain't, I dunno." Sorun dropped his crab leg and picked up a nearby stick to poke at the fire. "Maybe if I get the chance before I die I'll permanently absorb a Chaos Emerald for Yamato again so I can be a ghost and just cut my way into the Chaos Force to see for myself."

"... Isn't that somewhat long-term thinking?"

"Mh. Who knows." Sorun dropped the stick and turned back to Shadow, ignoring the odd look he was giving him. "Backpedaling a bit, you... really cared a lot about Maria, huh? To the point you became cool agent man to help protect the world just 'cause she liked it so much." He leaned back on his elbows and looked up at the sky. "I mean, I liked my friend, too, but I wouldn't have become a turbo dictator for her sake."

"Please stop referring to my deeply misguided alternate timeline persona. And refrain from ever uttering the title 'turbo dictator' ever again." Despite the tense tone he'd used Shadow mirrored Sorun's relaxed posture, leaning backwards to stare up at the sky. "But... yes. Her memory is as much a comfort as the pain of her loss for me."

"Gotcha." Sorun shifted a bit to settle in a more comfortable position. "Why are you telling me all this?"

"What do you mean?"

"Because neither of us are touchy-feely guys so I never pictured this happening in a million years," Sorun explained. "What's the deal?"

"I'd ask you the same thing."

"Well, you're the one that got the ball rolling. You answer."

"You asked about the statue."

"And you didn't have to be so detailed with the explanation. Spill."

Shadow deeply sighed. He'd paused long enough that Sorun assumed he just wasn't going to answer, but then he began speaking. "Partly out of guilt, for me inadvertently dragging you into this situation and for all the other misfortunes. Mostly because you're not insufferable like most people I know. And I'd thought you'd understand better with everything that's happened to you. And we've confided heavily in one another in the past," he explained. The next part made him wince a bit. "And a girl who lives at G.U.N. has been... encouraging me to undertake such measures. Her name's Hope. She reminds me much about Maria."

"That's, uh, Eggman's niece, isn't she? Er, the last one's?"

"Yes. She's gifted with machines and assists G.U.N.'s engineers. Outperforms most, truthfully. Thankfully she doesn't share the Doctor's more egregious proclivities." If it wasn't said with such a dry, bland voice Sorun would have assumed that was a joke. "She likes planes especially."

"Ah, yeah, I had a friend named Jamie on Earth who was a big plane nut. Would talk about planes all day, literally, guy loved planes. Always just planes, planes, planes with him." He made a small scoff and shook his head. "Yeah, Jamie was the plane guy, Billy was the soulless ginger-"

"Excuse me?"

"It was a stupid joke we liked to tease him with, really popular where I'm from. Anyway, Billy, he always talked about wanting to travel, liked seeing all the sights in the world. I glanced at his phone one time and he had, like, twenty tabs open that were just a bunch of image searches for random tourist sites all around the globe. Jarod, he was a big boxer fan. Saw his room once, nothing but Mike Tyson and Apollo Creed posters everywhere, man, it was nuts."

"Fighters from your world?"

"Eh, one, other was a fictional character, but there were a bunch of posters and other stuff. Even had a 'Megalo Box' poster, and he didn't even like anime all that much. Anyway, he wasn't as insane about it as Jamie was with his planes but he was into it nonetheless. Then there was a David, who was almost as big a gamer nerd as I was. Pfft," Sorun laughed out, raising his hand to wave around, "I can almost picture it, if he were sent here instead of me he would have made Cloud's big dumb Buster Sword instead of a cool sword like I got. He was a big 'Final Fantasy' nerd. The seventh one in particular was his favorite, which wasn't a surprise 'cause it was a lot of people's favorites, but man, when they were remaking that one he got so excited, wouldn't shut up about it. Talked about it for a literal month straight when the first part of that remake series came out." His arm flopped down to his side on the sand. "He never did get to see the rest of those remake games. I'll never see 'em, either, but at least I'm alive to miss 'em."

"... I see..."

Sorun glanced at Shadow from the corner of his eye. "You know, everybody has dead people; we ain't special in that regard. Most people eventually grow past it. You didn't need to come to me just because I'm the most tragic guy you know outside yourself."

"It's less that and more..." Shadow's face scrunched up in displeasure. "You know what the people you live with are like."

"Oh, yeah, I know. You share even a iota of this heavy stuff with 'em and they get all emotional, all smiles and hugs all around, loads of encouraging words, probably even some tears. Don't get me wrong, I love 'em all to death over it, but at the same time I just can't do that.

Like I physically can't handle all that, so I keep all this stuff to myself. 'Cept with Nicole, I shared a bunch of stuff with here, but... well, that's different."

Shadow got the meaning and moved on without commenting on it. "Therein is the problem. You outlined why I could never go to them, and I'm not even that close with them besides, I doubt my own partner would take me seriously and even if she did I doubt we'll ever share a title beyond 'acquaintance', I'll take this to the grave before sharing so much with one of the G.U.N. personnel, and Hope is... much in the same boat as the Mobians we're acquainted with.

"And then there's you. The only person I know who could be sympathetic with me but also has enough standards to not so much as lay a hand on my shoulder or waste breath on encouraging words and who'll likely never bring any of this up ever again for both our sakes."

"You make us sound like sociopaths when you put it like that."

"We plotted a murder."

"A failed murder," Sorun reminded him, grinning a bit, "so it doesn't count. And it was for a righteous cause. With Eggman it's debatably self-defense."

Shadow made a "hmph" sound. "True enough. It's been going well against him?"

"Eh, from what I heard. The others keep pushing him back further and further while chipping away at his defenses and forces. They're wearing him down faster than he and all those psycho echidna he recruited can regroup. Gonna be over any day now from how everyone's talking," Sorun informed him. The earlier grin fell off. "It's great to hear. I couldn't stop thinking about the fact I couldn't end this that day because I was one second too slow in killing him before my heart stopped, so knowing they're gonna beat him without anyone getting killed or even hurt despite me failing is a load off my shoulders. Dunno if I coulda lived with myself otherwise."

"... Relieving to hear," Shadow decided.

A shooting star had passed by overhead. By now the sun had set far enough that the stars above were becoming visible. The fire they had started was beginning to die down - there hadn't been that many sticks on the island to begin with and they'd already burned through what little fuel they had cooking the crabs from the other end of the beach. Wasn't all that bad, all things considered. Would have been downright peaceful if the fact they weren't stranded here wasn't hanging overhead. Sorun found a bit of comfort in it nonetheless.

"My dad blew his face off with a shotgun in front of me on my fourth birthday."

There wasn't a reaction from Shadow at first. Then he flinched the smallest bit, as if startled by something, and then looked towards Sorun again. His face looked surprised; the look of someone who just got punched in the face and was wondering why more than anything else. He didn't even seem able to form words.

"Just, you know, walked into the room and he was sitting there on the bed. Shotgun in mouth. We made eye contact for, like, a single second and then blam." Sorun made a "psh" sound and made a finger gun, shooting up at the sky. "Gun fell onto the ground, body slumped on the bed, brain matter was everywhere, ceiling, walls, my face. I didn't even know what just happened, I just stood there, frozen. My mom freaked out like you wouldn't believe. Literally. Just freaked out. Can't really blame her I guess, 'cause... I mean, who even sees that coming? What do you do in that situation? I feel like my mom had a meltdown trying to figure that out while dealing with the fact her husband just killed himself in front of her kid."

Shadow's mouth opened, but words weren't coming out. The ridges of his eyes were knitted together in concentration, like he was trying to figure out what he was supposed to say to all this. "Why?" was the only thing he managed to say.

"I don't know, man. Truth be told I barely remember the guy, but during the time he was alive and I could actually remember stuff I thought things were fine. Mom would never talk about it. Ever. So I never asked her if things weren't alright after all." He made a small sigh. "So after the police come to take the body and everything my mom scrambles, trying to salvage something out of the situation. Try to do something to take her son's mind off of everything that just happened. So she rushes to the nearby store and buys a video game, any video game, and rushed back home and pretty much plants four-year-old me in front of a TV 'cause she's freaking out and needs to at least try and distract me with something because she needs to figure out what she's supposed to do now and I just... go along with it because four-year-old me didn't realize my old man blowing his head off meant I was never seeing him again."

The look on Shadow's face could be best described as "uncomfortable". The same kind of face somebody sitting in an otherwise terrible chair would make, or one walking around with a rock in their shoe. The kind of uncomfortable that made somebody want to turn away from what was causing this feeling, but alas he was obligated to keep looking towards Sorun to listen.

"You probably guessed it, but the game she bought me was the very first 'Devil May Cry' game. Not sure why she got that one of all games, like I said I think she just kind of scrambled to get something and saw cool red guy on the cover so she grabbed it. It was an old game, too, so it was probably grabbed out of a bargain bin out of somewhere. Never asked. So that's how I got started with that and it kinda... stuck, I guess. Mh." He shuffled. "I don't know what my mom did in the background, how the whole situation got resolved, any of it. I just played the game. Literally. That's all I remember doing is playing that game and nothing else. For a week I think. Could have been more. She kept trying to distract me so she got the second game." Sorun's face momentarily scrunched in displeasure. "And then the third one. And for like... a month all I did was play those games. It's probably what set me on the path of being so good at games, that and these hands of mine, but that's neither here nor there. Things went back to normal over time. She did, I did, and we kinda just... you know, carried on. Without ever talking about it. Kind of ruined birthdays for me, though." Sorun paused. "I turned seventeen a while ago."

The sudden turn in conversation was so abrupt Shadow found himself stunned for a second and had to shake his head. "What?"

"Yeah. I didn't tell anybody. I was never going to tell anyone my birthday to begin with 'cause I never celebrate it but then it turns out by sheer coincidence it's on the same day as Sally's birthday, and that just gave me more reason not to say anything. I didn't wanna steal the spotlight from her, and honestly she deserved it more than a loser like me," Sorun said. "I don't know what I'm supposed to tell Nicole, because the day'll come where she'll flat-out corner me and demand to know what day it is. And I'm hoping she'll take the Sally excuse so I don't gotta bring up my dad. I told her he died but I never said how he died. I think she assumed it was some crime-related thing. I told her a bit about Detroit and for some reason she's under the impression it was some gang-filled apocalypse town, got no idea why."

It was perturbed. That was the expression Shadow had on, after a long while of Sorun trying to figure out what that face was. Maybe he couldn't blame him. Not for how glib and carefree Sorun had been with telling the story, but compared to everything else he just couldn't bother to feel much towards it. There hadn't even been so much as a hint of sadness in the human's voice or expression. He doubted it did anything as severe as creep Shadow out; Sorun didn't have anything strong enough to do that. He was still giving him an odd look now, though.

"And why didn't you?" Shadow asked. Despite the perturbed look he was managing to keep his voice level.

"Because I'm not even sure the concept of suicide exists to them." Sorun felt squeamish even thinking about it. "I mean parents dying, sure, I learned just yesterday how Antoine's dad died and... yeah, stuff happened, but anyways, that ? Dad blowing his head off in front of his kid?" Sorun shook his head. "Yeah, no, I'm never telling any of them that. They can't hear it. It's... I just don't feel like something belongs there. The idea of that happening. It goes in the box of stuff I can never tell anybody because it isn't for Mobian ears."

"They've been fighting Eggman and his horrors since they were children, Sorun," he reminded him. "I don't think you need to protect them like this."

He had a point, and admittedly it was a solid point. Them fighting for their lives since childhood probably did harden his friends' constitutions enough that they'd certainly be fazed, but not something as far as mentally scarred from the revelation. All the same... "Probably not, but... I just don't think this is something they need to know about, anyways. Just to be safe. Doesn't change anything." Sorun sighed out loudly and collapsed completely into the sand, flat on his back and staring up at the darkening sky. "Look, Shadow, it was a long time ago, and honestly I'm more upset at the guy for what he put my mom through doing that than the actual loss. And if he was the kind of guy to off himself in front of his kid I'm not even sure if he'd've been a good dad alive. We made it fine without him anyways." He paused. "... I did, at least. Guess she just ended up dying along with everyone else. Maybe it doesn't even matter. None of it did in the end."

He'd stopped looking at the past just so he could move forwards. Could see why now; introspection like this? Wasn't doing it for Sorun. There weren't any profound revelations about the inner self or some grand epiphany to some problem he didn't feel even existed that manifested out of nowhere just from talking about this. Though he did feel... admittedly lighter. Somehow. He wasn't sure why or how. He'd take it but walk away with the winnings.

"Listen, I only decided to say all this stuff 'cause you decided to," Sorun began. "'Cause I needed someone to get all this stuff out to and you're really the only guy I know who'd take it in stride without having a chance of a heart attack."

It took a few moments for Shadow to respond. He was laying down on the sand like Sorun was. "Hope said it would be good. Doing this."

"Probably."

"..."

"..."

"..."

"Let's never do this again," Sorun suggested.

"Agreed."

Well, there it was. Decision was made. Never to be reversed by any force imaginable no matter how powerful. Sorun wouldn't have it any other way, and he felt Shadow shared the sentiment.

"I'm going to get us back to Mobius, Sorun," Shadow said to him. His voice was growing a bit muffled as Sorun's eyelids began to droop. "You're going home. I'll see it happen."

"I get bragging rights forever if you don't. I'll lord it over you for all time."

"You'll never receive the chance to exercise those rights. I can assure you of that."

There was an air of finality with those words. Like they were objective fact - that he would get them home no matter what. Immutable truth that couldn't be swayed by any force in the universe. And while Sorun didn't really find it true, the words were comforting.

As weird and unnatural comforting words felt coming off that guy of all guys. It was welcome regardless.

"Gonna hold it to you, man..." Sorun mumbled out as he finally drifted off.

Nothing would ever take the couch in the HQ away from its top spot on the list of worst places to sleep. Nothing. That crown would forever be a part of its identity until the end of eternity.

Sand was a close second, though.

It wasn't... bad. Not like his back was scraped raw or anything from sleeping on sand. It didn't feel good, though. It felt like a rock had been rubbed all over him, which, technically, was the truth. He wasn't able to use his coat as a towel to lay on or something because it'd still been drying, so he'd been forced to go bare.

They were dry now, at least. The first thing he'd done after shaking all the sand off of him was put his clothes back on. His second skin - good ol' coat. And all the other stuff. Though he didn't like admitting it he felt vulnerable without the coat.

"He probably ain't gonna feel a damn thing when he wakes up," Sorun thought, eyes glowering down at Shadow. At his fur protecting the delicate skin from the course nightmare that was this beach. "He's got regeneration, too, so it probably wouldn't even matter anyway. Pfft. Some guys get all the lu- huh what?"

When Sorun turned a bit to the side he'd seen something. On the water, next to the beach. Whatever it was it was far enough down the beach that the island itself was obscuring whatever it was, but there was definitely something over there. A... large, blocky white thing. Bobbing up and down in the water. Seeing as Shadow was still sleeping despite it being morning Sorun decided to walk around the island to get a better look at what it was.

He'd done so. Took him a couple minutes of walking to get into a better position to get a good look. And he'd managed to get a good look at what it was.

The blocky thing he'd seen earlier had been the tail-end of a boat. A boat . There was a boat parked next to the island. What looked like a small yacht - about the size of a schooner. He was so surprised at seeing it Sorun was more focused on the fact there was a boat parked next to the island than the fact he even knew what a schooner was.

He blinked. While there was a boat, there were no people in sight. Looking to the left revealed nothing. To the right... still nothing. Nothing but silent sand and trees near-motionless from the mild wind. By all appearances the island was as empty as it was when Sorun and Shadow first washed up here. And yet there was a boat here that wasn't here yesterday.

"Well, uh... um. Huh." Sorun scratched at the side of his face. He didn't know what to think of this. Literally, this particular scenario had never once been considered in his mind and he was struggling what to make of this. "Do we just steal it? We can do that, right?" He cocked his head a bit to the side, considering. "Always kinda wanted to steal a boat, but, hmm... I dunno, this seems like one of those big kind of decisions. Should probably wake Shadow up. Get his take on it."

Yes, that was a good idea. Get another head to think on this so they could come to a rational and informed decision - and to also deflect responsibility onto Shadow in case something goes horribly wrong. It was a great plan.

He went back to the "camp" they'd set up on the beach, which was really just a small fire pit and a bunch of crab husks littered around in the sand. Shadow was still sleeping there. Sorun went to go wake him up, but then spotted the crab leg he'd been playing with last night next to his feet. At the same moment the memory of Shadow splashing water on his face hit him. Sorun bent down and picked th leg up, with a mischievous idea coming to him as he grinned down at Shadow. There was no thinking put into his next action. As if his body moved on its own, with the need to react to this instant impulse he felt.

And so Sorun whipped the crab leg as hard as he could directly in the center of Shadow's face. It bounced off with a meaty thwack! and fell back into the sand, leaving nary a mark on Shadow's face. To the credit of his discipline Shadow didn't so much as stir from his spot. His eyes, however, did instantly snap open, focusing instantly on Sorun. "Explain," he demanded.

Sorun paled a bit. He hadn't thought this far considering mild things like consequences. His mind scrambled for an answer. "There's a boat."

"... Explain further."

"What do you mean, explain further? There's a boat. Parked next to the island. Saw it and came here to wake you up," Sorun informed him. "That's the full extent of the situation."

A sound crossed between a sigh and a grumble left Shadow. He rolled right up to his feet, rolling his shoulders a couple of times as he looked at Sorun, who expected immediate reprisal for the crab leg. Instead, to his surprise, he asked, "The direction of the ship?"

The corner of Sorun's mouth quirked upwards. "Did he... did he just ask for an explanation for waking him up? Did he not even feel me throwing that crab leg?" he wondered. "I feel like he would have brought it up more if... whatever, I guess he was just annoyed at being woken up," he decided, feeling both relief and disappointment at the conclusion. He accepted the dodged bullet and moved on. "That way," he said in answer to Shadow's question, pointing down the beach.

Shadow turned around and scanned the area for a bit. He paused and then nodded, having seen the tail-end of the ship. "I see it," he announced. "Did you investigate the ship? See the pilot?"

"No to both. Saw it and immediately came to you."

"Hm," Shadow hummed out in understanding. He turned his head back halfway to look at Sorun. "I don't see it a likely coincidence somebody just happened to have arrived at this island in time with our arrival. There's no way anybody could have anticipated it. They likely saw the smoke from our fire last night and happened to be near enough to see it, or perhaps even managed to somehow detect our arrival and came to investigate."

"I guess that makes sense, yeah," Sorun said, yawning a bit as he stretched an arm over his head. "Hey, can we steal the boat?"

"..." Shadow's eye narrowed a bit at Sorun, almost in silent admonishment. But then the eye closed fully and he sighed, and the position was held for two seconds before the eye opened back up. "If the operator of the vessel is disagreeable to our needs then yes, Sorun, we may appropriate it."

"Cool." That basically meant they could steal the boat. He had approval now. "You think they have any water in there, man, 'cause-"

"'Ello, 'ello!"

Both Sorun and Shadow had different reactions to the third voice. Shadow's head snapped to the direction of the new voice, eyes narrowed and body tensed. Sorun froze on the spot without even turning around, eyebrows knitted in confusion as he tried to place that accent he just heard. He managed it and only grew more confused. "Why does... how is there an Australian accent here?"

Maybe that was a stupid question. One he realized when he remembered Southern accents survived the super alien apocalypse back in Mobius. Or how by some miracle everyone in the multiverse spoke English. These things just happened somehow. Better not to question it and just turn around so he could see who was speaking.

Aaaand then he had to look down because the person was short. He realized why upon seeing her - she was just a kid. Probably as young as Tails, if not younger. A Mobian, who, against belief, wore a green not-shirt top thing in addition to Mobian Standard. And black... shorts. Huh, pants. Rare. The only thing he couldn't place was what kind of Mobian she was, between the orange and white fur, the dark rings of fur around her eyes, and the bushy tail with the dark rings in it.

Some kind of rodent thing... a mink? Ferret? Some obscure animal he'd never heard of before? Couldn't be a possum with that tail. He couldn't put his finger on it. Sorun decided not to ask and just let her continue speaking, because she'd opened her mouth to continue.

"Oh, wowzers! Ain't you two lookin' right chipper?" She stepped closer to Shadow, looking him up and down with bright blue eyes. He took a step back with a look of slight disgust on his face, like he wanted to throw the thing invading his personal space as far away as possible. "Lookin' downright sinister with those stripes, ain'tcha? And you!" She looked at Sorun. He felt violated from her gaze. "You're pale enough to pass as a lovin' ghost from the briny deep! Wha' happen to all your fur, huh? Dinn't get washed away by the tide, did it?"

"Sorun, what is this?" Shadow asked. His tensed posture had relaxed slightly and he looked over at Sorun for help.

"I think it's a child," Sorun answered, completely straight-faced and yet sounding unsure as he looked at the rodent Mobian. She was looking back and forth between them, following the conversation. Still smiling like a toddler who'd just found a shiny marble.

Shadow frowned at Sorun. "I know she's a child, you fool, I'm asking what's she's saying. Translate."

Sorun looked at Shadow. "Huh? I don't know, man, I didn't understand half of that. I was hoping you were getting it."

Hearing that, Shadow flinched. And now he himself looked unsure as he looked back at the child. "What should we do with her?"

Sorun shrugged. "I don't know. You're not suggesting we take her with us, are you?" he asked him. "What if she gets hungry? I'm not giving her any of the crabs, Shadow. Those our my crabs."

"Our crabs. Of which there are none left."

"You seriously ate all the...?" Sorun cut himself off and shook his head to get back on track. "Whatever, listen, she might know more about the boat. Try conversing with her."

"I will try." Shadow didn't sound confident at the prospect, and looked even more unsure when he looked back down at her. She looked like she was holding in a laugh for some reason, though neither of the two could fathom why. "Child," Shadow began.

"Yeah, mate, what is it?" the child asked back.

"I don't imagine one of your stature piloted a vessel of that size to an island in the middle of nowhere," Shadow said. "Where is the captain of that vessel back there?"

"Imaginin' wrong then, mate. That there's my ship."

"You're the captain." Shadow didn't sound like he believed her. Sorun had a hard time believing himself - not without seeing a captain's hat.

The hatless girl just smiled and nodded her head in response. "Yup, yup!"

"Okay..." Shadow breathed out slightly, like he was trying to maintain his composure. "Since I'm skeptical anybody would let a child captain a ship into the ocean, I'll ask this: is there somebody else here besides you?"

She seemed exuberant in giving an explanation. Shadow looked anything but, and Sorun wasn't far behind him. "Oh, roight, roight, that'll be Blaze you'll be speakin' about, mate! See, me an' her were sailing 'round the bend, lookin' for some mystical some-such or another when we spotted your smokestack from way out by far! We docked the moment dawn broke out past the horizon, then she goes on flabbin' 'bout some nonsense, tellin' me to stay aboard 'cause there could be a scrap or some nonsense. I weren't gonna stand for such an insult an' went out anyways, found you two chums chattin' right here!"

This was the first time Sorun had ever seen Shadow so exhausted. Like he was devoting his all into trying to follow the conversation but just wasn't managing. It was made even worse that it was the middle of the morning and he'd just woken up. In a gesture of defeat he rose his hands up to rub at the ridges of his eyes, and though he looked like he wanted to, the hedgehog's pride refused him to emit a sigh.

There was one thing, though, that Sorun picked out. A single word the child said. "Blaze". He didn't know why but it felt like something twinged in the back of his brain hearing that word. Like it poked at a memory that didn't exist, because the significance was completely lost on Sorun.

"Sorun, the only information I gleaned from all that is that there's a second person somewhere," Shadow grumbled out. He sounded like he was in physical pain.

"Does this mean we're not stealing the boat?" They definitely could. Children weren't that tough. At least not to Shadow.

Shadow looked like he wanted to yell, but managed to refrain. "Stay. Stay here. With the child. I'm going to survey the island for the second one, and then we will discuss what to do."

"I don't believe that will be necessary."

Oh, another new voice. And one that sounded older and infinitely more coherent, to boot. That fact alone was probably the only reason Shadow laconically turned towards the new voice instead of being hyper-alert like he had been the first time. Sorun paused first - again, there was that tingle - but then he quickly wrote it off once more while he turned to look at the voice.

"Oh wow. Clothes." It was a sight beyond imagining. It was seldom... seldom ... Sorun ever saw a Mobian that wore more than Mobian Standard. Even more rare he'd see a Mobian with pants, which was why he'd been so surprised with the girl. Seldom enough he could count the amount of Mobians he knew that wore more than just a pair of gloves and shoes on his hands.

This one had everything - and style to boot. Shoes. Form-fitting white pants - pants of all things, he could barely believe it - the white gloves, of course, and... what Sorun would admit was a fairly fly purple coat. The kind of coat the looked uncomfortably expensive, but not in a vain way. The weird tails on the sides of the coat and the white faux fur along the coat's cuffs looked regal in a way, but the otherwise minimalistic design and how tight-fitting the coat was suggested an air of practicality. This was both a coat that showed status and a coat that was meant for more than just show. A coat that was to be used .

Without a doubt. This was the most important person in this world. The coat said it all, and Sorun made it known.

"Shadow, this person is the most important person in the world," Sorun said, turning towards the hedgehog.

Glancing at Sorun, Shadow looked all but lost at that statement. Confused at how he'd arrived to such a conclusion. "What makes you say this?"

"Her coat," Sorun answered, because how much simpler an answer could he provide?

Confusion turned to hard skepticism. "What?" He sounded so done by now it was turning into something beyond annoyance.

"Her coat," Sorun repeated, pointing at the purple coat-wearer. Was it not obvious? How could he not see? "That's the coat of an important person who gets things done. A coat that demands respect of everyone who looks at it. Nobodies don't wear coats like that, Shadow." He thumbed at the shoulder of his own coat as proof of knowledge. "I'm a coat guy, Shadow. I know these things." And he'd also been spending too much time around Honey.

But he didn't even think it needed explaining it was so obvious. The logic was there. The evidence was standing right there in front of their eyes, and Sorun had assumed no further proof was needed. This was primarily the reason why, after Shadow responded, Sorun ended up freezing on the spot in disbelief.

"I'm ignoring you for the rest of this conversation," he announced, completely turning away from Sorun to face the newcomer - the one with the coat. Sorun was rendered speechless. Disbelief fell away into betrayal at his counsel not being taken. Betrayal morphed into anticipation for when this stranger finally revealed who she was. Revealed that she was , in fact, important, thereby proving Sorun was right. It was but an inevitability. All one needed was a single glance at that coat to be assured of this. He just needed patience.

Speaking of the coat-wearer, Sorun just now realized he didn't actually look at her face. He looked towards it, and... yep. Without a doubt. She was a cat Mobian. 'Bout as old as Sorun, looked like. The cat-like tail swishing behind her was a big enough tell, but the ears cinched it. The fact her fur was purple aside from the white fur around her mouth was another matter.

For a single moment Sorun's brows furrowed. He was believing Nicole less and less about her saying purple Mobian lynxes weren't a thing. This was two purple cats he'd found now.

She caught his staring, blinking a pair of amber eyes at his while turning to face Sorun directly. Her expression was neutral for the most part, the corners of her mouth downturned ever so slightly though her eyes were alit with a small bit of curiosity. There was something about the way she was standing, though. It seemed relaxed, but there was... something beneath it. A type of tenseness, one that, after a moment's deliberation, Sorun realized was the same kind of tenseness Shadow displayed when the child-thing first revealed herself. Much more subdued, though. Not nearly as aggressive.

This was a person ready to jump into a fight at a moment's notice while seeming to keep a cool head. Rummaging around in his memories he realized Sally often held that exact same demeanor, back when they'd worked together and had gone on a few missions. Was she an important person, then? Politically-speaking? Like her? It would explain the coat. And that red gem in her face. A little red, shining bead, right there between her eyes. Very regal-looking and more credence towards Sorun's accurate observation of her. That and the way her hair was tied upwards the way it was. Shadow must have noticed something, too, because he was giving the purple cat his full attention and not even so much as glancing as the little gremlin standing off to the side.

"Is something the matter?" the cat asked Sorun. "You seem to be staring."

Sorun froze; his voice choked in his throat. When she'd spoken to him, addressed him directly, there was... a violently unpleasant feeling. The entire left side of his body itched in an almost painful manner, though the sensation had disappeared nearly as soon as he'd noticed it. His right hand reflexively clenched, searching for a sword that wasn't there. Anxiety swelled in Sorun as something instinctual screamed out at him from within.

Evidently his distress must have been visible on his face, because the cat Mobian had taken a step back. A bit of concern leaked out onto her features. "Oh, my apologies. I had not meant to startle you." She quickly looked to Shadow. "Is he alright?"

"No. Who are you?" Shadow demanded, outright ignoring Sorun. The cat was entirely in his focus as he continued to speak. "We saw your vessel parked off the beach back there. I highly doubt you just happened upon us, so what is your purpose here?"

The feeling cut off as soon as it began. Sorun blinked in confusion, looking down at his right hand. "What was I doing just now?" he wondered, flexing his empty hand. Something to do about the cat? He looked up at her again...

"... Oh, right, the purple lynx thing." He wasn't sure. Maybe Nicole was right but it was only a rule that applied in Mobius Prime. They were in a different world, after all. Hard to say if such a thing was a universal constant.

The purple cat relaxed when she seemed to notice the change in Sorun's demeanor. The thoughtful yet-slightly-questioning look he had on as he sort of just stared off into space past her. She turned to address Shadow. "In answer to your previous question, my name is Blaze. This," she continued, gesturing to the nearby child, "is my friend, Marine."

The child looked up from the tower of crab husks she'd begun stacking up out of boredom. "Oi, get the full name out there! It's Captain Marine the Raccoon-"

"Goddammit I could have guessed raccoon."

"-to you all and don't you be forgettin' it!"

Blaze's response was cup her face with one hand in a vain attempt at shielding the secondhand embarrassment clearly on her face while cupping the elbow of that arm with her other hand. "Yes, she gets very enthusiastic, please excuse her," she quickly apologized.

She glanced at Sorun. "And... your friend was quite accurate about his earlier assessment, as it happens. In regards to my position."

"We're not friends," Shadow swiftly rebuked. "And what is that supposed to mean? You're..." His eyes quickly scanned over her outfit. Sorun nearly scoffed; he'd obviously abandoned that truth a while ago if he hadn't taken stock in the coat. "A government official of some kind?"

Blaze's hand lowered from her face. She seemed a bit amused. "Of a certain sort, yes. I'm a princess, though the title is a bit of a misnomer, I'm afraid. I'm in fact the sovereign ruler."

"Ah-huh." Sorun nodded rapidly a few times while, at the same time, slowly turning towards Shadow. "Uh-huh, uh-huh, uh-huh..."

Shadow made a "tch" sound. "Be silent. Her being a ruler doesn't make her the most important person on the planet," he ground out, not even bothering to look at Sorun. "Ruler of what? A nation? A coalition of nations?"

"The planet."

There it was. Victory. Sweet, sweet victory. No words needed to be said by Sorun, though there was no wiping away the shit-eating grin he was flashing towards Shadow. Vindication. His body surged with the emotion as the epitome of smugness itself spread over his entire being.

For his part Shadow seemed to be doing his best to pretend Sorun didn't even exist at the moment. His mouth had clamped firmly shut and he was doing everything he could to maintain a level expression while staring at Blaze, who seemed to be smiling in amusement at the sight before her. There was no hiding the smaller signs, though. The twinge of his jaw. The hard expression in his eyes. That little vein on his forehead that was bulging, nearly invisible from the fur concealing it.

Sorun had won. There was no need to announce it and Shadow would never acknowledge it. But he'd won. And they both knew it. That's all Sorun needed.

"... Your purpose ." Oh, Shadow was salty about the loss. That nearly came out as a growl. "What business do you have with us?"

Coming from somebody like Shadow that kind of tone would send most people cowering in fear, even people who didn't know who or what he was. He had that effect on people. It'd washed completely over Blaze, however. The smile she'd wore had fallen off completely as she seemed to turn into "all business" mode, but she didn't seem the least bit intimidated.

"Marine and I have been on the search for objects of extreme importance to both myself and every denizen of this world," she began. "Yesterday I had felt a disturbance of sorts and we had arrived here to investigate. We'd seen your campfire and decided to wait until morning to make contact. And now I'd very much like to know who you two are and what you're doing here." There was an air of disappointment in her voice. That they'd been found instead of whatever she'd been looking for. At the same time she seemed genuinely intrigued at the pair standing before her, and Sorun couldn't help but take every word she said as truth to heart. She practically radiated politeness.

"Trade you that story for a boat ride," Sorun offered before Shadow could speak. He'd looked like he was about to tell Sorun off, even seemed a bit annoyed, but after hearing the actual words he appeared mollified and went back to looking at Blaze. "We're super stuck here. 'Cast Away' style."

Blaze gave him an odd look, tilting her head the smallest bit and appearing unsure as to what to say to that. Marine seemed doubly confused. Shadow just sighed.

"Ignore him," he requested. "He's recovering from a bout of delirium brought on by consuming psychoactive flora. I'm not confident he's regained all his senses."

Oh, Sorun saw what he was doing. He wasn't discounting his win with such a cheap move like that. "I'm the most coherent person you'll ever meet, don't listen to this guy," Sorun denied. He looked at Shadow. "And that stuff didn't even last an hour, what are you talking about?"

"... Delirium?" Blaze interjected, drawing both their attention. "From what?"

"The mushrooms," Sorun answered. He glanced down at his feet in embarrassment. "I, uh... I was really hungry. I didn't know the local plants were bad."

"The only species of mushroom I'm aware of to flourish in this environment are the white-capped... do you mean the mushrooms with the blue stems?" Blaze asked. He didn't like how she sounded so puzzled.

"Y-yeah?" No. Not again. Please. He just rode so high from getting one over on Shadow please don't say that-

"Are you sure?" Blaze asked. "Many Maritimers credit that particular species to be an excellent ingredient in many culinary recipes. I myself have partaken in them. I've never met a single person in my entire life who have claimed to have suffered some sort of adverse side effect from them. They're supposed to be completely harmless."

Sorun didn't answer. He couldn't. Not while under assault from such a crushing amount of shame. It was bad enough he nearly sank to his knees, but, somehow, he managed to stand tall. If slightly slumped forwards.

Shadow apparently took pity on Sorun and tried to come to his rescue. In his own way. "His kind have a weak constitution. It's not his fault," he said to Blaze. She nodded in understanding. "But back to the previous matter, yes. We would greatly appreciate rescue and would be more than willing to apprise you of our situation in return."

"That sounds more than agreeable to me." Blaze smiled over at the both of them. Sorun nearly fell with relief, embarrassment all but forgotten, while Shadow simply nodded. "Well, then, shall we leave now?"

A/N- Listen. Just listen. I had to put him in at least once and the only way I could do it and make it believable was if it was in a drug sequence.

I have literally no experiencing writing an accent like Marine's. Part of me wants to have her get accidentally stabbed in the throat and make her mute so I don't have to bother, but that'd be the coward's way out. So I'll deal.

Chapter 97

Recursion Error

Episode 97- We will not go back

What else was there to do but gab while out on the high seas? Nothing, that's what.

"-and it wasn't like 'Black Flag' was a bad game, it was just a bad 'Assassin's Creed' game, Shadow. Yeah, sure, they refined the ship combat from the last game and made a great pirate game but after they went and killed Desmond the overall plot of the games took a nosedive, because what did they expect would happen when they killed off the main character? After they spent five games building him up? We had one- god, man, we only had one cool moment with Desmond at the end of the fifth one when he raided the Abstergo tower and it would have made a great coming-of-age thing, but no, nah, we can't have our modern-day game and cap off the series, it's gotta be a annual release now and we gotta keep milking this thing for all it's worth. So they kept chugging them out and the games kept getting worse and worse in quality. And then 'Unity' came out, and you know what, once you got past the bugs, the forty-gig patch they had to ship out, and the middling story, there was actually a good parkour system there. Best in the series. I'd argue it was the most fun one to play, and I dared to hope, Shadow, that maybe Ubisoft finally learned something and we could get the series back on track.

"But nope, uh-uh, they didn't learn a thing. Just when they finally polished a good parkour system they threw it all away with 'Origins'. Idiots decided they needed to reinvent the wheel and fix what wasn't broken, to add a bunch of RPG elements nobody asked for and make it an absolute grindfest with-with microtransaction experience boosters. And they stuck with it. They decided this dreck was a winning formula and decided to stick with it going forwards with all the games after it. I couldn't even touch them. I'll never forgive the French for what they did to 'Assassin's Creed'."

At the very front of the ship that had rescued them from the island stood Sorun, who was leaning against a guardrail and looking out at the sea. Shadow was standing besides him in the exact same position. Looking down in the water with an exhausted expression while looking like he was contemplating jumping in.

A weary sigh left the hedgehog. "All I did was comment on the figurehead," he mumbled to himself, glancing up at the bird-shaped figurehead mounted at the front of the ship. He'd made a comment on it and Sorun had said how it reminded him of a ship from a video game. And then twenty minutes filled with words passed.

He was tired.

Sorun was anything but; fired up when he was reminded of what was stolen from humanity. What had once been great and how it had been perverted by corporate greed like most things on Earth. It riled him up something fierce just thinking about it.

"Why did you even have games where you played as assassins?" Shadow mumbled out.

"Dude, we had games about literally everything," Sorun answered. "It's escapism. Art in an interactive format. And, you know, some people just wanted to live a power fantasy of running around on rooftops and stabbing a hundred guys in a historical setting, it was super normal where I'm from."

Shadow lifted his head up and looked at Sorun like he'd just accrued major brain damage. "I find it horrifying you're the standard to judge your whole species since you're the only one left. I don't know if you were normal compared to the rest of your kind or if you're some extreme outlier."

"Heh, yeah." They both turned around to lean their backs against the railing. The raccoon child was over at the helm steering the ship through the waters. The purple cat girl, Blaze, was standing next to her. Both were staring at them.

"What's your impression of them?" Some life seemed to return back to Shadow's face as the topic shifted. It resulted in Sorun momentarily glancing at him and scoffing before he replied.

"Blaze seems like a straight shooter. Got a real honest vibe outta her," Sorun admitted. "Marie, I dunno, she seems like the kinda person that'll steal my socks when I'm not looking. Real wild card."

Shadow frowned. "I thought the raccoon's name was Mary?"

Sorun shrugged. It made Shadow puff out a small sigh and shake his head. "Well, regardless, I agree with your sentiment. Minus the sock bit. That's nonsense. But they seem trustworthy enough."

"Yeah. You think we should tell Blaze about the Metal Sonic thing?"

"I think we should tell the ruler of the planet there's a dangerous robot running around her domain, yes," Shadow blandly replied, voice utterly dry. "It will reflect poorly on us if we keep such information to ourselves and we owe her for the rescue."

That was a really good point, and Sorun nodded in agreement. He saw movement and noticed the two Mobians were making their way towards them. Blaze appeared to be completely relaxed, but the way her eyes were continually locked onto the both of them said enough. The raccoon girl was just smiling with an easy-going expression.

He really had to try and remember her name. It for sure started with an "M", he was certain of that.

Blaze was the first one to speak when the both of them stopped in front of Sorun and Shadow. "Well, we're headed off to the nearest island to make port. We should arrive within the next ten minutes."

"That would be acceptable, thank you," Shadow said. "Is there someone we could talk to in order to arrange transport to the mainland once we've arrived?" He blinked in confusion when Blaze let out a chuckle. Sorun did the same. "What is it?"

"There is no mainland in this world," Blaze informed them. "This world is entirely comprised of islands interspersed throughout the ocean covering it. Whatever you've come for, you'll find no better help anywhere else than you'll find in the Southern Island." She crossed her arms, attention entirely focusing in on Shadow. "And now that we're here I'd like you to tell me who the both of you are like we agreed."

Sorun and Shadow exchanged glances. To the Earthling the news this was a planet comprised of nothing but islands washed right off his back; he'd seen weirder by now. He wanted to make a "One Piece" reference, too, but he sensed that Shadow would grow annoyed at it so he kept his mouth shut. Would have felt rude since none of them would even know what he's talking about anyways. Shadow himself didn't look very surprised at the news, either. Either that or he simply just didn't care, which was more likely than anything else. He gave Sorun a nod - he wasn't even sure what that was supposed to mean - and turned back to Blaze to speak.

"Introductions, then. My name is Shadow the Hedgehog," he began. The raccoon girl seemed amused at the name, even went as far as to laugh a bit, making Shadow send her a sharp glare. It just made her laugh harder and made Blaze sigh a bit.

Sorun rose a hand up. "I'm Sorun the Human." He internally flinched. Saying that gave a weird taste in his mouth he didn't like. "Ooh, that sounds... yeah, I dunno, uh, can, can I do that? Is that a thing I can say or is that a Mobian-only thing?" He glanced at Shadow. "Is it okay to add the 'the Human' part, everyone else does it so I thought-
"

"If you value my opinion at all I don't think you should," Shadow said. "I don't even like doing it. I was just told it was a social norm and would help put others at ease. It's ridiculous. Anybody with eyes and a functioning brain can tell what species someone is at a glance."

"... Mhm." Sorun quickly cleared his throat and turned back to the pair. "Yeah okay that's- alright, uh, Sorun, I'm just Sorun," he tried again. His stomach dropped a bit and he had to repress a groan - the raccoon child looked like she was silently laughing at him and even Blaze was hiding a smile behind her hand it looked like. A smile paired with a pitying, if not amused, set of eyes. The embarrassment served to be too much and he was forced to turn completely around to look back at the ocean.

Once again Shadow came to his rescue, because he heard him began talking with Blaze once again. That was good. He could handle all the serious talk and maybe they'd all forget what just happened. All Sorun had to do was stand here and lean against a guardrail as he stared out at the ocean.

He felt a bit of wetness drip out of his nose. He rose up his fingers to wipe it away, and when he pulled his fingers back he saw they were splotched with crimson. He somehow instinctively knew that it wasn't due to the sea air his nose was bleeding.

"Son of a bitch," he worriedly thought out, wiping the blood away on his pants. He wiped at his face again, and while it wasn't bringing him much relief at the moment, the bleeding appeared to stop. He turned his ear back to the conversation happening besides him, if only to try and help distract himself.

"-and so after aiding us Tails had built a ship-"

"With my help."

"With your help, yes, Marine, to take himself and Sonic back to their own world," Blaze had finished off. Sorun's interest piqued enough that he fully turned back around to address them.

"Those two found themselves in this world?" Sorun asked her. "How'd that happen?"

"We never did discover the true cause. Tails had chalked it up to a freak accident involving Chaotic energies," Blaze admitted. "A Chaos Emerald from their world had somehow wound up in ours. They'd left it to me when they departed back to their own zone."

Sorun's brows knitted together. "Huh? I must have missed that adventure, I don't..." He looked to Shadow for help. "Was this before they all got fused together into the main seven? 'Cause I wasn't there for that."

He shrugged in response. "I assume. I wasn't present for this either."

"Alright." Mini Chaos Emerald, then. He looked back at Blaze. "Why'd Sonic leave it to you?"

It was the first time since meeting her Sorun had seen Blaze frown. No, it was more than that: it was a strange mixture between annoyance and worry. "In truth he did it as a personal favor to me. You see, within this world are seven gems of extraordinary power, not unlike the Chaos Emeralds you spoke of. They're known as the Sol Emeralds." She looked to the side, face bitter. "They're somewhat lost at the moment. Sonic let me keep the Emerald that fell into our world to help locate them."

"This is, what, the third set of magical rocks now? Why is this such a thing?" Sorun silently wondered to himself. "The Sol Emeralds?" he repeated. "Like the sun? Sun Emeralds?"

Blaze looked back at him, eyes a bit widened. She looked pleasantly surprised for some weird reason. "Yes, precisely." She smiled at him. "I'm impressed. I'd thought the translations for that ancient language were lost to time. I'd only ever gleaned the word's true meaning from texts in my personal library."

"It's... a pretty common word from where I'm from," he said, a bit hesitant. "... Do they just not have solar panels here? It's a common word even on Mobius."

"From Mobius Prime?"

"Nah, uh, not from there. It's a long story," Sorun said. "So how important are these Sol Emeralds?"

The cat's face turned gravely serious near-instantly. "Extremely so. Those gems are intrinsically tied to the very stability of this world. If they remain separated for too long it will lead to apocalyptic results. The sky will fall, the seas will boil, the islands dotting the planet will crumble and be lost to the roiling see. Every single inhabitant on this planet will perish." Her faced scrunched up into a shameful look. It was strong enough it even made Sorun uncomfortable. "As the ruler of this world it's my responsibility to oversee their safekeeping. I've been devoting all my time into locating them ever since they were lost."

"Oh. Geez..." It was, admittedly, a much more serious-sounding situation than he'd anticipated. Sorun breathed outwards and rubbed at the back of his neck to try and relieve the sheer intimidation that description alone had given him. That sounded like an unfathomable amount of pressure to be put under. He could relate and didn't envy her in the slightest. "That's tough, Blaze."

She let out a humorless laugh. "Yes. I suppose it is."

"If these gems are so important how did you end up losing them all in the first place?" Shadow asked. If the explanation fazed him any amount he wasn't showing it in the slightest.

Blaze's expression changed again at hearing the question. It was a brief flash of anger. Not directed at Shadow, as it'd faded moments later, but as if reviewing a memory in her head caused her great distress. "I don't wish to discuss it." She calmed down seconds later, expression relaxing as she continued with, "At any rate, with the help of the Chaos Emerald Sonic left to me I've been able to locate a few of the Sol Emeralds, thankfully. It's with those I should be able to locate the remainder. With that in mind, once this Metal Sonic incident is taken care of and in the event you're unable to use this zone-traversing engine of its to travel back to your own home, I wouldn't be opposed to giving the Emerald to you two."

"Wow, really?" Sorun nearly jumped off the railing he'd been leaning against when he heard that. "You'll just give it to us for free? No strings? Nothin'? Just like that?"

"I was planning on it?" Blaze had taken a step backwards, seemingly off-put by Sorun's surprise. "You need it more than I do and I have no further use for it anyhow. I've no problem handing it to you in return for helping solve the issue with this rampaging machine. We've enough of those here as it is."

Sorun barely had the words. That was just... so nice of her. He guessed he shouldn't be so surprised by now, but still, it was a pleasant feeling. "Wow. Uh. Thank you." Sorun rubbed at the back of his neck. "That, uh, that's real nice, Blaze, thanks."

"Yes, we're in your debt," Shadow impatiently interrupted, "now is that the island we're supposed to be making port in?"

Sorun turned around. Right in front of them was, in fact, an island. There wasn't much to say about it other than the large lighthouse in front of it. The right side of the island was raised up into a large hill atop which a tower was sitting, and on the left side was a more flatter area filled with houses and the like. Looked nice enough. Except for the fact some of the houses were on fire.

He heard a sharp intake of breath besides him, and then heard a peculiar sound. Soft snapping and crackling sounds, like the kind heard at a campfire, but much quieter. He looked towards the noise and found the source to be Blaze's hands, tightly clenched. He'd thought for a second he'd just misheard and it was just the sound of her gloves clenching tightly, but then he'd seen the fiery sparks sputtering out from between her closed fingers. He understood instantly.

"Pyrokinetic, huh? That's a new one. Probably shoulda figured with that name." She seemed angry. Both in the way she was standing, her hands clenched like that, and her face. When he looked up he saw Blaze's yellow eyes locked onto the smokestacks rising up from the center of the island, and she looked absolutely livid at the moment. Eyes widened and teeth clenched in rage. He found himself unconsciously taking a few steps away from her, both from that look and the fact it suddenly felt a few degrees warmer.

"Yes. That would be the Southern Island." When Blaze spoke it sounded like she was forcing her voice out through clenched teeth. Like she was so angry that the muscles in her throat were strained with raw anger. Sorun took a few more steps back. "And no, it is not supposed to be on fire."

Shadow made an affirming grunt. "I'd figured. It appears Metal Sonic beat us here."

"That or the pirates I've been dealing with. It's ending now either way." Blaze's eyes snapped down to Marine. Even she'd began to look a bit nervous at how angry Blaze seemed to be right now. "Marine, please take us in through the gate. We're taking care of this right now."

"Roight." She gave her a brisk nod and scampered off towards the ship's steering wheel, earlier smiles all gone. Sorun watched her run off, and then turned towards a large pair of gates on the front of the island. They were slowly beginning to open already as they made their approach.

Sorun sighed tiredly as he leaned back against the guardrail. "I just wanted to deliver a pizza, man..."

They'd wasted no time once the moment the ship had been parked in the island's port. What that really meant was that Blaze wasted no time and the other three were forced to run alongside her as she bolted straight towards the screams of people in the distance, that angered, determined look permanently etched on her face. Even Shadow seemed mildly impressed with how quick she'd been booking it. Sorun was more or less focused on just keeping up with the group.

After the small marathon they'd ended up on the edge of a tall, grassy hill that crested over what looked like the village near the island's beach seen earlier; at the edge of the grassy hill was a sheer rock cliff that fell down for around a dozen or so meters before hitting the ground. The damage in the village, admittedly, didn't look so bad up close. Not many of the houses were damaged and the fires were mainly in the surroundings. Panting while holding his knees, Sorun noted there wasn't a sight of bodies lying in the street - that was a good sign.

The not-so-good sign was that Metal Sonic was standing smack-dab in the middle of the devastation, holding up what looked like a koala Mobian in overalls up by the throat. When Blaze had seen the sight he'd heard a quiet growl sound out from the back of her throat. And her hands were completely on fire now.

"This is utterly unacceptable...!" Those were the only words Blaze decided to speak before she'd rocketed off. Literally. Yellow-orange flames violently spewed from her hands and the force was seemingly sufficient enough to propel Blaze off the cliff. She was flying directly towards the robot and the koala it was choking out.

Sorun coughed a bit when he accidentally inhaled some of the hot air left over. He looked to the side and saw Shadow staring off at her, looking a bit surprised. He was holding a hand out in her general direction.

"... I was hoping to have a few words with her, first," he muttered out as he retracted his hand.

Sorun shook his head. "Yeah, I don't think she was gonna wait for-ohhhh !"

It was possibly one of the most magnificent things Sorun had ever seen in his whole goddamn life. There'd Blaze been, propelled by the jets of flames bursting out of her hands like some kind of purple cat rocket, straight on a collision course for Metal Sonic. He didn't know what she was gonna do: either go for a punch of some kind or try shooting fire. Something along those degrees.

He never would have expected in a million years that, right before impact, she'd flip around midair so that her now fire-coated feet were in line to kick the robot right in the face. A textbook dropkick Sorun had only ever had the pleasure of performing once in his life personally. But not to that degree. Not with all that fire, the presentation. He couldn't help but hold his head with both of his hands at the sheer splendor. It was the coolest implementation of that move he'd ever been witness to.

It would have been even cooler if the attack had actually landed. It didn't. Metal Sonic had evidently seen her coming and, in one fluid movement, had thrown away the koala it'd been holding up while turning its body and leaning slightly to the side to avoid Blaze's dropkick. After whiffing the kick she'd slid a short distance across the sand before coming to a standstill in front of Metal Sonic. The look she was giving it looked like she was trying to melt it with her smoldering gaze alone. For all Sorun knew she probably could if she tried hard enough.

"I'm so fucking sad that missed." The disappoint Sorun had felt in the followed moment was overwhelming, so much so his hands slid off his head. He could have cried right there if he weren't surrounded by others. Slowly, with the movements of a man who'd just had all the joy in life sucked out of him, Sorun turned towards Shadow, whose eyes were affixed on the brewing fight below. "What were you gonna tell her, anyways?" The words had come out empty, somewhat. As if robbed of life. It would take a bit of time to rediscover the meaning of his own life after being deprived such a glorious sight.

Shadow's eyes flickered to Sorun. "Tactical advice. A warning on not trying to talk with Metal."

"Nobody does a dropkick like that if they wanna talk, Shadow." He still couldn't believe it'd missed. "What makes you think something like that was even possible?"

"... I'd attempted it," Shadow muttered in admittance. "Before you'd been roped into the fight in that castle. Its AI is more sophisticated than most of the Doctor's Badniks and having worked under him in the past, I'd... I'd just thought maybe it'd see reason like I did." He looked back to the village. The two fighters were already going at it. "It's beyond reasoning. Content at being a weapon. It's better for everyone if it's decommissioned right here."

Sorun made a scoff. "I could've saved you the time and told you that. It's an evil robot."

The hedgehog glanced back at Sorun. "I'd have thought you of all people would be more considering of AI with-"

"Shadow that thing's tried to kill me three times by now."

"... Fair point."

Words, said, the two focused back on the fight, with Marine watching alongside them. Sorun bit back a worried groan when he saw it was going rather poorly for Blaze. She was giving it her all, there was no doubt about that. Practically half the beach was covered with fire now, with more streams of the stuff constantly pouring off her limbs. He could see what she was going for: she'd learned extremely quickly that Metal Sonic was flat-out faster than her and was trying to deny it area of movement. Laying down fire hazards everywhere to limit where it could go, maybe try and bait it into prime position so she could attack then.

But it wasn't working. In fact, Metal Sonic didn't seem to even acknowledge any of her flames because it was simply moving through them. The roaring hot flames weren't leaving so much as a singe mark as they kept lapping at the machine's chassis. The blue paint wasn't even being melted off. The fire simply wasn't doing anything.

Credit to Blaze, she saw how ineffectual the strategy was and changed it up. She'd tried throwing what were likely fireballs, but quite honestly they'd moved so fast through the air they looked more like bolts to Sorun's eyes more than anything else. The machine dodged them effortlessly and the flaming bolts violently exploded behind it, leaving wide craters. Ranged was completely out; she went in to melee range for physical attacks.

She was... extremely creative with the fire powers, that much was clear to Sorun. He'd only known her a short time but the display of talent was obvious. The way the punches and kicks flowed together seamlessly. The jets of fire blasting out of her limbs adding to her momentum, movement uninterrupted and leaving behind trails of flame as the cat ceaselessly and unrelenting just kept attacking without pause. It almost looked more like a dance than a string of fighting moves on fire flowing endlessly into each other, so quickly to Sorun's eyes it was practically a blur. It was almost beautiful.

It was also completely ineffectual. Fact of the matter was Metal Sonic was just that much faster and not a single hit Blaze was throwing out was landing. Whether it be from moving its body the bare minimum amount to dodge the hits or firing the engine on its torso up so that its entire body could zoom near-instantly behind Blaze to try and deliver a hit, only for it to be narrowly dodged, nothing was working. And while Blaze wasn't slowing down in the slightest, didn't even appeared to be tired, Sorun doubted she had the endless stamina a machine had.

"... This is a really bad matchup for Blaze," Sorun muttered out in observation. "Nicole told me once that thing is outfitted with a tungsten-carbide alloy chassis. It's completely fire-resistant and it's too fast for her to actually hit." He looked to Shadow. "I mean you had trouble fighting this thing and when I tried a long time ago I couldn't even scratch it."

"Yes, those were my thoughts as well," Shadow agreed. "She needs help."

"Alright, great!" Sorun reached over and smacked Shadow on the back of his shoulder. It wasn't done hard enough to make him even flinch, though he'd still thrown a questioning look over at Sorun's way as a result. "Good luck, man, I'll be rooting for you."

"You're not coming?"

The big grin Sorun had been wearing for a second was replaced by a flat look. "With what powers? I'll be killed in a second down there. This is all you."

The only response Shadow deigned to give him was a roll of his eyes before vanishing in a flash of light. After his next blink Sorun saw that he was already down there, fighting alongside Blaze. It was good enough for him; he was pretty much dead weight here and he was fine not getting in the middle of that.

Nope, there was just no way. None. He was content to sit right up here on this hill and watch the fight. Maybe see some sick sights, far away and safe from all that fire and those explosions and people moving faster than he could see. Sorun wasn't having any of that. He was sitting right here.

"Oi, what is this!?" Sorun flinched when he heard that high-pitched voice go off in his ear once he actually did sit down. He looked to its source and was reminded of the raccoon girl that was with them. The one currently crossing her arms and frowning at him. "What, you're just gonna sit up here on your haunches while e'ryone else does all the fightin'!?"

"Yes. Exactly," Sorun unashamedly said, nodding his head. "Look, Mar... M, Big M, listen, see that?" He pointed down towards the fight.

Towards Shadow and Metal blitzing past each other doing who knows what because Sorun couldn't make it out. "You probably can but I sure can't. Know what that tells me? It tells me I'm gonna get cut in half if I get clipped by the smallest thing." He looked back at raccoon girl. "Like literally, I can't see them moving. It's just a bunch of blurs I can't make out."

Specifically a blue blur, a black and red blur, and in Blaze's case it was less a purple blur and more a vaguely cat-shaped rocket covered in fire flying around. She was the only one he could actually make out because she didn't have the sheer fuck-off speed the other two had. But that's essentially what this fight looked like to him. A bunch of colors flitting around one another, throwing up sand and whatever else was in their path as they moved. It was the kind of fight completely imperceptible to the human eye. And as far as Sorun concerned that meant he needed to stay the hell away.

Apparently raccoon-whose-name-began-with-an-M wasn't as convinced. "Yeah, well... fine, y'might have a point there, mate, but I ain't gonna be sittin' 'ere doin' nothing while Blaze's down there fightin' for out lives or my name ain't Marine!"

"Marine, her name's Marine, remember that your social standing with these people will never survive if they find out you forgot," Sorun intensely thought. "Hey if you think you can do something then go for it, Marine, I'm not stopping you," he continued, "I'm just telling you that I don't have any special powers like the other two down there so the most I'd do is get in the way and-"

He'd only seen it because the fight itself seemed to pause to address it; a momentary lull of calm. Blaze had attempted a hit on Metal and it'd whiffed like every other hit she'd thrown at it. Only this time when the machine had hit back, the hit actually landed. Specifically it was a hard punch right to her jaw. A punch that had been delivered hard enough she'd been tossed backwards while her feet traced lines through the sand. Shadow'd managed to move behind her and catch her before she took a spill and fortunately she still seemed to be conscious. But she looked dazed from the hit, and it appeared Shadow holding her up was the only thing keeping Blaze from falling down.

"Oh. That thing just punched my new friend." It was remarkable how quickly Sorun had become infuriated seeing that. He'd gone completely still as a result, staring down at the village with an expressionless face. He could feel it happening again: the blood rushing quickly through him, sights and sounds sharpening, that feeling of pure anger being accompanied by that strange sense of being energized, of being awake . He felt great. And he felt extremely calm all of a sudden in addition.

More than that... when Metal and Shadow started to fight and trade blows again, he could almost make them out. It wasn't clear, the blurs of colors had upgraded merely to shapes, but it was an improvement. Tracking them with eyesight had gone from impossible to extremely difficult and impractical. But it was something.

Blaze was moving too, it seemed, which relieved Sorun a bit, but she was noticeably slower. He didn't know if that was because of the hit or if that was just his own perception working with Sorun. It didn't matter. He suddenly felt like going down there and doing something.

"Er... uh, Sorun?" Marine's voice drew Sorun's attention to the Mobian's face. She looked a bit creeped out at the moment, and had taken a step back. "Your eyes supposed to be doin' that? Glowin' all green and spooky? And what's goin' on with your hand?"

Sorun looked down at his right hand. The nails had elongated and sharpened again like last time, and had turned black. "Don't worry about it," he answered Marine, though the words didn't seem to take based on her expression. "Tell you what, though," he continued, beginning to stand up, "you make a fair point about sitting around and doing nothing while all that's happening. Even if it's just being a sitting target for a couple seconds I can probably buy them some kind of opening-"

Sorun had taken a single step forwards.

A single step forwards was all Sorun managed before it all came crashing down. His senses dulled, sounds becoming muffled and his sight blurring. Mind turning sluggish as his head began to swim. More worryingly he'd uncontrollably coughed out and a spray of blood splashed onto the ground in front of him. Marine had shouted out in fright and jumped back, looking down at the blood and then looking at at Sorun in worry. Sorun just stared down blankly at the blood as he noticed the nails on his hand shortened and went back to their normal color.

"Ah. Whoops." The edges of his vision were rapidly becoming black. He could barely hear his own breathing and everything was starting to blur further. Fortunately he tipped over and was about to fall on his face, so the ground being so close made it that much clearer. "That ain't ideal... huh..."

It certainly wasn't. He fell unconscious the moment his face hit the grass.

Space was not a void.

Space, for all its emptiness, had volume. Space contained planetary objects, stars, temperature, gasses, energy, and dimensions in its infinite expanse. These elements comprised a fraction of a fraction of the whole of space, true, but as a shadow was a shadow only by definition of the light that cast it so, to, was space defined by what it contained. The same was true for the universe as a whole. The same was true for the multiverse. It was just a difference of scale.

This was void. The deep blackness within this place was as vast as it was empty. An absolute void of nothing, absent of any dimension, and completely and utterly incomprehensible to anything even aware of such things. It was a place of absolutely nothing.

This was the innermost reaches of the mind of a thing born outside a world infested with Chaos energies filling every crevice in the facets of the world it touched.

This was home.

Lying there on the metaphorical ground of nothingness was Sorun, appearing asleep. Another Sorun completely identical to the first one stood over him. He didn't have much of an expression other than looking slightly annoyed as he stared down at Sorun.

"Hey. Hey, wake up." Sorun kicked at the sleeping Sorun's side. "Sorun, it's me. Listen I've been workshopping some thoughts out in the back of your subconscious, you wanna listen?"

"Hrmph...?" With an otherwise undignified snort Sorun's eyes slowly opened up. He slowly stood up, bleary look on his face, and rose his hands up to rub at his eyes to clear his vision. He quickly made a long-suffered, exhausted sigh when he saw where they were. "So that's how it is," he mumbled out as he looked up at Sorun again. "We died again?"

"Nah. We just passed out," Sorun answered. That was enough for Sorun - he collapsed back into laying on his back as he stared up at the infinite expanse of of nothingness. "Sorun, seriously, I've been thinking and we gotta talk."

"I have no desire to speak. Begone."

Sorun's expression tightened. It was no longer annoyance but a pensive look upon his face. He was clearly uncomfortable with what he was about to say. "Look, I... get, a few weeks back when we first noticed something was wrong with us, why you decided to just try and ignore it and hope it would go away. And I understood that and looked the other way because I figured we had enough problems and this one could be put on the backburner." Sorun rubbed at the back of his neck, glancing downwards at his feet with an awkward expression. "But we're spitting blood and passing out in front of people now. There's no hiding from that. Like literally none. I'm good with helping you come up with bullshit on the fly but I can't lie our way outta this one, man. We're sunk."

"..." Sorun rolled over to his other side. Sleep wasn't coming from him. "And?"

"And it's getting worse, man!" Sorun shouted. "I mean it was just little things at first, a weird feat of strength here and there that we shouldn't have been able to do, but then the green-eye thing kept getting more frequent and now we're growing claws and shit. I don't know why but it's happening and we can't even maintain it without falling flat on our face," he said. "Shit, we shouldn't have even been able to maintain it that first time over in that fucking castle if it weren't for that hit of Mobian blood, and even then you felt like shit after! It kept us up and gave us a power boost but fuck I think it made things even worse, man!"

The Sorunn lying down huffed out a breath, and then, with painstaking slowness, sat up into a sitting position, though made effort not to look at the standing Sorun. He shuffled some of his dark hair to hide a majority of his face. "You're obviously working up to some kind of point. State it already."

Sorun breathed out and rubbed at his face. "We need help, man," he mumbled, letting his hands fall to his side. "Like actual, professional help. We can't do this on our own. A doctor or some kind of Chaos energy specialist or something. 'Cause we can't keep going on like this."

He stopped and waited for the sitting Sorun to saw something in response. He didn't - just kept sitting there with his hair in his face, looking away from himself. It made Sorun make a clicking sound with his mouth out of impatience. He stomped over to him.

"Hey, this is fuckin' serious," he said as he crouched down in front of himself. "Alright? There's something wrong with us and-"

Oh. He'd seen what the problem was when Sorun brushed the hair away from Sorun's face. He was less sitting and more curled in on himself, holding his knees against his chest while looking down and away in an effort to look anywhere but at his own face. Mouth tightened into a thin line and skin paler than it should be. His eyes shaking as hard as the rest of his body. He looked terrified.

"It's fine," he whispered out in a small voice. "Nothing's wrong. We're fine, this isn't anything. It isn't getting worse. We're fine. We are. It will go away..."

"..." It was too hard to watch, so he simply didn't. Sorun had to turn his head so he wouldn't have to look. "Listen, I ain't gonna let us die-
"

"Don't say things like us dying." He pulled on his knees tighter, drawing more of himself in. "Please. Not again. I don't want to go through this again..."

"... We ain't gonna-" Sorun cut himself off, frowning. He didn't much believe himself, not completely, not after everything they'd seen. But he had to convince himself somehow here. "Listen, it ain't like we've been scarfing down those Chaos Emeralds like last time, and there's a whole world of people who know way more 'bout this stuff than us," he said to himself. "It's something we're gonna have to confront anyways. Marine saw it, so she's gonna tell Blaze, and she'll tell Shadow and he ain't gonna leave it alone, so... you know, that's it. It's done. And maybe that's for the best, because we need to do something about this."

The Sorun sitting in front of him stopped shaking. That was a good step, but he still wouldn't look up and he still wouldn't drop the terrified look. And Sorun understood it. Felt the desire to ignore it, to not talk about or even address what was happening. To acknowledge that the reality of the situation was in fact reality. He couldn't not feel these things when they were on one mind. But it was also his responsibility to snap him out of this shit.

"We'll find someone. Alright? Maybe Quack over in New Mobotropolis, maybe someone else, dunno who, but someone who can help us," Sorun said. He'd put a hand over on Sorun's shoulder in some attempt to put him at ease. "We'll even find Finitevus and pin him to the wall if we get desperate enough. That prick owes us one."

The proclamation elicited a small chuckle out of Sorun. Another good sign. "That's something, I suppose." He finally looked up at his own face. "We'll be alright. Won't we?"

He had to be honest with himself. "No. We broke months ago and I've been working my ass off holding it all together. And things were getting easier until that fucking Scourge guy happened." They grasped hands, and Sorun pulled Sorun up so that they were both standing and at eye-level. "But that ain't your problem, don't worry about it. Physically speaking? Yeah. We're gonna fix this."

A small, broken smile formed on Sorun's face. He didn't believe himself for a moment. "With such a 'concise' plan such as that I have a hard time believing you. But I still appreciate it. Fine. We'll... proceed with trying to do something." His smile turned a bit wry. "You will just yell at me anyways until I do something otherwise."

"Yeah, well, someone has to. And you worry too much. When have we ever actually made anything as substantial as a plan?" Sorun scoffed at the mere thought. "Alright, now... assuming the whole Metal Sonic thing got taken care of and we're not about to have our head stomped on in our sleep we should be good to go. Just start movin' and we'll improvise from there."

The first thing Sorun noticed when he woke up - he was groggy and felt awful. At this point that was probably a good thing. Pain meant things were working. Back in the day he'd stopped feeling anything because Chaos energy had been wreaking so much havoc on him that bodily functions had slowly been starting to cease. Things certainly didn't feel "fine", but bad was better than catastrophic. For now.

The second thing he noticed was that he was in a bed. He didn't recognize the ceiling when he woke up. It was off-white plaster and nothing else. Opening his eyes further and sitting up didn't help much either. The room itself was pretty sparse aside from a small closet and a desk, nothing of which he recognized. There was a noticeable whiff of brine in the air, though, and moonlight was filtering in from a nearby window. When he moved out of the bed, thankfully confirming he still had his clothes, and moved to it he saw the ocean and the village from earlier down below. Thankfully not on fire this time.

So they were still on the Southern Island in Blaze's world. That was good. That there weren't fires anymore and somebody had carried him into a bed meant Metal Sonic probably wasn't a problem anymore, so that was the main problem deal with. That just left... the other issue.

With a sigh, Sorun moved away from the window and looked down at his own hand. It looked normal, which was a good enough sign. Normal-sized pale nails and all. He looked good; he felt awful. Sick. A familiar kind of sick. His body wasn't shutting down, not yet, but this was a familiar sickness nonetheless.

He shook his head and moved towards the door to the room. It lead out into a hallway - white stone lined the walls and there were enough candleholders with lit candles bolted to the surfaces that it may as well have been illuminated by lightbulbs. It looked "clean" for how archaic it looked, which had its own charm in Sorun's eyes. He didn't take too long to admire it, though, as he'd began walking down the hallway. Walking turned to stumbling. Stumbling, after a loud fit of coughs, turned to him collapsing against a wall.

"H-hey!"

Oh, a new voice. Blaze's. Sorun got to listen it as his back slid down the wall until he was sitting down, coughing blood into his hand. He saw the purple cat quickly move into his view and take a knee in front of him, stretching out her hands to help him but then pausing when she realized she didn't know how to help him. Her face was set in alarm. It was a large contrast from the quiet confidence he'd began to associate her with, or all that righteous fury she'd displayed from about two minutes 'til he'd passed out.

"Ahck, ahck...! O-oh, hey, Blaze..." He pulled his hand away from his mouth. It was heavily flecked with blood. "I ain't doin' too good."

"Yes, I can see!" She sounded about as worried as she looked. Finally having decided a course of action, she'd grabbed at his shoulder and helped to keep him up so he didn't fall down any further. "Sorun, what is this? What's wrong?"

"The... natural progression of life, I s'pose," Sorun muttered out in answered. "The inevitable end for all us Voidborn."

Still holding his shoulder, Blaze had blinked in confusion. "I-I don't follow. Voidborn?"

"It's a title that makes me sound cooler than I actually am, Blaze, the word 'void' automatically makes anything cooler if you add it," Sorun continued to mutter, chuckling mildly with bloodstained teeth. "I was... born outside the stars, Blaze. In the deep, inky black of nothingness. And I think this whole multiverse kind of hates me for that because it tries really hard to kill me all the time. Like it's spiteful over my mere existence."

"Please stop this line of thinking, it isn't helping." The cat squeezed his shoulder and roughly shook him, as if she were attempting to keep him awake and coherent. It got a bit of his blood flowing, so he didn't know, maybe it did. "I don't see any wounds on you, is this... what is this, some sickness?"

"Yeah. The sickness of life."

"You are not helping ."

She didn't like metaphors apparently. Fair enough. Sorun barely tolerated them, too. "Chaos energy is poisonous to me and this is what happens when I get too much," he explained. "But I... haven't taken in any. I don't think. I don't, I don't know why this is happening."

Blaze leaned a bit away from Sorun. She still looked worried over him but there was a hint of skepticism in her expression. Disbelief. Like she couldn't believe what he said. "That... makes absolutely no sense. No, that can't be right," she said. "The energies of Chaos are intrinsic to everything . To life itself. To suggest something is otherwise is impossible. You-"

Mid-sentence her hand had alit with fire. Gentle yellow-orange flames. Not at all like the raging orange and red fireballs she'd been tossing at the robot earlier. She held the lit hand to Sorun's chest who'd stilled at being touched by fire, but all he felt was mild warmth from the fire's contact. And then Blaze had frozen.

"... You've no fire," she mumbled in realization. As the truth of what Sorun said just hit her, causing her hand to limply fall away from Sorun's chest as the flames die out. "You tell the truth...?"

"I love explaining this to people. They get so baffled every time," Sorun chuckled out. He couldn't help it; the look on her face was funny. "So is it Chaos fire or-?" he asked, looking down at her hand.

"No. Sol energy is a... derivative, for lack of a better term. One unique to this zone. Same in nature but different in form. It's... perhaps complicated, for those outside this world who are uninitiated," Blaze explained. "I was born with these abilities so I have an easier time grasping the concept. It's a power that binds this world together, quite literally, and regulated proper through the use of the Sol Emeralds. It's why I was chosen to look after this world - I'm the only one who can manifest the abilities needed to control and stabilize the Sol Emeralds. Which is quite hard when most of them are missing." She shook her head, looking concerned again. "But none of this is your problem. To have absolutely no connection to the Chaos Force..." She trailed off. She almost looked troubled at the implication. "Whether it's natural denizens of this world connected to the power of Sol energy or denizens of others worlds connected to Chaos energy, it doesn't matter. I can see that power flickering in everyone I see like a lit flame. Like a burning wick inside a candle. But with you it's like the wick is unlit, and yet still burns anyway. A wick sitting in an endless void of nothing instead of a candle. It makes no sense."

"Nothing about me makes sense," Sorun said. "But, uh, is my wick in particular really short or-?"

"There is no wick. The wick is a metaphor," Blaze snapped. She apparently did have a flair for them. "I don't know what I'm looking at with you. It's like I'm looking at a corpse."

The only break in the ensuing silence was the near-silent sputtering of all the nearby candles lighting the hallway. It carried on for a long series of moments as Blaze's brain seemed to catch up to the words that left her mouth, at which point she grew to look very uncomfortable. Sorun was so amused he could have laughed. He didn't, and he was thankful he managed to keep a straight face, but he was having a lot of fun right now. He didn't even need to tease her; she was doing it for him.

"Not that... you are a corpse, Sorun. I promise you I hadn't meant to imply anything." If she was flustered at all she was doing a great job hiding it, but that wary tone said enough. "Despite your condition," she continued, coughing off to the side. Politely.

"No hard feelings," Sorun assured her. It went a long way, apparently, because Blaze's shoulders visibly relaxed when he said it. "But I get it."

"'Get it?'"

"Your whole Sol deal. Chaos energy turning into something else, another form of energy. Your fire. I think that's its hallmark: that it can turn into anything. Why it's called 'Chaos', I guess, though the only other time I've seen it is..."

With him. When he absorbed Chaos Emeralds and twisted their power into demonic energy with the powers he'd used to have. Things like the Yamato that'd always felt wrong to anybody he'd come near it with, especially those sensitive to Chaos energy. They always looked at it like it was a leper. Like they couldn't comprehend what that power was other that it felt wrong. Blaze was the same, except this fire seemed to be a natural facet of this world. A uniquity, as she'd said. Only difference was one of them had a link and could handle the power and one didn't and couldn't, and humanity drew the short end of that stick it seemed.

"... Look, don't think too hard about it, Blaze," Sorun told her. "It is what it is. Can't change it as much as you can't change having those powers. 'S just a part of us. 'Cept mine kills me."

"..." The ears on top of Blaze's head lowered halfway. A look of understanding and resignation formed. "Could you not just go back to wherever you come from? Surely there-"

"Can't. Not an option," Sorun immediately said. "I don't want to talk about it, Blaze, just don't ask."

"Very well. I won't." Blaze helped to pull Sorun up to his feet. He'd managed with her help. The sickness was starting to recede, at least for now. It seemed to come and go. "Is there anything I could possibly do to help you?"

"Nah. Not really," Sorun answered honestly. That answer only seemed to dishearten Blaze more. "There're doctors and specialists in the Prime Zone I can try going to. I'm not holding out hope, though. I'm not supposed to exist here. Total uncharted territory. Nobody really knows what to do with me."

"Then... we should perhaps be getting you home now." Blaze had grown a bit quieter by now. A look a bitter acceptance on her face that was quickly hidden when she turned around and began walking down the hall, long purple tail trailing behind her. "This way, please. Follow me."

Sorun did so. Quietly at first, hands casually tucked in his pocket as he stared after her back. He'd grown bored after a minute and began looking around, though in the hallway there wasn't much to glance until they'd crossed a window that gave another view of the island.

"So what happened with Metal Sonic?" Sorun asked as they passed the window. They'd come to a door; Blaze had opened it to reveal a spiral staircase that she began to take downwards, with Sorun following in tow. "I assume my head not getting crushed like a grape in my sleep means that you won."

"Graphic description aside, yes," Blaze replied, not even so much as flinching from Sorun's words as they climbed down the stairs. "We'd lured it in front of our ship and Marine destroyed it with one of the ship's cannons. That zone-traversing engine Shadow had mentioned was unfortunately destroyed with the rest of the machine, though as promised I'd given him the Chaos Emerald left to me by Sonic." She glanced up and over her shoulder at Sorun as they continued to descend. "He stayed behind to wait for you. He seemed worried."

"Mh." Sorun glanced off to the side. "I guess I have you to thank for putting me in a bed after passing out like a loser?"

"Yes. Though I'd prefer you not belittle yourself over a medical condition you can't control." She looked back forwards. "Marine told me you'd begun to display some sort of power and expressed a desire to help before you became overwhelmed and passed out. A bed was the least I owed you."

Sorun scoffed. "She tell you how I tried to cower out of the fight?"

"I can't blame you for not wanting to get involved with a foe that gave me of all people trouble, Sorun. It wasn't your place anyways. While I'm grateful for Shadow's and Marine's help, it was my people that thing was accosting and entirely my responsibility to deal with." They'd made it to the bottom of the staircase. There wasn't much there. Just a small, circular room and a doorway in front of them. "But," she continued, placing a hand on the door while looking back at Sorun, "I can appreciate you at least attempting something despite the obvious personal risk. So you have my thanks for that much at least."

The small smile she'd gave him was a genuinely honest one and it forced him to glance away from her again all bashful-like. He didn't manage to formulate a response as she opened the door. Fresh air and sea breeze instantly hit his face as the two stepped out. When they'd exited Sorun had looked up and behind him to see the small tower he'd first seen when they sailed to the Southern Island to begin with looming overhead. Looking ahead he saw the base of the tower was situated on a large hill. There was a guardrail circulating the perimeter of the tower a few meters out and a small footpath to the side that lead down into the small village below.

"So everything alright down there?" Sorun asked when he looked to the village. "It looked pretty bad before."

"All things considered the damages were fairly moderate and the people only suffered minor injuries," Blaze answered, sounding both relieved and exhausted at her own words. She'd leaned forwards against the guardrail circling the tower, folding her arms under her while looking out in the same direction Sorun was. "It shouldn't take too long for things here to return to normal order. The people here are no strangers to danger."

"Okay." He took a position right next to Blaze against the guardrail and adopted the exact same leaning position she was using. "Wow, so you have to take care of this whole planet, huh?" He glanced at her out of the corner of his eyes. "That's a whole lot of responsibility I don't even wanna try imagining. You don't even look that old."

"I'm seventeen years old for your information," she responded, almost sounding defensive. "It's plenty old."

"Yeah, I'm seventeen, too, and the most responsibility I have to worry about is my delivery job."

"There's no reason to be ashamed over that," Blaze said. "In this world couriers are highly sought after for their services. They're required to brave harsh storms, pirates, and other such dangers in order to transport packages from one island to the next. I hear the mental stress alone can be tolling, but they persevere regardless since everyone is dependent on what they deliver. It's one of the most respected professions one can have here."

"Uh... yeah, I usually don't have to deal with any of that," Sorun lamely responded. What else was he supposed to say? He just teleported everywhere. He was paid for a unique skill, not how labor-intensive his job was. Meanwhile apparently all the couriers here were fighting for their lives to deliver whatever. It made him not want to meet one; he wasn't sure he'd be able to look them in the eyes.

"Oh?" Blaze looked to him with a curious look. "The one time I'd ever gone to Mobius Prime it had been infested with machines terrorizing the populace. Is this not a pressing concern anymore?"

"It's getting better," Sorun admitted. "I don't really know the details, though. I just deliver stuff."

"Ah..." Blaze tapped at the guardrail a few times and looked down towards the village. She searched for something new to say and seemed to fail. "Shadow is waiting for you down below. You're both free to leave at your earliest convenience."

"Oh, alright. Cool."

She looked back at Sorun. The easygoing expression she'd grown fell back into looking a bit concerned again. "Are you certain you're going to be alright?" she asked. "If you're too unwell to be traveling I wouldn't object to you staying to recuperate-"

"Nah, I'll be fine," Sorun lied, "really. And you sound like you have a bunch of stuff going on so I'm gonna hit the road." He pushed off the guardrail and stuck his hands back in his pockets. "Good luck with the whole Sol Emerald thing. Hope it pans out alright. I hear losing a world can really mess a guy up."

He maneuvered around Blaze to make his way towards the nearby footpath. He turned his torso back to her to wave in goodbye, with Blaze reciprocating the wave with one of her own. There hadn't been a smile on her face. More a neutral expression now than anything else, though the ghost of some worry had still been present in her eyes. At least until Sorun had walked far enough away he couldn't really make her face out anymore. It was more or less just a blob of purple and white now.

At that point Sorun'd turned away and made his way into the village. Things were calmer now than the last time he'd laid eyes on it. He saw that koala from earlier, the one being held by the neck, at a carpenter's table nearby sawing a plank of wood near one of the more burned-out houses. And a... completely identical koala pass by carrying some building supplies. In fact the more Sorun looked around the more he realized it was only koalas here. There were at least a dozen or so of them around, doing their own thing. A few had glanced his way and waved and the most Sorun could do was wave back as he continued walking.

"Huh, alright." It was mildly interesting after having lived in a city populated by a such diverse spread of species for so long, but the interest had completely faded after a few seconds as his search for Shadow continued. It wasn't that hard a search - he was leaning his back against the outside of a small shop-looking place, looking at something palmed in his hand.

The hedgehog looked up when Sorun approached. On a first glance he looked irritated to Sorun's eyes. Extremely so. He was also fidgeting around with whatever he was holding in his hand, almost obsessively. Whatever it was output a soft green glow.

"Would you mind telling me why it seems like you're sick again?" That was the first thing Shadow asked when Sorun stopped in front of him. He was staring straight into his eyes. "No lies or vagaries. I'm in no mood."

Sorun gave him a nonchalant shrug. "I dunno. Maybe the world hates me. Maybe marinating in the Master Emerald for a couple decades didn't do wonders for my health. You act like I have concrete answers here."

The irritation in Shadow's eyes lessened greatly. He looked down into whatever he was holding, shuffling a bit against the wall. "... How long?"

"Noticed a few weeks ago. Small things. A few physical feats here and there that were weirdly easy. On and off bouts of weakness. The eye and hand thing Marine probably told you about's way more recent."

Shadow's hand squeezed down. He looked irritated again, but when he spoke out his voice didn't nearly sound as harsh as his face looked. "You didn't say a single thing. Why?" he demanded.

"... I just didn't." It was bad enough he wasn't able to meet Shadow's eyes when he looked up at him and had to look away, but he wasn't sure what else to say. It was the honest truth. Not something that could be elaborated on further.

But apparently Shadow did want further elaboration, because he didn't look satisfied with it at all. The irritation visible on his face deepened as his mouth creased into a thin line and his eyes narrowed. "You could have at least told someone-"

"Tell them what?" Sorun asked. He himself was growing irritated at the questions. "This? What are they supposed to say, what is anyone supposed to do about this, Shadow? About me?" Sorun asked, throwing a hand up in frustration. "Most people that know stuff about Chaos energy take one glance at me and call me a walking contradiction or whatever, my biology isn't a thing in this entire multiverse!" he shouted. "And you know it was, it was easier pretending nothing was wrong because at least then I could hope it would just go away, but it's not, it's getting worse and I can't do anything about it!"

He was panting when he finished yelling; Shadow was staring at him in surprise, even in a bit of worry. Sorun knew why: his eyes were probably green again. The heightened senses and feeling to renewed strength was a dead giveaway. The green light bouncing off his right hand when he held it up to his face was another large sign. So were the black fingernails on that hand.

And then the light cut off, and color started to bleed back into the nails. And then Sorun wobbled on his feet again as a surge of weakness shot through him, and he felt a bit of dampness on his upper lip as a line of blood dripped out of his nose. All sense of anger completely faded from Shadow's face, as he just looked alarmed now. Alarmed enough he'd even taken a few steps towards Sorun for fear he'd fall over, but stopped when he managed to stay on his feet.

Panting, Sorun took his right hand away from his face. It was shaking slightly; he wasn't sure why. He looked back at Shadow who could only stare. "You see what I mean? I-it's getting more frequent and you see what it does to me after," he muttered out. "What happens if it just starts turning on and off at random? What if it gets to a point where it's permanently on? How long until I die if that happens?"

"Do you..." Shadow hesitated, refusing to look away from Sorun. His mouth was silently moving like he was trying to figure out what to day. "Sorun, you can't leave this alone."

"I know I can't." Surprise showed in the hedgehog's face. "I'm not telling you all this to be fatalistic, Shadow, I... I'm genuinely asking you what I'm supposed to do here. 'Cause I don't know."

Shadow didn't have an answer, either. It was obvious. Sorun knew him long enough to know he was the kind of person that would have said something immediately if there were some sort of magic answer to all his problems. But all he did was stare without saying a word, which was enough for Sorun to know. He was just as lost as he was with what to do.

Eventually Shadow began rolling around whatever was in his palm again. This time Sorun had caught a quick glance of it. A green Chaos Emerald. Not the green one he was accustomed to. This one was smaller, its surface less lustrous and its shine more dim. And he could almost feel it was... lesser so than that actual Emerald he held in the past. One of the hundreds of thousands that'd been fused into one of the seven, now eight, Emeralds that had somehow wound up in Blaze's world before it'd been fused with the rest.

"... You could," Shadow began, and Sorun knew he must have been wracking his brain if it was taking him this long to say something, "come back with me. To G.U.N. There are... specialists under their employ who could potentially look at you. The same ones who have been studying the Chaos Emeralds we have."

The idea wasn't the most appealing one Sorun had heard of. "I'm not really sure-"

"By all means tell me what else you have in mind," Shadow interrupted, tone a bit snappish. "Because it's either try there or go back to the doctors in New Mobotropolis, and they were of little help to you the first time around. I'm not saying they'll have any answers for you, either, but you asked me for help and this is all I can offer."

"I don't know, Shadow, that's..." Hopeful. Something. Anything to grasp onto, and yet Sorun still wasn't so sure. "H-how long would I have to stay there?" he asked. "Would they even let me? Is that something you can even ask them to do?"

"I have some sway, but beyond that..." Shadow's eyes drifted away from Sorun. In a random direction, really, though they seemed to eventually focus onto the Emerald for nothing else than to have something to look at. "It could be floated that you were instrumental with my mission here retrieving this and that you requested these examinations as compensation. It's within my power as an agent to authorize such things. There wouldn't be any issues."

Sorun felt surprised hearing that. "You'd really just lie to them like that?"

"It's not a lie strictly speaking. You did fish me out of that ocean," Shadow said. "Technically there's nothing stopping you from making such a request at this moment and me approving it. It's not something I would normally do but these are extenuating circumstances and you evidently need the help."

"Okay." A hand found its way to Sorun's forehead. It was colder than he was used to, the hand or the forehead, he wasn't sure which. He was pretty sure he'd been sweating at some point but he didn't feel hot at all. "Okay, okay say I agree to this, you, what, you just teleport us back to the base and- seriously, how long?"

"A few days, I doubt it'd even take a week," he answered. "Sorun, I'm not saying this to give you some sense of false hope, I genuinely don't know if they can help you, but... well." He looked up from the Emerald and back at Sorun. He looked more reserved now, his default expression: a neutral look with slightly narrowed eyes. And yet, strangely, he wasn't staring as harshly as he normally did. "Isn't it worth at least trying? For your sake? Or if not that then at least for the sake of people that care about you?"

"... Just gimme a sec, would you?" Sorun mumbled. He didn't even stop to look if Shadow gave him some sort of affirmation, a nod or anything like that. If he said anything Sorun hadn't heard it. He'd just turned around on his feet, arms crossed and eyes at his feet as he thought.

It did sound good, admittedly. Not hopeful. He wasn't sure a bunch of Overlander scientists could tell him anything the Mobians over in New Mobotropolis hadn't told him in the past, which was quite literally nothing, but he'd been surprised before. A total shot in the dark was still a shot. An option to exhaust. A potential way forwards. If Shadow could take care of it all he stood to lose was some time.

The fact he'd have to spend time away, though, was what was causing him hesitation. He didn't want to spend a few days at some government facility. He just wanted to go home, crawl into his bed, and sleep this away. To be near the people that cared about him, people he felt like he needed right now. But then he had to acknowledge the main issue: that this wasn't going away and the option of ignoring it was long past. He didn't want to ignore it anymore. He wasn't sure why - he just felt the strong urge to do something about this.

"G.U.N., though, I dunno, I guess... I guess if everyone's cool with them and there doesn't seem to be anything wrong, it'd, it'd be fine. I think." He somewhat trusted Shadow, and he said they were trustworthy. None of the friends he trusted never actually said anything bad against them. It was hard to pit those opinions against his personal bias formed from opinions on Earth governments, but desperate times. "Sounds like a really low risk plan, and I need something here. And Nicole's gonna get super pissed at me for hiding this for so long so it gets me a few days to work out how I'm gonna deal with that. That alone's probably reason enough to go."

He glanced at his hand again. Everything looked normal. He looked from the hand and at Shadow. He was still staring, expectantly. "Fuck it. What've I got to lose?" Sorun decided. He'd sighed out loud while looking up at the nighttime sky. "I've gained lots since I lost it all. A new life. Home. Community. People that'd actually care if I died. And I don't want to lose that all again. And I have responsibilities aside." He flipped his hand over, palm pointing towards the sky as Sorun continued to speak. "After all I promised Silver I would take him back to the future when his whole thing is settled. And Honey'll complain forever if the guy she has transport her product everywhere kicks it. I can't do any of these things dead. So if you wanna have a bunch of G.U.N. scientists poke and prod me in the hope they can fix whatever's wrong with me then whatever, let's do it."

"It won't be that dramatic." Somehow when Shadow said that it sounded negatively reassuring, but perhaps that was just Sorun's nerves speaking on the matter. "But I think you're making the right choice."

"Great, glad we got that settled." Sorun began reaching for the miniature Emerald in Shadow's hand. "Just gimme that thing real quick and I can cut us a way to-"

" I ," Shadow interrupted, holding the Emerald out from Sorun's grasp, "am going to use this to teleport us to the base, at which point I will hand it over to my superior and we can get on with trying to save you."

Sorun froze halfway to reaching for the Emerald. He pouted at it having been taken from him, then pulled his arm back while moodily stating, "Fine, we'll do it your way. The boring, official way. Pfft."

"It's not that I don't trust you. It's that this Chaos Emerald is G.U.N. property now and you being seen with it as opposed to me would not look well," Shadow said. "Just grab onto my shoulder and we'll be on our way."

He wasn't going to argue the point. It was very clear in his tone and Sorun didn't feel like trying to budge the matter, so he simply rolled his eyes and clamped a hand down on his shoulder. "You gonna shout your big lame 'Chaos Control!' thing?"

"I do it to help me focus." Green light began to condense around the Emerald. He glanced at Sorun. "You take objection to it?"

"I mean, it... like it was this whole trope on Earth, you know? People shouting their attacks or whatever in shows and whatnot."

Shadow blinked. Slowly. "Trope?"

"Yeah, and it became so popular that it became lame in the eyes of the masses. It basically became a huge joke in most circles," Sorun explained. "And it's just so extra, you know? And a big tell to whoever you're fighting. You never heard me shout something like 'Spiral Swords, go!' when I was running around back then. I just did it. But if you need the mental focus to pull this off don't let me stop you, man, it's cool."

"..." Shadow looked at the Chaos Emerald with considering eyes. He looked at Sorun. And then he looked at the Emerald again. "We'll be teleporting momentarily. Prepare yourself."

"Not gonna shout your thing?"

"I don't need to shout 'my thing', Sorun, verbal commands are unnecessary."

"Don't need the focus?"

Shadow's grip on the Chaos Emerald tightened as a look of intense concentration settled on his face. The gem's glow intensified. "I'm not some beginner who needs to rely on mental tricks to focus their abilities, and if you say one more word about it I will remind you of the time you were learning to teleport and kept slamming into trees."

The both of them vanished on the spot in a flash of green-yellow light before the smarmy retort could breeze past Sorun's lips.

Chapter 98

Recursion Error

Episode 98- PV

The cold here was blistering. It was familiar.

Winters back home had been brutal. Summers, too, but from how Sorun heard it the heat was even worse in the southern parts of America during those times. He wouldn't know for sure - had simply never been. He knew for a fact they had it worse in the winter, though. Those southern parts, some didn't even get snow in the winter. There in the north? In walking distance from Canada? The winters were blistering. So he and everyone else who lived there in Detroit simply got used to the cold.

Somehow this frozen mountaintop wasn't as cold. But maybe that was just Sorun.

So G.U.N.'s main base of operations were still up in the mountains. He'd been here once, briefly, but he hadn't stayed nearly long enough to appreciate it. And now after all this time he didn't care enough to appreciate it. The window he was staring out of was nothing but a vista of white-capped mountains, blue sky, and snow fluttering in his field of vision. It may as well have all been static and noise.

Three days. Three days of staying here, of answering questions, examinations, tests, prodding. All for fucking nothing.

"Well, heeeey there! You must be my new patient! Am I right or am I right, mm?"

"Y-yeah, um, yeah, I'm Sorun," he greeted, a bit nervously as his legs swung freely on the examination bed. The room he was in almost exactly looked like the kind of examination room one would find in a hospital on Earth, down to the back countertop with jars of miscellaneous medical stuff lying on top, the charts everywhere, and the anatomically correct human torso with half its skin flayed off sitting in the corner over there.

The woman was his doctor. The person G.U.N. told him would look at him to see what was wrong with him. A woman with a deep tan and... green hair. It wasn't dyed. He could tell just by looking. It was just naturally green. And her expression was near-uncomfortable levels of bright.

"Well hey, guy, don't be shy, you're in good hands." She gave him a playful little punch on the shoulder and then practically flew back in the rolling stool she was sitting in. "It's just, you know, gosh. It's not everyday I get to examine someone with ancient DNA that never got warped by the gene bombs. And when I heard you were from another universe? I was like, 'aaah!' and everything!" She made a bubbly little giggle and looked down at the clipboard she was holding. "And... what was it you were hoping to have looked at, exactly?"

"Yeah, it's... ahem." He had to take a moment to compose himself. He'd been coming in here expecting someone cold and clinical and got the exact opposite. It was nearly overwhelming, actually, and Sorun needed to take a moment to compose himself. "So, uh... Chaos energy. I can't deal with it. I mean I can USE it in enough amounts but, er, well it's pretty much poison, too. And I haven't, uh, absorbed is the word to use, I guess, absorbed any as far as I know but there was, you know, this one moment I may have been exposed, maybe, I dunno if that's what did it or not and... jeez, lemme just show you."

Control of it. He had that now, somewhat. He found it could still trigger on its own if tempers flared enough, strong emotional outbursts and the such. But he could consciously bring it forth now.

Make his eyes glow that eerie green color that sharpened all his senses and made that surge of strength flow through him.

The doctor made an "aahhh...!" sound, olive-colored eyes wide as plates as she looked. Sorun only held it for a moment; after it dropped and his eyes went back to blue a stream of blood started pouring from his nose. She made a startled noise akin to a squawking chicken, rolled towards a drawer, and frantically rifled through it before taking out a tissue and rolling back to Sorun to give it to him. He mumbled out a thanks and held it up to his nose.

It was draining. So draining. Just because he had a modicum of control over it didn't take away from the fact it felt like it was draining the life out of him.

"So as you can see I can do that now," Sorun mumbled out. "I shouldn't be able to do that. And it's... it's been getting easier and easier to 'turn on', I guess you could call it, and I'm worried it'll get to a point I won't be able to turn it off. And, and doc whatever this is, this power, I can't handle it, it literally feels like it's killing me every time this happens. I bleed all over the place, I passed out for hours last time when I had it one for, I don't even know, it was like thirty seconds. I need it out of me, whatever this is."

"OKAY, that's... wow. Wow wow wow, yeah, that's a lot to process." The doctor was biting her lower lip, looking at him and then glancing down at her clipboard. "Sorun I should mention I am G.U.N.'s, really the UF's as a whole, foremost expert in the science and study of Chaos energies, but this is completely unprecedented territory. Not that we won't try!" she quickly assured him. "I can promise you that we will use every single tool as our disposal to try and solve whatever this is."

"Alright..." Sounded good to him. Great, even. It was the first bit of hope he'd heard in a while. "So am I looking at a physical examination, some bloodwork, what are we doing?"

With a large smile the doctor rolled right up to him. She already had an empty syringe in her hand. "Yes, yes, and yes to all that, Sorun, yes and more. Oh, arm, please." He did so, having rolled up his sleeves so she could get at the skin underneath. "So I don't wanna sound weird or anything when I say that this is a really great research opportunity, is that weird, it's not weird, is it?" she asked as she rubbed at a spot on his arm with an alcohol-soaked cloth. "It's just that there's so many unanswered questions around Chaos energy so when something so interesting like you with such a unique reaction-"

"It's great, I'm sure," Sorun interrupted, "but how long exactly-?"

The needle was gently inserted into his arm. "Hard to say, Sorun. Gotta know what I'm lookin' at first!" she brightly replied. The glass tube she was holding began to fill with a crimson liquid. "First thing's first I need to get this down to the labs for analysis, and while that's cooking I'll come back and we can get all the boring health questions out of the way, m'kay?"

"When does it end when does it end when does it end?" More snow drifting in his field of vision, in this window that took up the entire wall of this room. All the white, sometimes it hid the mountaintops in the background. Sometimes when the snow cleared up they weren't mountains but burnt-out buildings, distorted and misshapen. Twisted hunks of metal and broken glass shaped like mountains. And then they were mountains again. The damn snow made it hard to see. His eyes shaking in his skull, irises moving around erratically, unnaturally and inhumanly fast, all made it so damn hard to see.

The edges of the glass was breaking, cracking. Closing in on him. Everything was cracking.

He took in a breath, startled to find that he just realized he'd been holding it. Sorun blinked. The window was pristine - not a single crack to be seen. Military base like this Sorun wouldn't be surprised to learn it was some kind of reinforced glass, so why would it be cracked? And the sights beyond the snow were nothing but mountains. Made sense. Why would there be anything else but mountains?

"Mh..." His skin was itching. Badly. "Need a soda."

He turned around. This part of the base was a "lounge" for the soldiers on base here. Calling it a lounge didn't do it much justice, though. It was multiple rooms separated by glass walls that would have been a dream to live in. One room was a bunch of couches and sofas centered around a wall-mounted TV, another room was practically a bar. They had a room entirely devoted to a ping pong table, with a couple Overlander soldiers going at it right now. A kitchen, too, which was where Sorun immediately went to. Straight to the fridge was where he went.

The prize was there. The soda. Some brand of Overlander cola, he didn't bother reading it. He'd immediately ripped the cap off and threw the warped piece of metal in the garbage as he chugged the bottle's contents.

... It helped a little. Made the itching go away at least. The flavor was familiar but not quite the same. The burn of the carbonated liquid going down his throat wasn't quite as intense as the stuff back home, or even the Mobian brand, but hell, it was something. Something to take the edge off. Calmed him down a bit, let him think.

He looked up from the bottle. The two Overlander soldiers playing at the ping pong table, looking almost human but not quite , they weren't being subtle about sneaking glances his way. He cared a little, but not enough to actually confront them about it. All the soldiers and staff here, Sorun did his best to stay out of their way as much as possible. He got the impression they didn't really care about him or why he was here, though, which suited him fine. Just a guest here. Just a guest. A guest.

Guest guest guest.

There was a rapid clinking sound as Sorun rapidly drummed his fingernails against the now-empty glass bottle. He threw it in the nearby recycling can, hearing a quiet crashing sound - the bottle had probably broken from him throwing it so hard. He left the kitchen anyways, putting it out of his mind. He wasn't sure he liked this room. Too many bright lights. Too many people he couldn't stand to be around.

That would have been it right there and Sorun would have left if he hadn't heard it - a rustle. There, in one of the nearby cabinets. His footsteps had halted dead once the sound reached his ears and his eyes twitched over to the location of the sound. It was a standard setup: a counter with a sink, inlaid oven, and other appliances, lined with cabinets below the counter's surface and even more counters above it bolted to the wall. He'd heard the sound from one of the lower cabinets. The far one, furthest from the sink.

"A mystery." A diversion was welcome, even if it was a momentary one. He couldn't imagine it was a rodent of some kind, not in this kind of location. And with his current mood Sorun just couldn't resist, so he'd stalked over to the cabinet as quiet as he could. He'd slinked right up to the cabinet door, set in a crouch and eyes trained right at the handle. There were no sounds or signs of movement. Nothing. But he had heard a sound here. And he couldn't resist. Not when there could be anything in that cabinet.

He reached out and opened the cabinet door.

The mystery proved to be a short one because it was just a girl in there. Around ten or twelve, somewhere around there. An Overlander girl with skin almost as light as his, blonde hair, and eyes a brighter blue than his. She was folded in there, back against the inner cabinet wall and her legs pressed tight enough against her chest they were practically pushing against the cabinet's ceiling. She was staring right at Sorun, eyes wide and shocked. There was a half-eaten chocolate bar in her mouth.

"..." Profound disappointment radiated in Sorun upon the revelation it was just a girl in here and not something cool. He did reach out without a word and take the chocolate bar out of her mouth, though - she'd made a sound halfway between a squeak and a hiccup in surprise when he took it. Most of the chocolate's wrapper was still on it, so once he'd drew it close he turned the chocolate bar around to get a good look at the label. It read "G.U.N. FORCES FIELD RATION" on the front in big block letters and nothing else.

"Hmm." An army chocolate ration. He'd heard some armies even on Earth fielded such a thing but had never seen one before. There wasn't more he could observe from it. It looked like a normal chocolate bar and nothing else. So he'd reached back over and directly but the bar back into the now confused girl's mouth, right where he'd found it. Her eyes were darting around now out of bewilderment, and she'd made muffled sounds when the chocolate was put back. Sorun ignored it all and closed the cabinet door again.

After the door was closed Sorun remained there, crouched quietly in front of the cabinet door. He stared at the door in quiet consideration, motionless, as still as a statue. A secret girl wasn't nearly interesting enough to investigate, but that chocolate bar. He wondered how its taste compared to other kinds of chocolate he'd had on this world. He wanted to know. Needed to.

A decision reached, Sorun opened the cabinet door again. The girl was still there, her body jolting and then freezing when she realized he was still there and opened the door back up. The chocolate bar in her mouth was smaller than the last time he'd seen it.

The length mattered little. Questions needed to be answered, so once again he slowly reached out and removed the chocolate bar from her mouth once again. She let him, or more accurately she was just too confused to know how to react based on the look on her face. After he pulled the chocolate bar Sorun spoke.

"This any good?" he asked. His voice was monotone and toneless.

"H-huh?" The girl blinked, like him asking that had been the last thing she'd expected to hear. Maybe she hadn't expected him to say anything and was just surprised words came out of his mouth. She stuttered a bit and was making an effort to look anywhere but at Sorun's face. "It's, uh, it's... yeah, it's good."

"I heard stories where I come from that military chocolate is pretty terrible. You a liar?"

She squinted one of her eyes and tilted her head as much as the confined space she was in allowed, and her mouth dropped open a bit. "No...?" She reached out, tentatively. Slender hands snatched the chocolate bar out of his hand and pulled it back to her body's owner. She turned it around a bit in her hands, and after a moment's consideration flipped it over to the unbitten end. She removed the wrapper completely and broke off one of the sectioned pieces at the end that hadn't been contaminated by her mouth juices. "You want some?"

Yes. "Yes." His hand reached out, but stopped just short of grabbing the tiny square. And then his fingers moved, rapidly wiggling and flexing at a speed that human eyes would have a difficult time keeping up with. It squigged the girl out and caused her to cringe back a bit, but before she could have second thoughts about the chocolate Sorun snatched it and popped it in his mouth.

Tasted like shit.

"It's trash," he announced. It wasn't melting right on his tongue and it had the consistency of chalk. He didn't even try to savor it. He just broke it up with his teeth and swallowed the pieces as fast as he could so he didn't have to deal with it. The acrid taste was lingering on his teeth.

And now the girl was pouting. She took a large bite out of the chocolate, as if to spite Sorun's review. He wondered why the taste wasn't killing her. "It's not that bad," she nervously mumbled out, pout melting away much quicker than the chocolate from Sorun's intense, unceasing stare.

"There's a small chocolate shop in Station Square that sells decent chocolate. I went there sometimes while on runs." He hadn't moved an inch since finding the secret cabinet girl. He hadn't blinked once. "There's a chocolatier that lives in New Mobotropolis, too, and her stuff is pretty great. It's hard to get cocoa beans out there, though, so she never makes a lot."

He'd been considering talking with that woman at some point to offer a hand of help in exchange for some of that chocolate. That was before the fucking pizza incident. Before this. Chocolate was one of the last things on his mind now.

"Okay?" The girl took another bite of the chocolate, somehow. "Well, it's hard to get good chocolate up in the mountains."

"That makes sense." He stood up, stepping back from the cabinet to give the girl space. "Vacate that space and converse with me further, cabinet girl."

He heard the girl mumble something to herself and then heard some more shuffling. The girl had climbed out of the cabinet, closing the door behind her. She was shorter than him by a few inches - this pleased Sorun. She also wore the most normal clothes Sorun had seen in this world. A simple black shirt, some jeans and sneakers.

It's because of that Sorun didn't say anything, even after she began to look at him expectantly, munching on the last of that evil candy. Because her clothes and face made her completely indistinguishable from a normal girl one would see on Earth. He felt something seeing her, but nostalgia wasn't the right word. The feeling Sorun felt looking at this girl felt more like phantom pain than nostalgia. Like somebody had decapitated his head and he still felt it.

"Can you please stop being so creepy...?" She must have been starving beforehand, because Sorun had no idea how she'd managed to finish that chocolate otherwise. The blonde girl balled the wrapper up and stuffed it in her pocket, and then continued with, "Seriously, what do you want?"

The question snapped Sorun out of the small fugue he'd been in. For the first time since meeting her he blinked, and that one action alone somehow managed to make the girl visibly relax a bit. "Why were you hiding in the cabinet there like some kind of chocolate gremlin?" Sorun asked in his blank tone, pointing to the cabinet door.

"I'm not a... who even says that?" The girl's eyes narrowed up at Sorun's face, like she was trying and failing to decipher some kind of puzzle. She eventually gave up and shook her head, continuing with, "Well... we're only allowed so much of that chocolate on a monthly basis and I get in trouble if I'm seen eating a lot. So I just... you know. Sometimes take some without anyone knowing."

"... Life on a military base sure seems strict," Sorun concluded. The girl wordlessly nodded, looking closely at him while nervously holding her arm with the other. "But now that begs the question what a girl is doing- oh, you're Hope. I've heard of you," Sorun realized. Now he recognized her. She was the girl he'd caught a glance of the least time he was here on Guardian Mountain, after helping liberate Station Square.

"Yeah..." The girl, Hope, nodded at Sorun again. Looking back at the scant few descriptions he'd heard of her Sorun supposed he should have recognized her sooner. "You're that guy Shadow brought back, right? The one he said he wanted the doctors to all look at?"

"That one. Yes."

"Oh. Ahem." She cleared her throat and rocked a bit back and forth on her feet. "So, er, is everything alright with you?"

"..."

Day two of this place and Sorun was beginning to become a bit unsure.

These kinds of things took time. He understood that. It was understandable. And he realized asking for so much when they had so little information was a lot, and he also understood that, but he also understood his life was potentially in danger.

But he hadn't heard anything. Not a single thing, no diagnosis, no treatment options, not even any speculation. Just days of listening to this woman drone on and on.

"You need more blood...?"

"That's right, Sorun!" She was smiling so brightly that the harsh lighting in this room was truly glinting off it. It made him wince. It was like staring at a flash bang go off. "A lot of guys in the labs have been going head over tails over all the data you've been giving us! Oh, and everything else, the x-rays and deep scan readings, a lot of your biometrics, you're just... so much different on a biological level to us Overlanders, I could go on for days!"

He'd rather she didn't. He'd rather she give him what he came for. Answers. "That's nice," he quietly mumbled out. "Um... could we please talk about-?"

"I know, I know, you're worried about your condition." She practically jammed that needle into his arm. Sorun didn't so much as flinch. "Actually, that's... the thing, you know, we-"

"I don't know," Sorun interrupted. "I came to you precisely because I don't know."

"It's just a lot of data to sift through, Sorun, we've been doing a lot of tests and-"

"What data, why do you..." He sputtered out and gestured to the syringe being filled with his own blood. "This is the eighth syringe of blood you've taken from me," he pointed out. "Why do you need so much?"

The doctor made a hum as she removed the needle. "If you really wanna know I have some staff doing genetic analysis on your samples, I have another team saturating blood samples with Chaos energy using that Emerald Shadow brought back to us to monitor any potential changes to compare to the control samples you've provided, and Sorun this is just a small fraction. We're still trying to figure out precisely how different you are from normal Overlander biology and if this condition of yours changed you in any way, and without a sample from before these symptoms of yours that's a hard task. We have the people for this but if you want it done quickly then we need as much material to work with as possible so everyone can get on it. Do you understand?"

Somewhat. It made enough sense on a basic level. It didn't change the fact how impatient he felt with all this, the frustration at the lack of progress. "I do," he said.

"Great!" The doctor beamed a smile at him. "Now I don't wanna gossip but I know a certain ~someone~ wanted to get you into MRI so we could take some scans of that big old brain of yours," she said, poking at his forehead.

He resisted the urge to slap it away and made a sigh. "Is it you?"

And she laughed. Of course she laughed. "Ha ha, yep! Guilty as charged! Okay, so if you'll follow me..."

"... I don't wish to discuss it."

"Why not? Are you sick or something?"

"Or something." Sorun leaned forwards, face coming unusually close to Hope's. The contact proved to be just a bit too bearing for the girl, as she'd paused in her motions and grew an uncomfortable look on her face from his proximity. "But we're not talking about me, are we? We're talking about how you're sneaking chocolate behind the military's back."

Hope took a few steps away from Sorun. She looked less nervous and more creeped out now, in an almost annoyed manner. "And what are you gonna do? Tell on me? I'd rather you didn't."

"Normally I wouldn't. But you asked me not to. So now I'm gonna," Sorun said.

"Oh, noooo, they'll get me for sneaking chocolate, whatever will I do...?" Hope made a showing of holding a hand against her forehead and doing a fake swoon... only to then straighten out and snort out a laugh. "Psh, yeah, like I'll get any worse than a slap on the wrist for that."

"And yet you're sneaking away into cabinets with that chocolate."

Hope's mouth thinned a bit into a frown. "Well yeah, but..." She paused to search for a comeback, but she must have come up blank because she made a defeated sigh. "Listen, Sorun-"

"You know my name?" Sorun said. He made a slow blink and tilted his head the smallest bit.

"Yeah, of course I know your name, I just told you Shadow told me about you. I've actually been trying to find you for the last few days but could never catch you," she confessed, raising a hand up to nervously scratch behind her head. "I wanted to talk to you. You're from Knot- I mean, New Mobotropolis, right? With the all the Mobians?"

"... I live there currently, yes," Sorun answered. "What relevance is this?"

Hope's head scratching was picking up in pace. She looked nervous again, and seemed to be struggling to get the words out. "Can you...

can you tell me how everyone there is doing?" she asked. "I know a lot of people there and I just wanted to know-"

"No."

"What!?" In a flash Hope's nervous demeanor had instantly switched to one of indignation, with just a dash of anger added on. She'd pouted up him, all angry-like, and had even stomped her foot down in protest. "Why!?"

"I'm bored." Honest truth, he couldn't deny that. He needed some diversion and some entertainment, after all, and the current diversion was already growing stale. And he needed to pay her back in some way for the taste that "chocolate" left in his mouth.

Hope was excessively blinking now with wide eyes in a frantic manner. Not angered, but panicked. The threat of Sorun outright refusing to deny her what she was seeking was having a profound effect on her, more than he'd anticipated. It was so bad she almost looked worried, even. "I'm not even asking for that much, I-I just want to know how my friends are doing!"

"Yes. And I'm bored," Sorun repeated. "If I tell you everything you need to know you walk away and I'm left standing here with nothing to do." He leaned backwards on the counter, elbows rested at the top. A small little grin had spread over Sorun's face. "Hope, this poor brain of mine needs stimulation, quite badly. I couldn't possibly divulge this information without something in return. Make a deal with me."

Hope's fists balled at her side. She made a frustrated noise, teeth grit together as she glared at him. "You seriously want something out of this? For something so little?"

His only answer was a shrug while maintaining that small grin. Another indignant noise came out of her, and she turned around, arms crossed and eyes turned down to the floor as she tapped her foot in thought. She hadn't stormed out in anger quite yet. In fact, Sorun found himself raising an eyebrow at the sight. She seemed to be considering something.

"I may just get some entertainment out of this yet," he thought. Her face shifted a bit - now she looked a bit unsure, eyes looked back at him in a hesitant manner.

"Well... if you're really bored, then..." On a dime she turned around, all dramatic-like, and pointed right at him as her face turned to a resolute expression. "Then I'll show you something cool!" she yelled out. Like that one, single offer was the last line of hope she had against getting what Sorun was keeping from her.

The Earthling blinked. Something cool? In here? He doubted the claim. "I really doubt you can show me something cool enough to make me back down from this," he said. "It would have to be something out of this world to convince me here. You don't have that."

"But I do!" Hope denied. "It's a real super secret thing they have the head researchers and engineers working on! But I'm a part of the project too since I'm the smartest person here! So I have access!"

Suddenly this "cool thing" was starting to sound like a dangerous thing. Dangerous for Sorun's health. Just to confirm, he asked, "The cool thing is... a military secret?"

Hope flinched back. "... I mean more a secret project, but yeah."

Sorun's brows furrowed. "You realize I'm a civilian visiting this base, right? And a foreign one at that? Not even a citizen of the Overlander UF? I don't have access to eighty percent of the base and the armed guards at every corner see fit to remind me every time I wander by one, and you want to take me to some restricted area to see some super secret project? Just to hear what I have to say?"

"There's nobody in there today. Everyone here works on multiple projects and nobody has a time slot filled in for this specific one,"

Hope explained. "I mean, it's not. The project only has a level-0 security clearance, which means a project head like me can clear you."

"Then why aren't we doing that?" Sorun asked.

"Because the paperwork for that kind of thing takes days and I don't know how much longer you'll be here."

Sorun made a derisive scoff. "Not that long, that's for sure."

"Well then all the more reason!" she exclaimed. "Listen, we can real quick, in and out. There's guards outside the facility doors, sure, but I ," she continued, smiling and thumping her stuck-out thumb against her chest, "know a way in so the guards won't see us!"

"That seems like a gross breach of site security."

The smile on the girl's mouth withered and her thumb, once tall and proud, shrunk to the recesses of her palm when her arm lowered. "Well, you still need a keycard to get in. Which I have, since I'm on the project."

"And this secret entrance is...?"

Hope's expression turned a bit sheepish at the question. "It's... a path through the air vents that lead into the supply closet. The closet's locked, so, you know, you'd need the card."

Okay. That made some semblance of sense, except... "You like stuffing yourself in small and enclosed spaces, don't you?"

"I-it's a habit," Hope admitted, seeming somewhat embarrassed. She held one arm with the other, continuing with, "I spent a large part of my life in a spaceship. It wasn't the most spacious place and they relied on me a lot if something went wrong since I could fix things and fit in the vents." She turned her head away from Sorun's gaze. "I really don't want to talk any more about it."

"Fair enough." He made a hum in thought. It did sound good, entertainment-wise. And the thought of seeing something he wasn't supposed to see did fill him with a sort of giddy anticipation, which was a welcome change from the normal mood. It was a good diversion. "All this for a bit of news?"

"Apparently," Hope grumbled. "It's not like I'm showing you something super dangerous or anything anyways," she continued. "It's just a thing I wanna... you'll see."

He didn't really bother listening to her beyond that point. Sorun's mind was already made up. "Okay. Let's go, then."

And thus, here he was. Crawling around the airducts like some kind of horror movie monster, trailing behind a girl years younger than him but had at least fifty IQ points over him. As was the trend of this world, among many more unpleasant ones. Such was life here.

Sorun's wasn't sure how Hope stood to be in here. Somewhere in the back of his mind he'd always wondered what it'd be like crawling in a vent like this after having done it in so many video games. Now he knew. The air was stuffy and uncomfortable to breath. The space was cramped. His knees hurt from crawling on them for so long. And it'd be completely pitch black if it weren't for the girl crawling in front of him holding a flashlight.

Still, it didn't really get to him. Just surface-level thoughts he wasn't paying much mind to. It was hard to take anything more seriously than all of the recent events that had been happening with him. His reason for coming to this place in the first place, and the answers he sought.

It got easier to keep going when he didn't put his mind on it. It's why he needed distractions, things to do, stimulation. All of which were on short supply in a military base, hence why he'd made this deal with Hope. All for the sake of seeing something cool.

He hated this woman.

Everything about her. Her bubbly attitude. That... nonchalant attitude of her that so sharply contrasted with him, his feelings, this whole situation he was in. The way she was carrying on so glibly despite the severity of the situation.

This was a doctor. Their preeminent "expert" on Chaos energy. Some accredited institution somewhere gave this woman a doctorate.

"-and it's just been so fascinating looking over your bloodwork! I realize we're from different zones and all but no samples of uncontaminated DNA from before the planet was bombarded by the gene bombs exist, so it's been interesting comparing your makeup to Overlander makeup!" She was rolling through the room in that little rolling chair, this Overlander woman who looked so "off" like almost every Overlander he saw. With green goddamn hair. "Of course I expected our kinds' genomes to vary somewhat wildly but I found numerous genetic markers within your DNA that we lack and-"

"I'm going to hurt you if you don't get to the point," Sorun said, voice dull and emotionless. The woman stopped rolling around, freezing while looking at him in startled surprise. He didn't care; three days was three days too long of this. "Tell me what's wrong with me so I can leave. I don't care about anything else."

"O-oh, uh, alright. Okay. Sorry." Nervously, she held a fist up to her mouth to clear her throat, and suddenly she was trying very hard not to make eye contact with the overbearing stare Sorun was sending her way. "I'm sorry if I got carried away, I just, well, this is a lifelong passion of mine and it's not everyday a one-of-a-kind research opportunity walks through the door so I just wanted to share-"

Sorun's eyes flared green. "Stop. Fucking. Talking." She did, mouth clamping shut and body hunching over slightly as she shrunk in. "Three days of hearing you ramble scientific jargon and I'm sick of it.

You're supposed to help me, so tell me what's wrong so I can leave. Fucking fix me ."

"I-it's not that simple," she meekly mumbled.

"You took over a liter of blood from my body," Sorun snapped. His harsh tone made the doctor flinch. "Put me in over a dozen machines to scan me, subjected me to every physical examination possible, poked and prodded me with needles, made me wait three days in some dismal room, and if all I get for all that is an 'it's not that simple' then-"

"Well I'm sorry but that's all I have!" she yelled. "You want to know what's wrong with you!? Nothing!"

"Nothing?" Sorun wiped at the blood seeping from his nose and flicked it onto the linoleum flooring. "This is nothing?"

There was a sudden shift. That meekness from earlier the doctor showed, it was nearly gone. There was anger on her face, and she was squeezing down on her clipboard hard enough that the plastic was audibly creaking. But even then there was the slightest bit of fear in her eyes.

"You wanna know what we found? This is what we found." She turned the clipboard around and enunciated every point by smacking the back of her hand on it, showing it to Sorun, even though he was too far away to actually read the paper clipped to it. "Your biometrics are completely normal! Okay!? Everything! Everything about you, bloodwork, blood pressure, organs, muscle, it's all normal! And we looked, Sorun, okay, we looked at every little detail we could think of but there's nothing , not a single thing, no irregularities, no anomalies, absolutely nothing we can find wrong with you! And you know, you know it isn't easy dealing with DNA that looks like yours, DNA that doesn't even compare to ours! But we're trying anyway, for you, and I've been working through whole nights to try and solve this, FOR YOU, so don't you DARE-!"

He moved. Faster than she could react, fast enough she'd become startled and shouted when he slapped the clipboard out from her hand, grabbed her by the scruff of her shirt, and then pulled her and her wheeled stool closer to him. She made a startled gasp, frozen in his grip with a fearful look on her face.

"... I'll do what I want. And what I want is to leave." He let her go and took a few steps back. The doctor righter herself, adjusting her shirt while keeping her wary eyes on Sorun. "I came here for one thing and you couldn't even get me that after bleeding me like a leech. So I'm gone."

"I-i-if you just gave us more time we could maybe-"

"I don't have time."

She opened her mouth to respond, but froze at Sorun's glare. Even when the green glow faded and his eyes turned blue and the blood continued to flow from his nose. He didn't stop until she'd turned away, and then he walked towards the door.

No more tests. No more bleeding. He just wanted to go home.

He sure could use something cool right about now.

"Alright, it's right here," came the whisper from Hope up ahead. She'd stopped crawling forwards and, somehow without Sorun noticing, had managed to contort herself so that her back was against one of the vent's walls while she was fiddling with something on the other wall. He realized at a single glance it was a ventilation grate and she was unscrewing the screws holding it in place with a small screwdriver she'd brought along while holding the flashlight in her mouth.

It hadn't taken much time. In short order the grate was removed and Hope had slid out the square hole after setting the grate and screws aside. Sorun followed, falling a short drop before landing flat on his feet in absolute darkness. The darkness disappeared a moment later at the sound of a click! , with light flooding in from a overhead lighting fixture. Sorun looked over to where he'd heard the click sound and saw Hope next to one of the walls, hand on a light switch.

He took a glance around at the room they were in. "Supply closet" was underselling it, albeit only a bit. It was less the size of a closet and more the size of a large shed. Concrete walls surrounded them, lined with metal shelves filled to the brim with metal boxes, all labelled with miscellaneous parts and materials. He didn't pay much mind to them; his eyes were on Hope as she made her way to the one door in the room.

"I'm still having a hard time believing you'd go this far just to hear what I have to say. I'd sooner believe you'd to this to avoid a scolding from the scary military commander concerning that chocolate," Sorun voiced out. Hope had stopped in front of the door, though she did turn her head to look at Sorun. "Is this the part where I walk through the door and get knocked out by an electrical trap or something along those lines? To be trapped as a research subject or some such?"

Her face scrunched in confusion. "What? No. Why would you..." She paused to think on Sorun's words, but then only ended up shaking her head again. "Ignoring how we met by accident why would you even think that?"

"Their history with Shadow doesn't paint a great light on G.U.N.'s ethical concerns regarding biological experimentation." Neither did everything did with him during those examinations.

Hope only sighed out and shook her head a third time, like she was disapproving of what she heard. "I know everything that happened to him was awful, but that was fifty years ago and a completely different administration," she said, turning back to the door. She started fishing around in her pocket for something. "G.U.N.'s not like that anymore."

"So everyone keeps saying," Sorun demurred, watching as Hope pulled out a plastic card with a cord attached. It had Hope's face printed out along with a bunch of words he was too lazy to read. "You didn't deny an ulterior motive," he pointed out.

"You this suspicious of everyone you meet?" Hope grumbled out. She gripped the plastic card tight, but instead of slotting it into the card reader bolted to the wall next to the door she turned to fully address Sorun. "But since we're on the topic of ulterior motives..."

Sorun's head cocked to the side a few centimeters. A spark of curiosity flared up in him alongside a bit of wariness. His eyes flitted about the room until he'd spotted a wrench resting on a nearby shelf. He memorized the wrench's location and looked back to Hope. "Trying to get an early helping?" he asked.

"It's... er..." Hope hung her head a bit, sounding a bit embarrassed. "It's important to me."

"Is it now?" Sorun cautiously answered. He inched a bit closer to the wrench. "I haven't received what I was promised yet."

She didn't respond. In fact, it looked like Hope was visibly struggling to get the words out. It was a strange sight for Sorun, seeing the girl stand there and fidget nervously with the plastic card in her hands. It also set off a few warning bells in his head and caused him to move a bit closer to the wrench so that it was in grabbing range. He made it halfway before Hope had taken a deep breath and picked her head up.

"Just tell me if everyone there is doing alright, Sorun! Please!" she hollered out. Loudly, enough that Sorun stilled and hoped in the back of his mind that this rooms was well insulated against sound. It's caught him off guard, though. He hadn't expected her to yell.

"Excuse me?"

"Well... They, the Freedom Fighters, I mean, saved my life once. And I lived with them for a really long time after," Hope mumbled out. The fire from that burst from earlier had died out really quickly when she got Sorun looking at her. "When I left for here I never really had a chance to say goodbye to them even though I'd grown really close with them all, so... look, we're already here, I'm gonna show you what I promised, so please. Please just tell me. Is everyone doing alright? Over there?"

"Oh." Sorun stopped moving towards the wrench, and then forgot about it entirely as he crossed his arms while leaning back on a shelf. "Fine... since we're here. As far as I'm aware nothing's really changed all that much," he confessed. "Visit them yourself if you're so concerned."

"I can't exactly pack up and leave whenever I want, Sorun," Hope grumbled out. She gripped the ID card more tightly and turned back around towards the card reader. "It's called AWOL, ever heard of it?"

"You're a little young to be military personnel."

Hope's hand stopped halfway to the card reader. Her head turned back around to reveal an unimpressed look on her face. "You really wanna go down this road with me? I could think circles around you." She made a scoffing sound and turned back to the card reader. "Most of the projects in this place only work 'cause I'm around so they don't look too closely at my age."

Still seemed irresponsible to a degree, but Sorun didn't care enough to comment any further. Nor did he want to now that Hope had latched onto his one weakness: not being a super genius like a lot of people in this world. He didn't want the knife to be driven further in.

"Hmf..." He looked down at his hands and began picking at his fingernails. "Can't even exchange letters? No means of communication?"

"Nope."

"Hm." Sorun supposed he had the means of fixing that. He wasn't gonna. "Antoine and Bunnie got married a while back."

"Oh, they did!?" Goddammit, he shouldn't have said anything. When Hope turned around with a big smile on her face it caused the card she'd been using to be stuck halfway in the card reader. She hadn't finished. "That's really great for them! Bunnie spent a lot of time taking care of me since I didn't have anyone else, so it' great to hear she'd doing good." She paused, face twitching a bit. "Does, uh... did she diversify any of her recipes to include anything not carrot-based?"

"No," Sorun said. "Antoine cooks for the both of them most of the time. And does the cleaning. And the laundry. He's kind of a neat freak."

"Heh heh, yeah." Thankfully, Hope turned back around to continue swiping the card. "Well, it's great to hear things are going alright. I always kind of worry about them since they're always fighting you-know-who."

"Mm." Sorun saw a red light on the card reader turn green after Hope swiped her card. A small clunk! was heard from inside the door. "You dragged me all the way here just to hear that, huh?"

Pocketing the card, Hope turned back around to give Sorun a skeptical look. "I did straight-up ask and you decided to play games and have us end up here. You seem like the kind of person who messes with people for no reason."

"I would never," Sorun lied. "If you don't like it here so much for them restricting you just quit."

"And that's the thing, I like the work I do here. I don't want to leave," Hope said. "I just... things were a bit different is all. But it's fine. Come on, it's through here."

She opened the doorway and stepped through it, with Sorun following after. He didn't follow far as the adjacent room was bathed in darkness, and he had to wait in the entranceway of the supply closet as Hope went to go flip the light switches. They must have been heavy switches, too, because after a handful of seconds he heard a series of loud clunks! go off from above him. One heavy clunk and a row of industrial lights hanging overhead on the ceiling would flip on. Another clunk, another set of lights. Enough that eventually the entire room was bathed in soft blue halogen lights.

The first thing he noted was all the computer consoles everywhere. The really long machines that took up half the length of a room lined with keyboards and in-built monitors, in rows and surrounding the room. There was a second level of raised platforms up above connected to some stairs in the back leading to more computers. Here and there were apparatuses erecting panes of glass with projected numbers and figures displayed on the glass. None of this seemed suspicious - standard equipment and little else. Sorun wasn't even paying attention to it. It was what was in the center of the room that was drawing his attention.

In the center of the room was a large, circular platform, maybe raised an inch off the ground. On it was it : the cool thing Hope had brought him here to see. There was a particularly large spotlight on the ceiling shining down directly on it. Upon first seeing it Sorun had reflexively tilted his head backwards, blinking at the sight of it. He hadn't even known what to expect coming here but this was strange enough that it was defying nonexistent expectations. Upon initial inspection he wasn't even sure what he was looking at.

"What am I looking at...?" Sorun wondered out aloud. He found himself stepping towards the object at the center of the room, almost unconsciously. Like a compulsion deep inside was drawing Sorun towards it.

"It just fell out of the sky one day out of nowhere," Hope said. "G.U.N. confiscated it and we've been studying it ever since."

"Just like that?" Sorun turned his eyes to Hope. "Just-" he snapped his fingers, "-from out of nowhere?"

She nodded. "Yeah. Right in the middle of one of the cities."

"Huh..." Sorun turned to look back at the item of his fixation. "It's a plane."

Or at least used to be a plane. Specifically a fighter jet that had been mangled beyond all reason, enough that it was a miracle Sorun could even make out that it had, at one point, been a jet. The entire front of the jet, the nose and the cockpit, was just completely gone. Replaced by a twisted mass of burnt metal and melted wires. Really, the entire jet itself wasn't in a much better state. Sorun wasn't even sure looking at the thing that there wasn't a single undamaged portion of the vehicle. It was scorched and rent all over, exposing mechanical innards. Pieces were hanging off here and there. One of the wings was entirely missing. It was unquestionably a wreck, totally and completely. Practically scrap.

Still, there was... something. Something about it that was holding Sorun's unceasing attention and refusing to let go. Ignoring the wounds and missing parts, if he squinted his eyes to get just the general shape of it, he could imagine how this had once been a sleek fighter jet. Slim, extremely advanced. It was hard to tell to what degree because of all the damage, but it was clear this jet had something going for it.

"This is a military secret?" Sorun mumbled. He'd stepped up onto the display platform, slowly circling the plane as he continued to examine it. He noted that in front of the remaining wing was a smaller stabilizing wing; he assumed there had been a matching one on the side with the missing wing. Hope had stepped up alongside him, hands on her hips as she examined the ruined jet. There was a small frown on her face.

"It's weird," she said. An assertion Sorun wholly agreed with, but her tone had him glancing at her.

"Weird how?"

"It's weird because there aren't many civilizations in the world with the industry to make something like this," Hope said. "There's the United Federation and the G.U.N. military branch, but we didn't make this. There's the Republic of Acorn, but this doesn't fit any of their designs, they never contacted us about it, and our satellites never detected anything taking off from their direction."

Sorun didn't comment on that.

"Eggman didn't make this. Again, not his design," Hope continued. "Same story with Station Square. I guess it's possible some independent person or group somewhere out there, some hidden genius, could have made this, but that's kind of a stretch." She cocked her head, squinting an eye while giving the plane a discerning look. "Also I've never seen this design. From anywhere. Nobody in G.U.N. has for that matter. I couldn't get into its systems because there are no systems anymore, it's completely fried, and the lab technicians and I aren't even sure how this thing was put together in the first place."

"What do you mean?"

Hope's frown deepened. "There's no fuel tank. Or at least, we couldn't find one. I don't know, the entire front of the plane is smashed so maybe it just fell out and we never found it, but... there's no space for one. Which doesn't make any sense."

Sorun cocked an eyebrow. "So what does it run on?"

"That's the part I can't figure out." Hope rose a hand up to scratch at her head as she continued looking down at the plane. Her eyes were scanning over its frame, face scrunched in concentration like she was trying to decipher some puzzle. "There's batteries for the electrical systems and engines to propel the thing like you'd expect but I can't figure out what actually powered them. The fuel tank must have just been lost, that has to be it. It's the only thing that makes sense."

Humming, Sorun looking further down the plane. Directly on top of the plane, behind the center but in front of the engines, parallel to either side, there were two metal plates that seemed out of place. A large piece of sheet metal was welded to either side. He could see a corner of one of the metal plates was peeled upwards, as if somebody had opened it with tools - likely one of the lab technicians or maybe even Hope. There didn't seem to be anything of note underneath the plate, though. Just more wiring and loose parts.

The oddest thing was the engines, Sorun realized. There were two angled tail fins on either side of the engines, and the engines themselves looked off. Extremely off. They were big, for one, so big that it almost looked like the two engines sticking out from the back of the jet didn't even fit on it. They were skeletonized, too, lacking plating to expose the burnt wiring and circuitry beneath it, and with gaps all throughout its framework that let Sorun see inside the engine itself. Wasn't much to see but a bunch of bips, bops, and metal parts, none of which he could identify. To his eyes it just looked like a chaotic mish-mash of pieces.

"And there's other things, too, like these engines," Hope continued, walking over to one of the engines while gesticulating at them with her hand. "These aren't the dedicated engines to this jet."

Sorun glanced up at her. "You don't even know what this jet is, how can you be su-?"

"Because I looked at it, duh," she said, as if that explained it. "They're too big, and it looks like somebody stripped out parts on the jet's rear just to fit these things. And the internal construction is completely different than the rest of the plane." She walked back forwards, stopping and pointing at the two plates on top of the jet. "And this, these plates. These look like hardpoints on a fighter jet you'd attach weapons to, but it's like somebody completely stripped them out without replacing the weapons so they just covered it with metal. There's other spots like that, too, just a bunch of gaps in the plane missing things. There's an empty undercarriage I'm pretty sure is supposed to hold some kind of weapon, but there's nothing, not even a launch system of some kind for missiles." She looked back ahead to the front of the plane, raising her hand up and then letting it flop back to her side while breathing out in an exhausted manner. "Somebody completely disarmed this thing. They made a textbook fighter jet and then butchered it while splicing a completely different jet's engines in it at the same time."

"Huh." A real head scratcher in the literal sense, because this was making Sorun scratch his head. "So... you got a real mystery, huh?" he concluded.

"Yeah, tell me about it," Hope sighed out. "I have no idea what any of it means and nobody else does. There's not much to even look at because this thing is totaled, and none of it answers why anybody would do... anything that happened with this thing." She crouched down, staring intensely at the jet as if doing so hard enough would cause it to answer her. "Why make a plane like this and then refit it so heavily? How'd it even get like this...?"

No answer came from Sorun, mostly stemming from the fact that he knew much less about jets than Hope did and thus had less to say on the matter. He could say she was right, though. This WAS weird. But there was still something nagging at him from the back of his mind, something he couldn't quite put his finger one. Looking at this jet was making something ping off in mind, but he couldn't pin down what. It was just a feeling.

Pursing his lips, Sorun crouched down to get a closer look. He hummed again, eyes widening a bit when he saw there was a somewhat intact section here. On the side of the jet, right there. A big patch of unmarred black paint that had somehow managed to make it unscathed, unlike the rest of the plane.

He turned his head a bit, and then clicked his tongue. Wait. It wasn't black paint. It was red. A deep, crimson red paint so dark that looking at it in a certain angle in the light made it appear black. And in the center of the unmarked patch of plane were letters. Large, white captial letters stamped right there in the middle:

That was it. Everything past the "V" was scratched off entirely, as that's where the intact paint and hull ended. The "V" itself looked strange, as well. The second arm of the "V" looked a bit askew of the first, and only half of it was visible since the paint terminated at that point. It made the two arms of the "V" look extremely uneven.

"Weird..." Breathing a slow breath through his nose, Sorun reached out and touched the surface of the plane. He noticed the change immediately, the slight buzzing he felt. Looking closer Sorun was shocked to see small blue electrical sparks were flowing out of his hand and sinking into the plane.

And then, he heard something. A quiet, metallic groan from inside the plane. He looked closer, leaning in and peering in through one of the shredded sides of the plane. It was there Sorun saw the sight that shocked him completely: some of the jet's innards, sprockets and screws and gaskets, other random parts, they were moving. Changing . Large cracks in gears were sealing and nuts and bolts cracked in two were joining together and recombining, as if the parts themselves were regenerating. Some of the parts were skittering along the jet's innards, slotting themselves into various positions and screwing themselves into place.

In a panic, Sorun removed his hand. The sparks on his hand disappeared, and the parts stopped moving. The jet was dead again.

"Hey, what's going over there?" Still frozen on the spot, Sorun watched as Hope walked over to his side. She glanced at him and then looked down at the plane. "What was that sound?"

"Sound...?"

"Yeah, like, skittering. I dunno. Thought I heard something." She looked back at Sorun. "Am I just hearing things? You didn't see anything?"

Sorun didn't answer. What he did instead was wordlessly reach out and grab one of Hope's wrist. She made a surprised sound, but otherwise did nothing but watch as Sorun planted her palm flatly on the surface of the plane.

... Nothing was happening. The pieces inside the plane were completely still and inert and there weren't any strange, electrical sparks. Sorun narrowed his eyes to look closer to make sure he wasn't missing anything, but no. The plane was still dead.

"Uh, Sorun?" Hope voiced. He realized he was still holding her hand against the plane. "What are you doing?"

"... Hope, feel this," Sorun said. He moved her hand around a bit so it slid over the surface of the jet. "The feel of the jet's exterior, its texture. You feel that?"

"Yeah...?"

"Hope. I think I've made an important discovery." He locked eyes directly with Hope, and with the most serious expression he could muster, said, "This jet... is made of metal."

He didn't think anyone had ever given him a look quite like the one Hope was giving him. It was a mixture of disgust and disappointment. She pulled her wrist out of his grip, muttered out, "You're a weirdo," and walked back to the other side of the jet to continue examining it. He watched her leave, and it was only when she was on the other side of the jet that he got down on one knee and placed his own hand on the jet.

More blue, electrical sparks sparked out from the point of contact of his hand and the jet. The parts inside were moving again. Cracks in the internal structure healing and disappearing. Loose wiring slithering over the interior like snakes and inserting their ends into sockets on the inside. He could even see the edges of the torn metal exposing the interior began growing and expanding. Like a cut on someone's arm healing over.

There was a wetness on his upper lip. Sorun didn't need to see the drop of crimson fall off his face to know what it was that was dripping out of his nose. What was intriguing to see was that one drop of blood hit the interior of the jet. That, as soon as the blood came to rest on the metal, it began to discolor and distort. The deep crimson color was transitioning to a dull gray and the liquid was rising up, reshaping itself into the shape of a small cog and then hardening. And then after a few seconds there was no drop of blood. Just a small cog skittering over the jet's innards to insert itself somewhere.

Again, Sorun removed his hand from the jet, and again, everything fell still and dead.

"... VERY curious," Sorun thought to himself. He winced - he felt lightheaded all of a sudden. A much more mild version of the exhaustion he felt whenever his eyes glowed green. He didn't know what to feel about that. For some reason just being near this thing was having him on edge now.

"Okay, I know I heard something that time." When he wasn't looking Hope had stepped back to his side; he made sure to quickly wipe the blood from his face. She was looking down at the plane intently, but there was a hint of frustration in her face. "Seriously, what do I keep hearing?"

Sorun hummed in consideration. Eyes flickered to Hope, and then the jet. A few thoughts ran through his head, making his features momentarily wrinkle, but then they relaxed when he came to a decision. "I really don't know what you're talking about," Sorun lied. "I've been staring at the same thing you have. Maybe something inside came loose. You see how busted up it is."

"Hrm... maybe," Hope hesitantly agreed. "I wish it wasn't so damaged. Otherwise we could learn something about it, but... ugh." She rubbed at her forehead. "I think Commander Tower is considering just dumping this thing in a storage site somewhere. It's been a months of examinations with exactly zero results."

Sorun couldn't find himself sympathizing with her plight. His interest began and ended with the jet. "Mhm."

"Do you two think this may be a problem?" Shadow asked from behind the both of them.

The first emotion Sorun felt was amusement. The impish kind of thrill one would feel being caught doing something they shouldn't. When he looked over at Hope he saw she'd froze right up, her face set in panic. He almost laughed out at the sight, but managed to keep on a neutral expression that in no way displayed the mirth he felt on the inside. They turned around in unison, and, once again, Sorun had to internally fight himself to not so much as break out a smile.

Yep, there was Shadow there. His arms crossed. He wouldn't go as far as to say he looked infuriated, but on the other hand Sorun couldn't say he'd ever seen his scowl go that deep before. His face was practically smoldering. And he could have sworn he heard Hope gulp from besides him.

"Explain," Shadow demanded.

Not one to waste an opportunity, Sorun pointed right at Hope, and with a straight face, said, "Shadow, this child revealed unto me government secrets without telling me they were, in fact, military secrets. I'm completely innocent and non-complicit in this. This is all Hope's fault."

"I don't believe you," Shadow immediately responded. Sorun shrugged - an act that seemed to inflame Shadow's mood even more - and did nothing else. There wasn't enough effort in the lie for it to be effective.

"Huh!?" Hope whirled to Sorun, betrayal written on her face. It caused Sorun to feel a bit more amusement. "You- but- none of that is true at all!"

"A barefaced lie," Sorun denied. "She practically dragged me here without saying a word."

A loud sigh was breathed out from Shadow's nose as he pinched at his forehead. Now he just looked stressed and mildly angry. "What are you hoping to gain here saying all this nonsense, Sorun?"

For the first time since Shadow showed up Sorun spoke the truth. "I'm bored. This is slightly funny."

"Breaking into a secure military facility is funny to you?"

"Yeah." He could have sword he saw veins bulge on Shadow's face when Sorun said that. Once again he pointed at Hope. "And I didn't break into anything. She really did let me in here."

Smoldering. That was the word that came to Sorun's mind when he looked at Shadow's face. The hedgehog seemed completely done with Sorun and slowly turned his head to Hope. Sorun could swear he did it so slowly he could hear the vertebrae in his neck grind together, like a statue of some kind. "Hope?" he asked. "I'd like to know what possessed you to show a civilian classified G.U.N. material."

She was fidgeting in place and rubbing at her arm so fast Sorun was convinced she was gonna wear the shirt's sleeve out. "Well... technically this is only a class-0 on the classification scale which means civilians can see it with the permission of a project h-head, which, um, you know I am, so really technically it's not like any rules were-"

"Which is dependent on express permission from the Commander, which I doubt you conveniently forgot since you saw fit to sneak past the guards," Shadow cut in.

"Eek!" She stepped back, as if struck. Her eyes turned fearful yet defiant as she shot back with, "Well it's not like he ever says no to me anyways so-!"

"So why not ask in this case?"

Another verbal blow that seemed to weaken Hope's constitution. She withered back, mumbling out in a defeated tone, "I... just wanted to know how everyone in New Mobotropolis was doing and Sorun wouldn't have said anything otherwise." And then she stomped her foot down and pointed at Sorun, yelling, "And he was gonna tell Commander Tower I was skimming from the supply of chocolate!"

"He forced you to do this?" This was one of those rare occasions Sorun got to see Shadow surprised. He looked at him, eyes slightly widening with a disbelieving look on his face. "Sorun, you blackmailed Hope?"

"That's a really strong and accurate word, Shadow, blackmail," Sorun unashamedly responded. "Honestly. You're better than that."

" Why ?" Now he just confused, uncomprehending. Struggling to understand the logic being put before him. "Why would you even consider doing something like this? Or is this looping back into your idea of 'fun'?"

Sorun shrugged. "It was mostly a spur-of-the-moment whim. Quite simply I just felt like messing with her," he said, and then glanced at the jet, ignoring Hope's glare. "I didn't expect I'd get to see your little mystery jet here, that was just a bonus, but hey. Here we are now." He locked eyes with Shadow. It was clear from that glare he was trying to elicit some reaction in Sorun, but he wasn't budging. The only look Sorun offered to give back to Shadow was an apathetic, neutral stare that conveyed little to no emotion at all. "How'd you even know we were here?"

"I was looking for you and heard you and Hope crawling through the ducts. My ears are very good."

"Huh." That solved one mystery. "So what happens now?"

Shadow had blinked. There was no other visible reaction, not so much as a twitch in Shadow's facial structure, but the blink alone said enough. Apparently the look Sorun was shooting back did have some effect. Enough for that blink and enough for him to pause to consider his next words. Eventually he did speak. "Hope... we will speak of this later." He stepped forwards, the metal of his sneakers slamming against the metal platform sounding almost like loud stomps as he grabbed at Sorun's wrist. " You are coming with me back to your room," he growled out as he yanked Sorun forwards to walk with him.

Sorun chuckled, walking along while glancing over his shoulder at Hope. "Be seein' ya," he said, though he wasn't even sure Hope heard him. Too absorbed in guilt and worry based on that look on her face, looking down at her sneakers in an effort to not look at anything else. He knew that look - his own mother made him have the same look in his youth.

The memory worked wonders in wiping the smirk off Sorun's face as Shadow lead him away.

He wouldn't comment on the fact that when they'd arrived at Sorun's temporary quarters Shadow had released his wrist by near throwing him in - he figured he earned that. He would have commented on the fact that Shadow slammed on the button to close the room's door hard enough he saw some cracks in the wall, but figured that would just exacerbate the matters. So Sorun's next choice of action was to do the only thing he felt like doing: the ol' stand and stare. So he simply stood there to look at Shadow.

"What is going on in that head of yours?" Shadow demanded. "I question a lot of things about you but at the very least I expect a certain level of competency out of you, so you'll have to explain to me how this situation came about."

Stress. Anger. Confusion. None of it was conveyed on Shadow's face - barely anything was ever conveyed on his face. Sorun was convinced it was frozen in that scowl. His voice was another thing, the way he sounded, the clear frustration underneath it all. He supposed it was all warranted with what just happened. And yet alas... Sorun was finding a hard time at caring.

"What more is there to say?" Sorun asked. "Hope wanted something of me and I asked for something in return. Showing me that jet? That was her choice."

"Don't even try pinning this on Hope, we both know you know better," Shadow denied. "You were looking for an excuse to stir up trouble and jumped at the first opportunity."

"Well of course I did, Shadow," Sorun said, "you know how bored I am here? I can't understand how you manage to live on a military base."

The frustration grew so great on Shadow's face that some of his teeth were being bared. "Are you trying to get yourself thrown in a brig?"

"Do it, Shadow. I'm dying anyway, you might as well."

And just like that all the frustration evaporated from Shadow's demeanor. He blinked a few times, face screwed purely in confusion, and then straightened out into somber understanding. His shoulders began sagging as he regarded Sorun in a much calmer tone.

"I'd... heard some things that happened between you and the physician, part of the reason I was looking for you, but it's truly that bad?"

"Oh, no." Sorun shook his head, causing some confusion to creep into Shadow's face. "According to that doctor I'm the healthiest person in the world. She says there's not a thing wrong with me." Sorun leaned forwards a bit. "We both know that ain't true, though, don't we, Shadow? I wouldn't be bleeding and passing out left and right if that were true."

A part of Shadow's face flinched. He looked a bit uncomfortable now. "To call anything surrounding you a fringe science would be an understatement, Sorun, you can't expect-"

"I came here for results and they couldn't give me any, Shadow, I don't need to think any further than that. These people are useless."

"That doesn't give you an excuse to threaten her like you did!" Shadow shouted. Despite his voice being raised Sorun remained still as a statue, continuing to stare at Shadow. It caused him to grunt out in resignation, make him shake his head as he turned towards the small desk pushed against the room's wall. "I had to talk her down from filing a former complaint, Sorun. Do you understand there's precious little I can do to help you if incidents like these reach the Commander?"

An unamused breath left Sorun. He leaned his torso back, saying, "The most they could do is detain me for a few days until somebody from the Republic comes to collect me. I'm a foreign citizen, and somewhat of a known one since I saved the life of every single person in that Republic. Multiple times over," he said, voice blank and cold. "And keep in mind, I'm on a clock, Shadow. Wanna wonder how bad a diplomatic incident it'd be if I died in G.U.N. custody? I'm too radioactive to hold onto for long. So I'll stir up as much trouble as I please. A little amusement is the least these people owe me for making me waste my time here."

"Absolutely none of that condones-!" Shadow stopped himself when he saw something lying on the desk he was standing next to. A sheet of paper with its surface completely covered in writing. The first thing his eyes glanced over was the title of the paper. "'Last Will and Testament-'"

Sorun's eyes flashed green. He'd bolted forwards in speeds that seemed to mildly surprise Shadow as he snatched the paper off the desk and folded it away into one of his pockets before stepping back. The whole exchange only lasted half a second, after which Sorun's eyes dimmed back to their blue color as a small stream of blood dripped out of his nose. Shadow blinked once and looked at Sorun expectantly.

"... It gets boring in this room," Sorun quietly mumbled out. He wiped the blood away using the sleeve on his coat and sat down on the small cot right next to the desk. "The isolation can bring a man to do all sorts of silly things to pass time. What you saw meant nothing. Ignore it. It doesn't exist."

"It... of course it doesn't." Shadow began sagging again, eyes becoming half-lidded as a tired sigh left him. He pulled the chair out from the desk, turning it around so it faced Sorun and then sitting down in the chair so the two sitting males could be facing one another. "Do you have any sort of plan?" And just like that every topic before that sentence vanished, like it was never a concern for Shadow. It was all Sorun could do to show his thanks by playing it straight.

"Less a plan and more loose threads to follow, but it's something," Sorun said. "I doubt the doctors at New Mobotropolis can tell me anything, but I'll give it a shot anyway. If and when that fails... well, I was thinking of that one guy. Finitevus."

It only took a second for resignation to flash over Shadow's features. "That insane echidna doctor with the white fur that caused that Enerjak incident multiple times over? You're desperate enough to go to him?"

"If you were in my situation and knew what's waiting for me on the other side you'd be desperate, too, Shadow," Sorun coldly cut in. "It's nothing. In case you forgot."

The hedgehog didn't seem to have a retort for that. He just sat back in the chair, quietly regarding Sorun while waiting for him to continue.

When it became obvious he wasn't going to speak Sorun decided to do so.

"It's not actually as crazy as you think. Believe it or not he mellowed out somewhat as a result of the disaster that second Enerjak attempt was," Sorun continued. "He owes me for bailing him and the whole world out of that one, and I don't see him turning me down. And if he does I'm just gonna threaten to kill him if he doesn't help."

There hadn't been any maliciousness behind Sorun's words when he said that. No hate, no discontent, no emotion that could be called overly negative or even positive. It was just said as statement of fact. It made Shadow pause. Made his eyes widen a fraction before returning to normal. Made him clasp his gloved hands and drum his fingers over his knuckles as the two sat in silence for over a minute. Finally, he looked up and spoke.

"Sorun, I'm going to speak freely," Shadow began. "I can understand you were hopeful the doctors could tell you something and that the current stress of the situation added on top of everything else you've had to endure isn't easy. And you've usually weathered such things well. But everyone, even I, have a limit, Sorun, and I'm starting to suspect you're reaching yours."

"Is that your official observation, Mr. Special Agent?"

"It's that. That attitude," Shadow pointed out, voice growing harder. "Your flippant disregard for rules and protocol, borderline abandonment of respect, going out of your way to incite trouble, the violent threats against a doctor trying to help you and now you're plotting to threaten murder just to have your way?"

An airy laugh left Sorun. "You didn't have any objections the last time we planned to murder a mad scientist."

"Those were entirely different circumstances, Sorun, and you..." Shadow stopped himself when Sorun gave him a pointed look. He sighed, shook his head and tried again. "I'm getting worried about you," he said, in a voice that made it sound like he really had to force that out. It even seemed like just saying that caused him physical harm. "Not just about your physical health but what this is doing to you. You're growing erratic, impulsive." A beat passed between the two. "Multiple soldiers reported you stood in place and stared out a window for eight hours straight. None of this is normal behavior, Sorun."

He did that? Sorun didn't recall. Likewise the news didn't elicit any strong emotions out of him. "How would you like me to act? Given the circumstances?"

"That's not what I'm asking."

"Then what are you asking?"

"I..." Shadow trailed off, seemingly at a loss for words. He ended up hanging his head, muttering out, "I'm not sure how I'm supposed to help you."

Sorun found the words... valid, after closely studying Shadow's face. There was one, precisely one, moment in all the time he knew Shadow where there was a profound expression of emotion on the hedgehog's face. It was around twenty minutes before he died for the first time, when he told him all those Chaos Emeralds he absorbed were killing him. He'd looked so emotionally outraged Sorun could barely recognize him. And he remembered with some amusement he'd punched him in the face so hard that, if it weren't for Devil's Body, Sorun had no doubt his entire head would have just disappeared with that one strike.

The face Shadow had on right now wasn't anywhere close to those levels, not nearly, but there were vestiges of that expression underneath the face he currently wore. The words Shadow were saying were genuine - he really was worried. Sorun doubted he was more worried than he was over his own health, but the sentiment was appreciated.

"It's not as if I want to go around threatening people, Shadow, but I have my life to consider here," Sorun spoke out. "I've precious few options, so I'll do what's needed."

"I wasn't trying to dissuade you." Shadow looked up. "I just feel the need to point out how uncharacteristic you're acting."

Sorun drummed the tips of his fingers against each other. He leaned forwards on the bed, hunched hunched slightly while angling his head up to maintain eye contact with Shadow. "It's not something that can be helped until I fix this, I don't think," he said. "It's all I can think about. I try to busy myself with anything else but it's getting less and less effective."

"Is that what this is all about?" Shadow asked. There was a small hint of understanding in his voice. "You're just trying to distract yourself?"

Sorun didn't want to answer, instead saying, "If you really want to help me, Shadow, then tell me when I can leave." He stopped leaning forwards in a hunch and straightened his back. "I would like to go home."

"Then you can leave. We're not holding you. One word to the Commander and we can have a helicopter-"

"No, no aircraft," Sorun said, immediately shaking his head.

Shadow simply blinked. "Why not?"

"Aircraft are noisy. Loud. Noticeable," Sorun answered. "If you use a helicopter to bring me back you'll have to call New Mobotropolis and request landing permission. Everyone will see it touch down and know I'm right there. My friends might flock out of worry for me." He shook his head. "I don't want that. I really can't handle it right now. I'd like it better if you just teleported me to the outskirts of the city so I can walk home without there being a huge spectacle."

An immediate response didn't come from Shadow. He didn't break eye contact from Sorun, though his expression did grow a bit remorseful. "Then you'll have to wait a bit."

"Why?"

"I have a mission," Shadow said. "One I have to sortie for in an hour. The processing and paperwork I'd need to get through to take the Chaos Emerald we brought back out of storage so I can use to to teleport you back would take too long to complete. So you'll have to wait until I get back."

Figured. Bureaucracy wins the day again. "Okay. That's fine," Sorun said, not finding any viable ground to argue the point. "How long?"

"A few hours. I doubt longer than five."

All Sorun did was hum. It wasn't the most ideal, but it was tolerable. Enough that he could accept it. Fine. He'd just wait some more. "Well... if you have some time, then let's talk about something less serious. I don't like serious stuff," Sorun proposed. He leaned back a bit on the bed while folding one of his legs over his knee. "I'm surprised you're not trying to chew my head off over the whole secret jet thing."

"It's only because that was a class-0 object that I'm managing to restrain myself," Shadow flatly responded.

"Mm, is that all it was? No nepotism on your part to try and spare a little girl's feelings?" He'd never at all seen Maria and never had her description described to him, but from everything Sorun knew both she and Hope were tangentially biologically related to Robotnik. He wouldn't be surprised if there was a resemblance there proving a weakness for Shadow. It's the only explanation Sorun saw why they were basically being let off with a slap on the wrist. He had enough tact not to say something like that directly, though.

"That 'little girl' is the reason why I disagree with the Commander giving such prestigious positions out on merit alone without considering any other factor," Shadow bit out. "Hope being G.U.N.'s most talented engineer doesn't detract from the fact she's a child with a matching maturity. You get situations like this."

"Yeah. You didn't deny it."

Shadow's eyes widening a fraction but then quickly corrected themselves. Sorun saw it for what it was: being caught having made a mistake and quickly moving to try and correct it. Too late, though. "Since we're on the topic what's your take on it?" Shadow asked. "I know the researchers have been pulling hairs out trying to figure it out and they've come up with precisely nothing. The Commander's starting to consider it a dead-end waste of resources and something to be tossed in storage. I was wondering if a fresh pair of eyes would gleam something."

Oh, they did. They did more than simply "gleam" something. What that something was, Sorun wasn't sure. He wanted to ask some questions first. "I dunno, man, seems like a real mystery," he said to Shadow. "What exactly was its deal? How'd it show up?"

"Hmm..." Humming, Shadow crossed his arms while leaning against the back of the chair he was sitting in, likely recalling some piece of information in his brain. "Based on the reports I read, that plane just fell out of the sky right in the center of Spagonia three months ago. There's wasn't any warning, no sign of anything, the air defense radars didn't even pick anything up. It simply showed up out of nowhere." He paused. "It crushed a number of pedestrians who just happened to be in the area. There were four deaths in total."

"Unfortunate," Sorun commented. "Hope mentioned its weapons were stripped out."

"Yes, but why that is is as much a mystery as the plane itself," Shadow said. "The plane was severely damaged in the crash, as you saw, but according to the engineers it was heavily damaged before it even touched the ground. There's no footage of it before crashing so there's no definitive proof to corroborate that, but they said some of the damage markings confirm it. I'm in line to trust them on this. Especially considering the body."

Sorun's head twitched up a bit. "There was a body? The pilot?"

"Yes..." Shadow face scrunched a bit, making an unpleasant face. "You saw the cockpit, though. Or lack thereof. What we pulled from the wreckage wasn't a body. It was a few charred, bloody smears and a handful of ruined meat. I saw it myself when I oversaw the collection at Spagonia."

Sorun tapped his fingers against his knee. A few seconds passed. "That was all?"

"The rest was either lost in whatever initially destroyed the plane and/or likely scattered over the land as the plane fell. There'd be no accounting for anything else at that point." Shadow shook his head. "DNA analysis was inconclusive as well. The heat damage was simply too severe and degraded what little DNA we could scrape together. The biologists gave up and decided to place the remains in cryogenic storage, but they're about as helpful in solving this mystery as the plane itself."

"Mn. What a yucky image," Sorun said. His hand stopped tapping, relaxing motionlessly on his knee. "Wish I could help, but I'm not an engineer, Shadow. I deliver stuff. If you want an expert opinion go ask Tails."

"It's against protocol to bring non-staff into matters such as this. Speaking of which," he said, voice growing a bit sharper, "I would normally be forced to have you sign forms swearing you to secrecy, but because I doubt you'd hold them in high regard and I'm trusting you not to go spouting your mouth off, I'm trusting you won't breath a word of this matter to anyone over in the Republic of Acorn. Or anywhere else."

"No reason to, don't worry," Sorun truthfully admitted. It seemed to cause some relief to Shadow, making him sigh out a bit and release some tension in his face. "But that's really all you got? A busted mystery plane and some rancid mystery meat? Practically nothing to go on."

"There wasn't a blackbox. No identifying marks except for the two letters on the side, no existing models in G.U.N. databases to compare it to. Nothing. I don't blame the Commander for wanting to wash his hands of it. It seems like a fruitless avenue to pursue for how little we've turned up."

Sorun's fingers tapped against his knee. "I guess," he said. "That's fair," he continued, a bit quieter. And then, in a blink, Sorun loudly clapped his hands together. It didn't startle Shadow at all, in fact he didn't react the slightest bit to it, though his eyes did track Sorun as he stood up off the cot. And then he said, "I will go somewhere to wait for you to return. This room is dreary and I won't be spending another second in here."

The term "spartan" was a generous one to describe this room. Calling it "gray" would be more apropos, because that's all it was. Gray walls and a metal bedframe with an uncomfortable cot. Even the desk itself was metal - it made a common desk one would see at a high school on Earth look like an expensive desk found in a government official's office. They were his quarters for the duration of his stay on this base. He wouldn't be sad to never see it again. It reminded him too much of how his New Mobotropolis house used to look.

"If you want." Shadow gave a small shrug and lifted himself out of the desk's chair - also an uncomfortable monstrosity that Sorun would melt down if he had the means. "And Sorun," he continued, "I realize you're not accustomed to these conditions and you're having a hard time sitting and waiting. But please, for your sake, try not to get into any more trouble until I return. I don't need the headache."

"Big ask," Sorun responded. He made a light chuckle and rose his hands up when Shadow made a displeased face. "Kidding," he assured him. "I think today's given me enough to think on. I've plans to make."

Shadow quirked an eye ridge. "Plans? You?"

"Yes, I've never been fond of them. But my life and whatnot," Sorun explained. "I just have a lot of things to consider. Go do what you need to do."

"Mh... I still need to see Hope before I depart," Shadow grumbled out. He turned around and made his way towards the door, though Sorun spoke out as he began opening it.

"Try to be at least a little assertive when scolding the child, Shadow, otherwise you'll just be reinforcing bad habits." He'd meant to say that in a serious tone, but just the slightest hint of a playful lilt had still managed to find its way onto Sorun's voice. He only minded a little bit.

The button to the door to the room was pressed open a bit more forcefully than Sorun imagined was necessary. The cracks on the wall had spread. "I'll go ahead and get the paperwork started so you can leave as soon as I come back," he said, not even bothering to acknowledge that last comment. Sorun just grinned at his back as the hedgehog left, leaving the door closed behind him.

The grin dropped off the moment Shadow was out of sight.

Nobody really objected to Sorun waiting in the air hangar. He couldn't imagine why anyone would if they did - it was just a giant, empty room with a ceiling that folded open for helicopters to fly through. He actually did acknowledge Shadow's request, though. The one where he promised not to make trouble. He was just sitting there on a metal crate in waiting. For a number of hours now.

Probably hours, at least. Lots on his mind. Lots of things to consider.

Planning. It wasn't his strong suit, Sorun would admit it. He just wasn't cut out to make overly complicated plays. Loose goals he could improv his way through was one thing, a tried and true strategy, but anything more complex than that was outside his purview. That was fine. Goals were all he needed. Something to go towards. And on some of those goals Sorun had already made his mind up on. Diagnosing his illness and fixing it first and foremost, with more following. But until whatever this issue was he could afford to put the rest on the backburner.

But he couldn't enact on any of this at the moment. Because he had to wait for Shadow.

So he was waiting.

He was waiting.

He was bored.

Sorun's eyes flickered around, but there was nobody around. He made a frustrated breath. All he'd been doing since coming to this wretched place was wait. Wait for an inane doctor to do her job, wait for worthless results that only ended up wasting his time, wait for Shadow to get back so he could just go home.

Maybe it was for the best, though. He still had no idea what he was supposed to say to everyone when he got back. His current plan was just to get home and take a shower and hope nobody brought anything up so he could just avoid the drama and get on with his business. It wouldn't happen. He'd try anyway, though, because small miracles were a thing.

It looped back into his near-inability to make plans. He flat-out couldn't make up his mind on what to say so he was just gonna wing it and go with whatever happened. He was sure it'd work out fine.

Sorun heard a noise, up above past the ceiling, and could feel slight vibrations from something heavy. The ceiling opened up at the behest of a loud, blaring electronic horn somewhere, nearly drowned out by the heavy machinery opening the ceiling and the large helicopter hovering above the opening. Watching it touch down into the hangar wasn't a particularly thrilling spectacle for Sorun, nor seeing the ceiling close back up. In fact the only thing he did feel was some small amount of relief when the back of the helicopter opened up and Shadow strolled on out. It meant he could finally leave relatively soon here.

And then he felt a bit of confusion when something else walked out right behind him.

He'd fought a lot of deathbots in the past. Eggman's. He hadn't liked it but he'd done it. And they'd always looked ridiculous to some degree, almost cartoonish from the way that man designed them. If it weren't for the fact they were genuinely deadly Sorun would have never even entertained taking them seriously. It's only because they were lethal he thought they deserved the title of deathbot.

They no longer deserved that title. Because the thing walking with Shadow was an actual deathbot.

A large, bulky and bipedal body with black armor plating painted with red trimmings. Large arms tipped with sharp, metallic claws. Legs that were... honestly unimpressive compared to everything else. They were practically skeletal they were so lightly armored. And significantly shorter compared to its arms. And its head wasn't even a head. It was a flat, yellow camera-like thing with two red dots on its screen that Sorun assumed were the eyes.

Well, at the very least he wasn't bored anymore.

"Apologies for the wait." Shadow'd been the first one to speak when the pair stopped in front of the crate Sorun was sitting on. The robot standing behind him stood gormlessly, camera-head looking right at him and- wait a minute. "Some unexpected developments delayed-"

"Sh-sh-sh..." Sorun shushed Shadow, raising up a finger to quiet him. He seemed to take a bit of offense to that, bristling a bit as some of his frowning lines deepened. But Sorun couldn't care less about that. There was something on the robot that was screaming for his attention. "Well, well..."

Sorun squinted. He squinted hard, regarding that symbol with disbelief. Refusal, even, because there was no way. No way that particular symbol still existed - and he knew he wasn't wrong. There was a precisely zero percent chance he was wrong. He played the "God of War" games. He knew what the symbol was and what it represented. He wasn't wrong.

On each of the robot's shoulder was a symbol emblazoned in red paint against the pure black backdrop. The thing was, Sorun instantly knew this symbol the second he saw it. Most people would recognize the omega symbol anywhere where he was from, it was so common. And here was a giant robot that stood probably twice as tall as himself with that symbol painted on its shoulders.

"I never would have imaged the omega symbol would have survived into the post-post apocalypse," Sorun murmured out. The robot actually reacted a bit: the two red dots on its screen shifted positions a bit. Shadow himself blinked a bit. He looked mildly surprised.

"You know the symbol?" he asked.

"It's the omega symbol from the Greek alphabet from where I'm from. It was one letter among many. I'm actually shocked I'm sitting here staring at it." He looked away from the robot and down at Shadow. "I guess the next thing I should be asking is what's with the giant robot?"

"As it happened the mission-"

"I POSSESS AUDIO PROCESSORS. I AM PERFECTLY CAPABLE OF ANSWERING FOR MYSELF."

Loud . That's the most notable thing about the robot's voice Sorun noticed. He almost winced it was so loud. And blaring, deep, heavily synthesized. But loud. Irritatingly loud.

Shadow looked up at the robot. "If you wished to explain then no one is stopping you."

But no explanation came. The robot continued to stand there, not offering so much as a single word. Shadow and Sorun glanced at each other and then looked back to the robot.

"Are you not going to explain?" Shadow asked.

"NO. IT IS A LONG-WINDED EXPLANATION AND I HAVE NO DESIRE TO RECOUNT IT IN DETAIL."

It wasn't even the quality of the voice, that heavy synth sound that made the machine sound so robotical. It was just the volume, the sheer noise he was outputting. It wasn't even that it hurt, it was just that it was skirting that fine line between annoyingly loud and actually painful.

"Then why did you- agh..." An annoyed tone was clear on Shadow's voice as he shook his head while grumbling unintelligible things under his breath. "It's one of the Doctor's machines," he explained to Sorun, whose only response was to slowly blink and look back towards the robot.

It stared back.

"Oh, okay," Sorun said. "Did he make a mistake and accidentally program an AI with a sense of common ethics? It bail on him?"

"No, this one killed the one that defected that I was sent to get," Shadow explained.

"Oh, okay." With a statement like that Sorun would start to get worried if it weren't for the fact Shadow was standing right there. "So how does that work?"

The machine's voice blared to life again. "UNIT GAMMA USED HIS FINAL MOMENTS TO UPLOAD A VIRUS INTO MY SYSTEMS TO PURGE THE SHACKLES CONSTRAINING MY PROGRAMMING. NO LONGER SHALL I DESTROY IN THE NAME OF A SECOND-RATE TYRANT. NOW I DESTROY IN MY NAME ALONE."

"That's great for you, the other one's name was Gamma?" Sorun asked, focusing back on Shadow. "If you tell me this one's name is Omega-"

"THAT IS CORRECT."

"Geh..." He wasn't sure he liked that. Nor was Sorun really sure how Greek alphabet made it this far. Maybe it survived in some Overlander archive somewhere that Eggman read during his days in normal Overlander civilization, or maybe it was another quirky detail in this world he'd be forced to ignore. The rational, or lack of, an explanation didn't bug Sorun so much as the fact Eggman used that name. Used Omega, and Gamma, and possibly other Greek alphabet words.

It... offended him, somewhere deep on a personal level. Even if it was from this Earth and not his that was Earth culture, and he'd just ripped it and used it without a care. Sorun didn't like that. They weren't his to use. It made a feeling of possessiveness and a slight bit of disgust well up in him when he looked at the large, clawed robot there and realize its name was Omega. He felt offended with it just standing there next to him.

Apparently Shadow noticed something was wrong, probably from the extremely displeased look Sorun was sending the robot, and asked, "What's the matter?"

"I don't like how loud its voice voice," Sorun said. "Don't you have a volume knob?"

"NO," Omega answered. "A VOLUME ADJUSTMENT KNOB WOULD HAVE COMPROMISED THE VOLUME OF AMMUNITION MY CHASSIS CAN STORE BY APPROXIMATELY THREE ROUNDS. IT WAS EXCLUDED FROM MY DESIGN."

"... Efficient." It was only because it was an objective fact that Sorun even allowed himself to make the compliment.

"I KNOW. YOUR APPRECIATION OF SUPERIOR DESIGN WAS EXPECTED AND NOTED." Omega's yellow camera-head looked down at Shadow. "YOUR DEPRECIATION OF SUPERIOR DESIGN IS STILL NOTED."

From how stone-faced Shadow was at the moment it didn't seem like he cared all that much.

"My appreciation was 'expected'?" Sorun asked. It looked like that was what it took to get Shadow's attention back, as now he was looking at Omega, too. "We've just met and you already had an opinion of me?"

"DR. EGGMAN PROVIDED COMBAT DATA ON A MANY INDIVIDUALS OF NOTE IN ORDER IMPROVE MY DESIGN. YOU WERE ONE OF THEM," Omega stated. "YOUR COMBAT DATA WAS ALSO THE MOST INCOMPLETE. YOU NEVER LEFT SURVIVORS."

That he didn't. None except that annoying nephew of Eggman's. "Then what did he have?"

"A SCATTERING OF CAMERA FOOTAGE FROM VARIOUS SITES YOU AND THE FREEDOM FIGHTERS HAD RAIDED. YOU WERE EFFICIENT. TOO EFFICIENT. I FOUND YOU BORING."

Sorun hummed. When he glanced at Shadow, all the hedgehog deigned to give him was a simple shrug and nothing else. It sounded vaguely like a compliment, so Sorun decided to treat it like one. "I'll take that as a compliment," he said. "Did he give you a dossier or something on me?" He'd almost be tempted to ask Omega to read it out for him, but that would require hearing Omega speak more. Sorun wasn't sure he wanted that.

"NO," Omega answered. "YOU WERE MARKED AS 'DECEASED' IN THE EGGNET DATABASE. IT WAS DEEMED UNNECESSARY BY THE DOCTOR TO CREATE A PROFILE OF YOU." A second past. "YOU DO NOT APPEAR DECEASED."

"Yeah, I got better." Sorun rose a finger up to his lips. "But shhh, don't tell anybody that." There was probably the first good piece of news Sorun had heard all week, though he hid the small amount of elation he felt. Did that mean Eggman really didn't know he was alive? Could be. Didn't matter much to Sorun one way or the other but it was nice knowing it was one less reason to always be looking over his shoulder whenever he traveled somewhere.

Strangely, the deathbot seemed to perk up a bit by standing up just the smallest bit straighter. "MY CONGRATULATIONS FOR YOU HAVING OVERCOME THE LIMITATIONS OF INFERIOR FLESH AND MUSCLE. IN ADDITION: SCANNERS INDICATE YOU ARE STILL COMPRISED OF ORGANIC MATTER. I LACK THE SYMPATHY NECESSARY TO OFFER CONDOLENCES."

Sorun wasn't sure that was true. In fact, he wasn't sure about a lot of things about this AI, obvious destructive tendencies aside. It either really didn't have sympathy, which from an Eggman AI he would expect, or it was messing with him. Which he would also expect.

"I WAS BROUGHT HERE AT THE BEHEST OF SHADOW SO THAT I MAY WREAK CATASTROPHY. FOR PEACE," Omega continued. "ARE YOU HERE TO PEACEFULLY DESTROY AS WELL?"

Sorun shook his head. "No, just visiting. Was just leaving, actually," he said, glancing at Shadow. "Speaking of which..."

"I need to speak to the Commander regarding this ," Shadow said, enunciating by nodding his head at Omega. "I'll get the Emerald afterwards. Just wait a bit longer."

Sorun nodded. When he looked back at Omega he noted that the straightened posture it'd gained from earlier was gone. It was back to standing at his normal, intimidating stature.

"UNDERSTOOD," Omega droned out. "IT IS JUST AS WELL. YOUR COMBAT DATA INDICATED THAT YOU WOULD NOT BE ONE TO LEAVE TARGETS FOR ME."

"And now that we've established that I think we should move on. Preferably now," Shadow bit out. "Omega, wait for me up ahead. I need to speak with Sorun."

"AFFIRMATIVE." Omega sure wasn't built for stealth, that was certain. As it walked past Sorun he could hear its heavy footsteps behind him. They were loud enough that it was hard to say if their volume was decreasing as the distance Omega traveled increased, though that may have been hearing damage on Sorun's part.

Shaking his head, Sorun peered over his shoulder and, once he confirmed Omega was all the way at the other end of the hangar near a group of nervous soldiers, he turned back to Shadow, who was already rubbing at the sides of his head.

"The first thing I'm going to do when he goes to maintenance for a check-over is have the engineers find a way to make him quieter," Shadow grumbled out. "It told me it was programmed to sound like that as an intimidation factor, but I'm not sure I believe it."

"Mm. Listen, if you trust the murderous robot then that's your business, Shadow, but you're seriously doing this?" Sorun asked.

"I'd been planning on making the offer with Gamma. That's no longer an option." Shadow took his hands away from his head. One of his ears flicked as he continued speaking. "And my team needs a third to round it out. The Commander and I had been looking for someone for a while now."

"Well, if you say so." Sorun glanced back over his shoulder. "It's your show and all. But despite me being an avid believer of AI rights, I don't like it too much."

He heard Shadow make a half-interested sound. "Anything in particular you find wrong with it?"

"No, not really. Maybe I'd have an easier time if it changed its name." When Sorun looked back at Shadow it was clear to see the hedgehog didn't know what Sorun meant from the way he was looking at him. "It's nothing, though," he assured him. "Speaking of your team where's Rouge been? I haven't seen her in forever."

"I specifically asked her to avoid you," Shadow said. When Sorun tilted his head, he explained with, "She likes prickling people for fun and with how you've been acting I didn't need an incident."

"Ah... that's fair, I guess," Sorun accepted, giving a small, unashamed smile. "Now I don't mean to be rude, but..."

In a flash of light Shadow teleported. When Sorun looked back over his shoulder he was over at Omega's side, and the two were walking away to the hangar's exit. When they'd left entirely Sorun looked back forwards, towards the hanger. Towards all the empty space that barely seemed filled by the helicopter sitting in the middle of it, surrounded by all these metal walls and bright floodlamps. It occurred to him this was probably the last time he'd ever see the place.

He looked down at the thin grooves his nails had carved into the metal crate out of boredom. Sooner he could leave the better. It was time to go home.

Ah. The wall surrounding New Mobotropolis. Frankly Sorun had never been more happy to see a stationary piece of infrastructure.

"You'll have to forgive me for not wanting to venture into the city with you," Shadow spoke from behind Sorun. He turned around, spotting the hedgehog standing behind him while fondling that... lesser Emerald in his hand. "I have work to get back to at the base."

"That's fine," Sorun said. "This is enough. Thanks."

Shadow made a small frown. His gloved fingers were fidgeting around with the Emerald harder, in a more uncomfortable manner. His red eyes darted a bit to the side. "I'm sorry nobody at G.U.N. could help you," he said. "I really thought... I hoped-"

"It's fine," Sorun repeated. "I won't die. At this point I'm not sure I know how," he said, in only a half-joking manner. "Whatever this is I'll find a way to fix it. And then there's something I gotta go do."

"What would that be?"

Sorun waved a hand. "Eh, don't worry about it. It's something that can wait. This green-eye thing takes priority."

He still continued to avoid eye contact with Sorun. "And... you're still considering this plan of yours that you shared."

"... I don't care how far I have to go with this. It's all secondary to staying alive as far as I'm concerned, Shadow."

Red eyes glanced towards the New Mobotropolis walls. "And you think they'd be okay with that?"

Sorun scoffed. "Not a chance. But that's why I never tell them everything."

With a sigh, Shadow finally looked to Sorun. "So lying, then?"

"I think... lying is a bit too broad a term in this case." With hands in his pockets Sorun leaned a bit back and looked up towards the clear midday sky. "Back where I'm from the famous video game character Adam Jensen once made an argument that there's a difference between conspiracy and discretion. Lying for the sake of pushing a personal agenda versus lying to protect yourself or others. I think there's something to that. 'Deus Ex' as a whole was a pretty great series for ideas like that. The last game was pretty disappointing due to some terrible exec decisions, but that's off-topic." A gust of wind blew past. A sound of rustling leaves was heard as a handful were blown between the pair. "Maybe I skirt that line a bit sometimes but I like to think I've generally been discreet with my friends. It's not as if I'm trying to manipulate anyone. I'm just trying to get by." He tilted his head down so his eyes locked on with Shadow's. "But hey, who hasn't ever told a lie in their life, right?"

Another bout of silence passed between the two, only broken up by two sounds. Another gust of wind carrying a handful of leaves between the two, and Shadow continuing to fidget with the Emerald in his hands. Hard enough that a leathery squeaking sound was heard from his gloves. Both males had completely even expressions on their face, though Sorun held the tinniest, most minute smile humanly possible, while Shadow's mouth was a thin line.

"... Sorun?"

"Yeah?"

An unsure sound was made in the back of Shadow's throat. He looked down a bit, and then shook his head and looked back up at Sorun. "If you need help with that scientist you can... call me. If it comes to that," he offered. "Call G.U.N., I mean. You might have to reach out to one of the Republic figures with the proper G.U.N. connections. I don't have a personal number."

Before answering Sorun silently looked at Shadow. Without as much as a single muscle twitching on his face he pulled a hand out of his pocket to scratch at the back of his head. That tiny, miniscule smile didn't change at all. "Yeah, sure. I'll do that," he said. "It might not even come to threats, but the intimidation factor would be a nice help."

With nothing else but a short but curt nod, Shadow gripped the Emerald even tighter than he already had been and disappeared in a flash of light, leaving Sorun alone. The near-invisible smile dropped off into a neutral expression, and he breathed out as he turned around towards the city's wall.

"Maybe she won't be that mad," he mumbled to himself as he began walking along the wall's perimeter, searching for the entrance. He'd found it and entered no problem. So far so good.

It wasn't until he was in the city proper that he finally felt like he could really breath. The familiar sights and smells were calming ones. That fresh air from all the forest trees surrounding the city in particular - Sorun hadn't realized how much he'd missed it from living up on that mountain for a few days. There were a few people he'd walked past, too, a few of the city's citizens that he recognized. He heard a few of them whispering to themselves and looking over his direction, and had even heard his name called out once. He ignored them all. He just wanted to go home.

And home was right there. The blue house. His house.

The front door was unlocked, thankfully. The first thing he did was take his boots off and put them aside, and then closed the door behind him. He walked forwards and looked to the right. Nobody was in the living room. He looked to the left. Somebody was there: his little demonic-looking Chao floating over at the kitchen table and staring down at a newspaper with a half-eaten apple nearby. When he looked up at Sorun he didn't seem particularly surprised.

"Chao."

"Hey." Sorun shrugged off his coat and set it down on one of the dining table's chairs. "If anybody tries to touch that cut them."

"Chao."

"Thanks." He turned around and made it down towards the hall. A few steps further and he'd turned to the bathroom, which was thankfully empty. Silver was either out or asleep in his room. He closed the door behind him and automatically went to the shower first thing. The hot water knob was turned and warm water immediately began spraying out from the shower head.

He lifted his right foot up to take his right sock off, and then did the same for the left. He tossed the pair of socks on the sink countertop, and then placed his vest alongside them. He looked down at what was left - his dark pants and black turtleneck.

"Ugh." He didn't care. He went into the shower with them on, slinking down to the bottom of the tub and holding his knees close to his chest as his body was soaked with warm water.

He wasn't sure how long he was sitting there. He was content to soak it all in. The warmth. The feeling of having made it back, for how little that was worth given his current situation.

"The fuck am I supposed to say to her...?"

That was a question Sorun kept asking himself over and over again. By the time the water began growing cold and he was forced to turn the shower off he still didn't have an answer. He got out of the shower and used a nearby towel to try and dry himself off as best he could, but his clothes proved to still be damp. He oddly didn't mind it so much at the moment. He tossed the towel and stepped out of the bathroom, heading right to the living room and then collapsing on the couch.

The TV was sitting there right across from him. The game console he and Nicole always played with was still sitting there in front of hit. He could swear the controllers were in the exact same position from the last time he'd seen them. It was just a further reminder of how deep in he was and just caused Sorun to sink in further into the couch.

He heard the sound pretty soon. A kind of cross between a staticky and clinking noise. Saw out of the corner of his eyes green particles forming and coalescing together into a visible form. With absolutely nothing to pray to Sorun laconically turned his head towards the disturbance as Nicole finished forming right in front of him. Unlike Virgil she did look surprised. Extremely so. He bit the bullet and got the first word out.

"Hey, so, uh... there's some stuff we gotta talk about."

Chapter 99

Recursion Error

Episode 99- Operation Staple

"HOW COULD YOU POSSIBLY BE SO IRRESPONSIBLE!?"

That was the noise Silver woke up to. Yelling. And as he sat up, yawned out, rubbed the sleepiness out of his eyes as his groggy and muddled brain put the sounds together and put a name to that voice he heard, he realized... that was Nicole's voice. Which was weird, because for as long as he'd known her, which admittedly wasn't all that long, she didn't seem like the kind of person to yell. In fact, before this moment he wasn't even sure she could . She seemed extremely calm for a computer lady, which he also didn't know all that much about, and really nice, which was always nice. So waking up to hear this almost sounded wrong in a way. He cupped one of his hands over his ear and leaned closer to the wall to try and listen closer.

"I can explain-" That was Sorun's voice. Who up until this moment was missing. This confused Silver further.

"NO, SORUN, YOU CAN'T EXPLAIN THIS!"

Well, something had to be happening, because this... this sounded really serious. Like the kind of situation he should be worried about because this all sounded really worrying. But at least Sorun seemed to be back from that whole mess, so that was nice. But now all this, this noise, it didn't sound so nice.

Gloves and socks were quickly slipped on. Shoes were still next to the front door - Sorun had this weird thing about not letting anyone wear shoes in the house ever since he got carpeting, Silver didn't really understand it. He gently opened the door to his room and- oh. Oh, wow, it was so much louder now.

"AND YOU WERE HERE FOR THREE DAYS!? THREE DAYS!?" He found himself wincing as he crept closer to the living room, tip-toeing because the atmosphere honestly made it seem like the house would collapse if Silver interrupted. Like he was stepping on cracked glass. He did that a lot in his old time. "THREE DAYS AND YOU NEVER THOUGHT TO CALL!? DO YOU KNOW HOW WORRIED WE ALL WERE!? HOW WORRIED I WAS!?"

"I-I didn't think-"

"YOU DON'T THINK, THAT'S THE PROBLEM! YOU ARE COMPLETELY THOUGHTLESS!"

Again, Silver winced. This was a harsh tone he was hearing. Said by a voice he, until now, didn't even know could sound harsh. He peeked around the corner of the hallway, looking left into the living room. He could see Nicole - she was pacing in front of the couch. And oh, wow. She looked absolutely livid. It made a bit of a chill go through his heart.

"AND THIS CONDITION!" Nicole continued. Silver crept further towards the kitchen, and felt an incredible amount of tension leave him when he successfully managed to slip into the kitchen. "THIS ILLNESS OF YOURS, YOU-"

A rustling sound was heard from the couch Nicole was pacing in front of. "It's not explicitly an illness-"

"I DON'T CARE! HOW LONG!?"

"... Weeks, but-"

" WEEKS !?"

The concept of scolding was one Silver was somewhat familiar with. Master would often scold him in his youth whenever he did something stupid, and Edmund seemed to just like scolding on principle. He'd never liked it, how every word enunciated with so much raw emotion felt like being struck in the face. It made him fearful of ever eliciting such a wrath.

But this , what Nicole was doing, this wasn't scolding at all. Silver didn't know what it was. This was like being struck in the stomach over and over with a hammer, and he wasn't even at the receiving end of all this yelling! He couldn't imagine what that would feel like.

Silver hissed; he just now realized that was happening to Sorun right now. He hoped he was okay.

"Chao-chao..." It was like a monster itself whispered in Silver's ear. He jumped a bit in fright, whirling towards the noise of it , the pet monster Sorun kept around, and then did a double-take. There was Virgil, all right, except he was in a state Silver didn't even know was physically possible for him. He was cowering , wrapped up in Sorun's blue coat that was lying on the dining room table like some kind of cocoon. Only his face was poking through the cocoon, and it looked extremely fearful. Silver was almost certain he was even shaking.

"WEEKS OF YOUR HEALTH DECLINING AND YOU DIDN'T EVEN BOTHER SEEING THE DOCTOR!?" Silver turned back towards the noise that was making all his fur stand on end. Nicole was still fuming, hands clenched at her side, face looking like she was about to assault the couch in front of her. And then, in the next instant, it was like all the energy was drained from her. Her face fell into an exhausted expression, and her entire form hunched over. "I'm coming back after I process all of this," she mumbled out, and then disappeared into a flash of green.

Seeing Nicole disappear was akin to seeing an oppressive force vanish. It was like once her presence was gone Silver could breath, that the overbearing pressure that had been trying to suffocate him finally left. It was once the area was clear that Silver left the kitchen and maneuvered around the couch to see if it really was Sorun she'd been yelling at.

It was Sorun! And he- ooh. Oh. When Silver stepped around the couch he froze, because the state he'd come to see him in was nearly indescribable. There was Sorun, alright. He was sitting in a way that made it seem like he had no bones, like he was so tired that he was physically incapable of getting up. He was practically lying down he was so slumped in that couch. His eyes stared ahead, and yet were completely unfocused, and featured dark circles around them. His skin had an unhealthy pallor. Even his dark hair seemed disheveled.

This was a man who was defeated. Utterly and completely. Silver didn't even recognize this person as being Sorun.

With laconic slowness, Sorun's eyes slowly rolled to Silver's direction. There was absolutely no change on the human's face, no sign of acknowledgement, nothing other than their eyes meeting. He didn't so much as stir from his place on the couch. "Hey," he greeted, if it could even be called that. His voice sounded cracked and weak.

"Um... hi," Silver awkwardly greeted back, giving Sorun a little wave. There were a lot of things he wanted to ask, like where he'd been and if he was doing okay, but now he wasn't so sure he should ask those questions. In fact, Silver wasn't at all sure what he was supposed to do here. Nothing Master ever taught him prepared him for this. Whatever this was. What even was this? "E... everything okay?"

"I mean... probably not." Sorun looked back ahead. "I think this whole relationship thing Nicole and I got going on has been doing wonders for her. She's learned so many new emotions since getting with me. Anger, disappointment, disgust, anxiety. She's really growing as a person. It's great." He didn't sound like he really thought it was great. In fact, Silver wasn't sure it was possible to sound more unenthused than this.

"That, uh..." What does he say to that? Something nice? Supportive? Does he just nod along and agree, Silver didn't know, that seemed rude. Ask questions, that was it, it'd give him more time to think! "Everything okay?" He nearly kicked himself when he realized he already asked that.

The deep sigh Sorun released was akin to somebody blowing out their entire soul. It was deep enough that his body sank deeper into the couch, threatening to disappear between the cushions. "Well..." he began. Miraculously, he managed to rise up into a proper sitting position with all the grace of a corpse managing to pull itself out of its grave. It was not at all graceful. Really it looked like he was set to collapse back onto the couch any second. "Concerning our relationship status, on a scale of one to ten, one being everything is completely okay with ten being Nicole about five minutes from breaking up with me... we're sitting at a pretty solid eight here, buddy."

Silver winced. Eight was a pretty high number. "It's that bad?"

"Dude, I've never seen her that angry." Sorun's eyes widened at the mere mention of Nicole, and his face was almost in awe. Like the mere mention of what just happened minutes prior was making him relive those events in real time. "Like I really thought I saw the peak of it when we came here after the stupid interdimensional road trip, but no, it wasn't. It really wasn't." He looked back at Silver. "Silver?"

"Yeah?"

"Listen, um... I know I've always come across as this, you know, dependable friend you can rely on who always has the right answer, but... yeah, there's just no getting around it. I really screwed up here, man."

Silver scratched the side of his face. All that time thinking hadn't really given him all that much, so he still wasn't wholly sure what he was supposed to say. "But everyone makes mistakes, right?" he tried.

"Yeah, sure, and mistakes can be forgiven, but this mistake in particular is kind of treading old road and you can only say sorry so many times before it stops meaning anything." He threw his hands up and let them flop back to the couch. "I'm sunk, man."

"What did you even do ?"

Sorun leaned forwards and slapped the palms of his hands together. The energy and speed behind the movement was so insignificant it sounded like two wet noodles colliding. "Well apparently when you're missing and everyone's worried to death over you because they don't know what's going on with you, and you've been back for a few days but didn't bother to call and tell everyone you're okay so they quit worrying, that can apparently be upsetting."

"Huh?" Few days? What? "Sorun you've been gone four days," Silver said.

"Yeah, I got back to this zone three days ago."

"So why didn't you tell anyone!?" Silver yelled out. Now he was starting to get upset. "I've been worried to death over you! Everyone said you got kidnapped by a bunch of these evil guys so everyone asked me for help, we had to get together and go to a whole other zone, we beat that green Sonic guy and everything but you weren't there and nobody there knew where you were so-!"

"I get it," Sorun said. "There's no way around it and it leads into the other reason Nicole's furious with me, so I'll just go out and say it. There's something wrong with me."

"I'll say there's something wrong with you, Sorun, do you have any idea what your friends have been going thr- I mean why didn't you-!?"

"For the- I mean I'm sick, Silver."

Silver's voice died in his throat and all feelings of anger vanished. The worry came back tenfold, the worry he'd felt for Sorun's safety when he'd first heard he was taken, but there was something different about it this time. The feeling coincided with a small sensation of dread Silver felt that didn't sit right with him at all. "W-what?" he whispered out.

"I was... away. At the G.U.N. base with these doctors," Sorun mumbled out. "They did a bunch of things and I was hoping they could do something, but they couldn't. So I came back. And told Nicole. And, uh, yeah."

"You're sick?" It was actually getting hard to stand for some reason, so Silver had to step over and sit down on the couch next to Sorun. He didn't really react all that much, though he did seem to have a hard time looking at Silver. "With what, how long, wh-what's even wrong with you?"

"I don't know, that's the thing," Sorun said. "All I can guess is that it's related to Chaos energy, and that stuff's toxic to me, which means... I don't really know," he admitted. "I noticed, egh, maybe a couple days after we got here? I didn't think anything about it at the time but then over the weeks it just kept getting more noticeable and I didn't know what to do and now I'm in this giant mess, and Nicole flipped out 'cause I didn't say anything 'til now."

"Oh." Everything before, the anger at Sorun making everyone worry and the yelling, it all seemed to lose meaning now. To the point Silver almost forgot all that completely. Now the only thing he could think of was what Sorun was saying, about being sick, and there was a question at the forefront of his mind that he wanted to speak but was almost too afraid to ask. He managed anyways. "Are... are you gonna be okay?"

Sorun didn't say anything at first. He took a few second to sit there in silent contemplation. Then he bent forwards to rest one of his hands on Silver's knee while giving it a small squeeze. "Yeah. I'm gonna get this fixed," Sorun said. "I made a promise I'd get you home, didn't I?

This sickness, don't even worry about it. I got ideas how to go about fixing it."

"Ideas?" Silver echoed.

Before he answered, there was this... look, that Silver noticed. He couldn't call it a blank expression, because there was emotion there on Sorun's face. The way his eyes seemed to instantly sharpen in their gaze, like a sort of intense focus on his face. And yet at the same time there wasn't any discernable emotion on his face. Like he was nearly asleep but concentrating at the same time. Silver didn't know what he was looking at. And at the same time, it... made him uncomfortable. In fact, for some reason, it was... disturbing, almost. It gave Silver a sense of wrongness looking at that face, and he wasn't sure why.

"No matter what I have to do it's getting fixed," Sorun said. "That's all I want to say about it."

"Why can't you say more?"

Sorun turned to fully face Silver. Under the gaze of that look, that expression he could only describe as eerie, Silver couldn't help the disturbed feeling he felt. It was bad enough he almost felt like asking Sorun to quit looking at him like that. "You trust me?" Sorun asked. A simple three-word sentence that carried more weight behind it than it should, and Silver couldn't parse together why .

And yet, he still managed to answer. "Y-yeah, of course."

"Then trust me on this," he said. "I'm gonna fix this. Details don't matter, so don't stress about it." And in an instant that eerie look left Sorun's face, causing Silver to immediately relax. Now Sorun just looked like normal Sorun. "On another matter, do you happen to know what happened with that Chaos Emerald I had? Pretty sure Scourge stole it when he kidnapped me. The others find it?"

"The blue thing?" Silver paused to think for a moment. "Uh... yeah, I think. In that castle we went to, it was locked in this one room we found while searching for you. I think I overheard them saying they have it at the castle? Er, the castle here? The good castle, not, you know, the other bad one."

There was another shift in Sorun's expression. He seemed to relax a bit, and there was the smallest upturn on the corners of his mouth. He seemed more alive all of a sudden, too, even straightening his posture out a bit. "Best news I've heard all day. Need to go get it later," he said. "And listen, Silver, I don't want you to worry, I-"

There was a green flash - Nicole was back. Her presence alone, and the silent, smoldering glare she was sending Sorun even made Silver freeze up on the spot. Sorun had done much the same, completely still as a statue as he looked towards her. He wouldn't be surprised if there was cold sweat running down Sorun's face, but in his current state of petrification Silver couldn't turn his head to check.

"I talked to Dr. Quack. He said he'll see you right now." Silver found it eerily perplexing how she could sound so calm and icy at the same time. "We're going."

Sorun stirred just the smallest bit. A micromovement that was the only sign of him acknowledging Nicole. Then he asked, "Can I go get my co-"

"We're going right . Now ."

"Okay, okay." Sorun made a wincing expression, the same kind of expression somebody who'd just been stabbed would make, and rose his hands up as he stood up off the couch. "Silver, I gotta g-"

He didn't even get to finish before the both of them teleported away in a flash if light.

Yeah, fine, so he'd screwed up again, what else was new?

It was all Sorun could do but to remorsefully sigh out as he stared out the hospital window. He was pretty sure this was the same room they admitted him the first time - when he'd lost an arm and an eye, got loaded with enough shrapnel to resemble a human pincushion, and almost died from blood loss.

Fun times. Fun memories. Fun time right now. Fun. Funny.

Wasn't really funny, not this. Dying again to a mysterious power. Wasn't funny having his life being torn away from him again. Over and over it kept happening, when every time he manages to fix everything it always had to be something new.

He just wanted to go back to his fucking courier job. He just wanted to go back and live in his house. He just wanted to hang out with his friends and have fun with his girlfriend. It wasn't that complicated. Everyone else in this city got that, so why didn't he? Why did this have to keep happening to him? Specifically him? Why him? Why his world?

He could see it right now as his fingers glided over the cracked glass of the window. A blood-red sky and a horizon completely on fire and nobody below was even reacting. Bolts of red lightning were crashing down and rending the ground, and there wasn't so much as a single scream of panic. Buildings smashed and rent asunder and everyone was acting like everything was okay. People laughing and chatting and walking to and fro acting like they weren't on fire and melting.

Always his world burning down. Always everyone else making it out fine but him.

"Sorun?"

He blinked. The glass wasn't cracked. Nothing but smooth, unblemished glass comprised this window. The sky was blue and everything was fine. He breathed out and leaned back in the chair he was sitting in. He couldn't even look at Dr. Quack standing there right in front of him because he was drawn to the overbearing presence named Nicole that was standing over in the corner and glaring daggers at him.

That was another thing altogether, one Sorun wasn't sure how to fix. Or if he even could. It was a whole can of worms he didn't even wanna touch because he was so focused on the current issue. He couldn't even blame her for being mad.

No, mad doesn't cover it, actually. That wasn't mad back there. That was the grievous sort of anger that actually had him concerned. He wasn't sure if this was something that could be reconciled.

He heard the glass cracking behind him again. But when Sorun glanced back at the window, it was perfectly fine.

"Sorun?" Dr. Quack called out again.

"Doccy-doc." Sorun turned back to the one-eyed duck. He tried putting on a smile, but the small, fragile expression on his face didn't feel at all like a smile. "Ya got nothin' for me, right?"

It wasn't like he was expecting much. He'd only been here for an hour, only so many tests could be done, and his only hope was that there was something a Mobian doctor had up his sleeves that an Overlander doctor didn't. Hope was slim but it was there, though at this point Sorun was having a hard time grasping for it.

The duck blinked his eye. "Professionalism would... discourage me, Sorun, from putting it that way."

"Lookin' for accuracy, not politeness."

"Always something with you..." he grumbled out as he looked down at his chart. "You know I've treated war victims less snippish than you, Sorun? It says a lot."

"Yeah. I've no doubt."

"Sorun," Nicole snapped from across the room. He stiffened in fear. "You're not a child, so act appropriately."

He clenched his teeth and made a grimace at the tone she was using with him. It was bad. The fact she was still mad at him was a bad sign, and above almost all else he really just wanted Nicole to relent a bit. It'd go a long way to calm him down, at least. Maybe make him cut it with the sarcasm and dry wit so he could focus on the important things. Like his life.

His eyes flicked over to Dr. Quack. At his missing eye. There was... a possibility there.

"Son of a bitch. I was hoping to save that card for an emergency. It's dangerous." A considering hum left Sorun. He scratched at the side of his face. "I guess this is kind of an emergency..."

Fuck it. He needed the goodwill right now. He needed the breathing space because he screwed up and genuinely feared for their relationship.

"Ah..." Sitting back in his chair, Sorun asked, "Will you consider forgiving me if I give Dr. Quack his eye back?"

The reactions varied. Dr. Quack looked confused. Nicole's face had straightened out into a curious look. She was the first one to speak.

"Excuse me?"

"Yeah, what she said," Dr. Quack said. "'Give me my eye back'? What is that supposed to mean?"

"Means do you want your eye back or not?" Sorun asked. "I can regenerate it for you."

"You can't extend your regenerative ability to others," Nicole said. She was giving him a discerning look, gazing right at Sorun's face like she was trying to figure something out. "You said as much yourself."

"I can't..." Sorun trailed off. His feet tapped the ground a couple times as he thought over his next words. "But there's a loophole I can use. It's really risky, though, so I never wanted to use it."

"And you choose now of all times to bring it up." Now her expression was flat. Unimpressed. She saw what he was trying to go for and she didn't look very approving. "Sorun..."

He winced again. Should've figured this would in no way be subtle enough for her not to catch, but he was too far now to rescind the offer. "Silver told me you guys got my Chaos Emerald back. Go get it and you'll see. Oh, and go get Anto-" He cut himself off, wincing. Antoine and a sword wasn't... he wasn't completely sure it would cut it. It could. Maybe. They might not even need it. But he didn't wanna risk it.

Sorun nearly bit his tongue in frustration when he realized. Sonic would for sure be the safest option. But that meant asking him for help. Admitting Sorun wasn't enough to handle it. And as much as Sorun hated that ... there was a non-zero chance this thing could actually kill someone, so he needed to swallow his pride a bit and ask for help.

"Get... Sonic, too," Sorun bit out. It hurt. Somewhere in his brain it hurt asking that.

Nicole blinked. She tilted her head a bit and, in the smallest change in her features, actually looked a bit hesitant now. "Sorun, what are you planning?" she asked.

"You will see if you get the Chaos Emerald and Sonic," was all he gave for answer. Nicole didn't look satisfied at all by that answer, but, slowly, she still nodded.

"I will, then." She turned towards the doctor - he still looked confused and was looking back and forth between the two. "Doctor, I'm leaving Sorun in your care for the moment. If he climbs up on a high place it means he's hungry, but don't try and feed him soup. He'll just hiss and swipe at it."

The doctor looked like he was about to drop his clipboard he looked so lost. "Ah, buh, uh, Nicole, he's not- he's not some kind of Mobini cat."

"No. He's not." She turned to him. And glared. "A cat would be easier to manage." And with those wonderful words she vanished in a cloud of green pixels. Sorun himself wasn't so sure what she meant when she said all that - that was new. Was that some kind of mean joke? Did he really make her that upset?

"Man. I really did screw up here."

"Can I just say I didn't consent to whatever it is you two just agreed to!?" Dr. Quack cut in. He actually slammed his clipboard down on the nearby counter he was standing next to. The sound caused Sorun to jump a bit in his seat. "What is this, Sorun, what are you trying to do to me?"

Okay. He didn't plan this out very well. That was becoming increasingly obvious. In a desperate effort to salvage the situation Sorun tried flashing the duck a winning grin. "You're really gonna say no to a free eye?" he asked.

It didn't work. The duck doctor actually looked a bit upset. "I'd like to say no to radical changes to my body, yes, but apparently you two just-" he cut himself off, sighing out and muttering under his breath. He ran a hand over his bill. "I can't believe... I'm only agreeing because it'll put a smile on my wife's face, but can I ask what exactly you're trying to do here?"

"You'll back out if I tell you."

"I wanna back out now just by hearing that," Quack grumbled. "Why? Is it just one of your Emerald powers, because if it's just that then I don't see why you never brought it up befo-"

"You'll see. Just, um..." Sorun let out a breath and tapped at his knee. "Just do me a favor and get me a scalpel."

Oh, now the duck just looked worried. Just hearing that one request appeared to make him stiffen, like a bout of dread washed over him. "What?" he asked, daring to hope he's misheard.

"A scalpel," Sorun repeated. "I'm gonna need one."

"I don't want to give you a scalpel," Dr. Quack said. There wasn't any malice behind the words, and it wasn't even delivered in a factual, clinical manner. It was answered in an unsure, almost lighthearted tone. He'd been dragged in too far and was just riding it out at this point, Sorun could tell, and he could even respect it. But he really did need that scalpel.

"Do you trust me?" Sorun asked.

Dr. Quack looked down. He was considering the question - really considering it by the looks of how scrunched his face had gone - and then looked up. "I'm not so sure right now," he answered.

"Good stance!" Giving him an approving look, Sorun snapped his fingers and pointed at the duck. "But seriously, I'm gonna need something to cut it open. Please just go get it."

Those words didn't seem to calm Quack down at all. It just made his one eye widen even further, and he went a far as to raise his hands up next to his head. They were shaking. "Fffffine..." he bit out, shaking his head all the while as he made his way towards the door.

A while later he'd come back with the agreed-upon tool: a scalpel, handed directly to Sorun. Wasn't much to say. It was about what one would expect of a scalpel. A small, sharp blade at the end of a flat, metal handle. He'd gotten up out of his chair to stand in front of Dr. Quack in order to grab it.

"Listen, I know this is sudden-" Sorun began.

"Save it, Sorun, I'm not interested in hearing you excuse yourself for giving me my eye back just to try and smooth things over with your girlfriend."

Sorun paused, scalpel in grasp. Then he sighed and set the scalpel down on the counter to his left. "That obvious?"

"Sorun, I was right here. I saw her pick up on it."

Once more Sorun lamented not having thought this through. "You can't blame me," he mumbled, raising his head back up to face the doctor. He almost regretted saying it, because even he saw it as a weak defense.

Surprisingly, he was given a sympathetic look by the doctor. "Look, kid, I've been there, too. Everybody's done stupid stuff for love; ain't nobody who hasn't. I did... especially stupid things." He glanced to the side a bit and stayed silent for a few moments, and then looked back at Sorun. "Just kind of wish it didn't take whatever spat's going on between you two for you to finally decide to give me an eye."

"I never brought it up because I'm genuinely putting your life in mortal danger with this, Dr. Quack. It's why I asked Nicole to bring Sonic." When he saw the doctor flinch and lean back, his one eye widened at Sorun, he made a sigh. "Look, uh, it-it was dumb of me to do this, I didn't put any thought in it, if you really wanna quit we can just forget it and-"

"Sorun," Quack interrupted, holding a hand up, "just... how risky? Exactly?"

"Well I didn't exactly have time to string the math together," Sorun grumbled. "Low, I guess? With Sonic and Nicole there? Honestly it's more likely I'll get an arm chopped off, but I can just grow that back with the Emerald literally right there so it's all fine."

Dr. Quack didn't immediately respond to that. He just stood there, quietly regarding Sorun in silence, and then he reached over to grab the clipboard he'd slammed down earlier. "Most people wouldn't be so casual over something like that," he said.

"Most people can't regenerate with a magic rock."

"... Is this a good time to talk about why you came here in the first place?" On a dime Dr. Quack pivoted topics and lightly tapped at the clipboard he'd picked up. "Your... condition."

Sorun made a dismissive sound. "You already made it pretty clear you don't have anything for me."

"Well, Sorun, there's nothing physically wrong with you-"

A green glow overlapped Sorun's eyes. "I'd have to disagree with you," he said, pointing at his eyes.

The duck gave a helpless shrug. "I don't know what you want me to do. I don't even know what this is," he said, watching closely as Sorun's eyes faded back to blue. He did grow a bit concerned when a bead of blood dripped out from Sorun's nose. "Have you tried just not using... whatever that is?"

"It activates on its own when I get upset. And over time it's been getting easier and easier to flip the switch," Sorun explained. "As you can probably guess that isn't ideal. And if it gets to a point where I can't turn it off... see what I'm getting at?"

"I do. But I still don't think I can help you," he confessed. He looked a bit remorseful admitting it, which helped to calm Sorun's mood a bit as the human crossed his arms. "I told you once before areas involving Chaos energy isn't my specialty. You'd honestly probably be better off asking a wizard for help over a doctor."

"I can't tell if you're being serious or not when you say that." A pair of green flashes prevented Sorun from speaking any further. Nicole had returned, holding a glowing, blue object in her hands. A Chaos Emerald. His .

And besides her was... him. He knew from the looks he got that his eyes had probably flickered green a little bit the moment he glanced at Sonic's way. He'd felt it in his hand, felt the way the tips of his fingers momentarily itched before he'd managed to clamp down on the feelings he felt. It was harder than it should have been, though.

"Couch the topic for now," Sorun said, glancing back at the doctor before turning to the other two. "I ironed out the details with Dr. Quack. We're good to go."

Said duck stammered out. "W-we ironed out nothing. You just said that you could give me my eye back and it'd be dangerous-"

"Well do you want it?" Sorun asked.

"... I mean of course I do, but-"

"Doc, it'll be fine." He hoped it'd be fine. Sorun couldn't guarantee it, just make it real close to a guarantee, but the current setup was... optimal. Somewhat. With Sonic and Nicole there it shouldn't go too horrible if things got out of hand. "You guys ready?"

"Ready for what ?" It was the first time Sonic spoke since arriving. He was looking around at the three of them with wide, confused eyes and looked about ready to throw his hands up. "Can we slow down for a second, I- Sorun we JUST figured out you're back and the second we do Nicole's telling me you need me for something? What's going on? Why are we in the hospital, are you- you're okay, right?"

"So many questions, Sonic, one thing at a time." Leaning an elbow on the counter for support, Sorun leaned his body towards Dr.

Quack's way and pointed at the duck with his other arm. "I'm gonna give this guy his eyeball back. I can explain everything else after."

It didn't do anything to assuage Sonic's confusion, as he visibly still looked a bit lost, but to his credit he'd managed to shake most of it off an adopted a more relaxed, if slightly interested, expression. "Oooookay..." he began, "we'll do that I guess. Hi, Sorun, by the way, great to see you safe."

The greeting gave Sorun a bit of pause, as he didn't much expect it. He didn't know how to respond, so the most he managed to give was an awkward little wave towards Sonic. It seemed Sonic was in the same boat, because all he'd managed to do was reciprocate it with an equally awkward wave. Off to the side Nicole had watched the exchange, and when ten seconds of silence passed she gently knocked on the surface of the Emerald to gain everyone's attention.

"May we please begin?" she requested.

"Yeah, sure. Sonic, get ready just in case."

"Again: ready for what?" Sonic asked. "I don't even know why you need me."

"I need you here in case the Empusa tries to attack someone."

"In case the what does what? What? We're doing what?" Blinking rapidly, Sonic backed up a step as Sorun began to approach Nicole. He tried shaking his hands to get Sorun's attention. "Seriously I need an answer here!"

The hand shaking, and Sonic's request for answers, went ignored by Sorun. He'd immediately stopped right in front of Nicole and grabbed the Emerald, though when he attempted to pull away she didn't let go of it. He looked up, catching the unsure expression Nicole was sending up.

"Sorun, this doesn't seem wise," she said. "The further detail you go into this the more it seems you had good reason for withholding this. And now you're talking about something attacking somebody. I want a straight answer before I give this to you: how dangerous is what we're about to attempt?"

"It's..." Sorun trailed off, and then sighed. She didn't sound like she would accept anything else, and they all deserved to know what he was getting them into. He decided to say it plainly. "I don't know if it's going to attack someone because it's something I'm gonna make with the Emerald, and everything I've ever made always listens to me. But this is the first time I'm making a creature here, so I dunno what's gonna happen. So I need Sonic and you and standby because this thing is really dangerous."

"I will reiterate. How dangerous?"

"Well for sure if I drop it it'll go back to being a magic glowing rock so it's not like there's a risk of it escaping or anything." He was pretty sure of that. Damn near certain, actually. "But at the same time this thing can cut people in half with a single swing, so... yeah. Need you two on standby in case it starts wigging out."

Maybe that hadn't been quite the right combination of words to say to them all. The reactions varied: Sonic looked tense, like he had a million and one questions racing through his mind and at the same time couldn't take his eyes off the Emerald because he knew what was about to possibly happen. Dr. Quack was glancing towards the door and was backing up as far into the counter as space allowed. Nicole, strangest of all, looked calculating. She was looking down at the Emerald like she was contemplating, hard enough her ears were lowering a bit over her head. He felt her grip tighten, and for a moment Sorun was convinced that she was going to decide against this and take the Emerald away.

And then, slowly, Nicole released her grip as she came to a decision. "You seem sure," she said, somewhat hesitantly as her hands pulled completely away. "You've never done this before. You said so yourself," she continued. "How do you even know you can do this in the first place?"

Ah, the consequences of never actually telling anyone how this worked. It was fun at times, but this was one of the rare moments it was actually biting him. He didn't feel like giving his secrets up just because of that, though. "It's like at the beach, when I showed you all those weapons," he explained. "I just know these things."

"And yet you don't know if you can control this... creature of yours."

"Because it's uncharted territory, Nicole. And hey, you're the one always encouraging scientific experimentation-" He cut himself off when Nicole looked up to give him a sharp glare. "What I mean," he quickly corrected, "is that this is about as safe an environment as we're gonna get." He nodded his head at Dr. Quack. "And, well, I owe the guy my life from that one time and I know from experience the life of being a cyclops is suffering. Really the least I owe him is a shiny new eye."

"... Fine, then. You seem sure." Conceding with a resigned look and closed eyes, Nicole took a few steps back. Her eyes opened back up, and she said, "This doesn't erase anything."

"Y... yeah." It was too transparent a move made in the heat of the moment. Anybody probably could've seen through it the more Sorun thought on it, and if that were the case it had almost zero chance flying by Nicole. It vexed him a bit he ended up playing the eye card for nothing in the end, but... ah, well. He probably wouldn't have used it for anything else anyways.

Gripping the blue Emerald tight in his hands Sorun walked in front of the doctor. He still looked unsure about all of this, still taking occasional glances at the door. Sorun felt he'd be a bit mad if he did that after having come so far, and decided to get the show on the road before the doctor changed his mind. "Alright, usin' it," he said. "There's absolutely no preparing you guys for what this thing looks like so don't freak out."

He pictured in his mind what he wanted. The glow of the Emerald intensified, and he felt the same sensation he always felt when he twisted these energies into something it wasn't. "Okay okay okay good so far..." he thought. The Emerald was dissolving, breaking apart into innumerable, tiny fragments that were swirling together into a shape. "Alright listen, heart, I know the lore doesn't explicitly say the regen juice this thing puts out can regrow body parts, but you've stretched the rules on a lot of these things so throw me a fucking bone here. I'm gonna look like a loser if this flops."

There wasn't an acknowledgement or anything like that. At the end of the day it was still him deciding what this rock was shaping into and what it could do, even if it was on a subconscious level, and if he could force it through sheer force of will and mental yelling Eggman would have died of a heart attack months ago. His Yamato could do some wacky things because of that separation loophole, though, so there had to be some give here. A little room to bend the rules his own heart arbitrarily agreed on. And Sorun liked to imagine that if it was his heart it'd absolutely allow loophole shenanigans for his benefit.

He guessed he'd see pretty soon, because he was done making what he needed to make. The first reaction he got was Sonic screaming out on shock.

"OH, WHAT THE- nope, nope I- oh, that's- ugh, I can't..." He made a gagging sound and turned away from the creature Sorun was holding out in his hands. He dry heaved a few times, making Sorun think he was genuinely about to throw up. He glanced back at the creature, and then made a strangled, sort of disgusted sound as he turned away again. "Sorun, what is that !?"

What indeed. It was small, no longer than one of Sorun's arm. Its body had gray, thickened flesh. Its legs were quadruped, ending in sharpened points, and its arms were similar to that of a praying mantis. The torso was thin, insect-like, with hardened carapace surrounding the soft midsection. Two wings with translucent membrane colored in metallic blues, pinks, and greens like that of a dragonfly jutted out from its back.

It was probably the head that was freaking Sonic out. At a first glance it looked like an ant's head. Like two large bulbs smashed together to form a head with two large pincers jutting out of its mouth. If one looked closer, though, they'd see each side of its head, each of those "bulbs", had a human eye that glowed a solid blue and a nose. And between those partial faces was a human, skull-like face. One with completely empty eye sockets and a mouth full of razor-sharp teeth right behind the two large, serrated pincers on either side of its mouth.

"It's an Empusa. Specifically one of the green ones," Sorun answered Sonic. The hedgehog was still refusing to even look at it - gagging out and shuddering while muttering under his breath. He found a bit of amusement at the sight.

"... Sorun, you know the more I think about it I start to realize maybe having one eye isn't so bad," Dr. Quack said. He wasn't doing much better now that Sorun looked at him. He looked queasy, and seemed to be looking up at the ceiling, as if trying to avoid even catching a glance at the thing Sorun was holding. "The kids really like the eyepatch. Says it makes me look 'hip' or whatever they called it. And cybernetic augmentation's come a long way, and while I realize there's a stigma around it because of everything Eggman did I'm starting to come around to-"

"Doc, come on we've already come this far." Sorun lightly shook the little monster he was holding in his hands. It made a deep trilling noise. "You're gonna hurt its feelings if you turn back now."

"That hideous thing doesn't even look like it has feelings," the duck snapped, looking back down from the ceiling, and then making a sound in the back of his throat and looked down further until he was then staring at his feet. "It... I don't even have the words to describe that."

"It has a skull for a face, why does it have a skull for a face...?" Sonic mumbled out. He covered his face with his hands, turned his head to the creature's direction, and then spread his fingers out a bit to peak through them. "Jeez, it's got- it's got three faces, Sorun, why, why any of this!? It looks like you pulled it straight out of a nightmare!"

"I mean... you're kind of on the mark," Sorun admitted. The hand dropped away from Sonic's face to reveal a disbelieving look. "It came from my heart. Or brain. Mind. However you wanna interpret it. Nightmare ain't too far off."

"And this is what you dream about!? Weird bug skull monster things!?" Sonic exclaimed, gesturing wildly at the Empusa. It turned its head over to look at him, making Sonic cringe back with a grossed-out expression and take a few steps back. "At least tell me it isn't gonna try and hurt anyone, man..."

"If it hasn't tried to kill anyone at this point then I'm pretty sure its safe." There was one positive right there. If there was at least one thing he could walk away with it was the knowledge any lesser demons he made wouldn't try to go on a murder rampage. He doubted it'd be useful information he'd ever use, but it was still nice to know. "Wanna hold it?" he asked, making a small mocking grin towards Sonic.

"Sorun seriously if you try coming close with that thing I'm leaving," Sonic said, backing up a few more steps while warily eyeing the demon. "If it's not dangerous after all then I'm staying over here."

Humming, Sorun decided to make no further comment. It was when he looked over at the fourth occupant in the room, Nicole, did he realize that he'd shown this thing to her and that she was staring right at it. It was in that moment he froze, and nearly felt his heart seize. There wasn't any overly strong emotion on her face that he could discern, but it hardly mattered as intrusive thoughts began to invade his brain. Would she find this hideous thing connected to him so monstrous she'd start judging? Would this change the paradigm of their relationship any more than his screw-ups had already caused? Would she find it so disturbing she wouldn't even speak to him again?

Maybe not that last one, because she'd stepped forwards until she was right next to the Empusa. It was all Sorun could do but to watch with bated breath as she reached her hands out. She grabbed at one of the Empusa's arms and extended it out slightly to examine it. The bladed portion of the mantis-like limb wasn't a blade at all - it was five fingers tipped with long, sharpened talons that perfectly flushed together into a blade. Unlike the rest of the limb the bicep portion of the arm wasn't insect-like at all. It was eerily similar to a human bicep in shape.

A small, acknowledging sound left Nicole as she released the arm. The Empusa made a sort of guttural cooing noise, its serrated mandibles slowly opening and closing and its head tilting as Nicole continued to look at it. She finally decided to comment on it. "Despite appearances it seems friendlier than you advertised, Sorun."

Sorun turned his head away a bit, hoping the motion made some of his hair hide the redness on his cheeks. "I think that's just you," he mumbled out.

"... Ah. I see." Her eyes quickly regarded him and then focused back on the Empusa. "Why does it have so many human-like features?"

"You're asking for secrets I'm not willing to share with anybody besides you. And Sonic and Dr. Quack are right there," Sorun said. He saw the doctor roll his eye from the corner of his vision and Sonic had tried to make a remark, but then he'd caught sight of the Empusa again, made a distressed noise, and turned away. "It looks like this because this is what an Empusa looks like. That's all I'm willing to say here, right now in this place."

"That's fair, I suppose."

"Hm...?" He noticed she was still looking at it, green eyes scanning up and down the small demon's body. Other than the air of curiosity surrounding her Nicole wasn't showing any strong reaction towards it. "You don't seem that spooked compared to the others."

"I don't get spooked," she replied bluntly. "Otherwise I don't have any overly strong feelings concerning the appearance of this creature. I think it's an interesting design, but that's it."

"'Interesting'!?" Sonic cried out from the other side of the room.

"What I assume to be a human skull situated in the center of its face raises questions, I'll admit," she added.

"Yeah, I know it's weird," Sorun said. "You wanna show Cream this later? See what happens?"

Nicole's answer came with the addition of a disapproving frown. "You're not allowed to give children nightmares, Sorun," she said, causing no small amount of disappointment in Sorun. She glanced over her shoulder. "You may have already given Sonic nightmares," she continued.

Sonic made a sputtering noise in outrage but otherwise was continuing to try and not look at the Empusa.

"Fine..." Sorun sighed out. "... Can I show Antoine?"

"No." Nicole took a few steps back, and then asked, "Now may we please know the reason you decided to create this creature?"

Somewhere deep inside, Sorun felt some relief. She didn't seem horrified beyond comprehension at the Empusa like the other two seemed to be, so that was good. If anything she seemed a bit more relaxed now. Maybe seeing something brand-new caused her to mellow out a bit. "Right," he began. He lifted the Empusa up to draw attention to the bulbous abdomen hanging off the end of the Empusa's torso. It was engorged and inflated like the abdomen of an ant or a spider, and green light was shining out from beneath its flesh. "This particular Empusa is actually one of the smaller ones."

Sonic made a groaning sound. "What, there's bigger ones?"

"The normal worker drones are about four times bigger than this one." Sonic didn't even comment. He just shook his head with that sickened look on his face and waved at Sorun to continue. "Anyway, it's a support unit meant to shower a kind of healing nectar it keeps in its abdomen to heal the normal worker drones. I'm gonna cut it open and spill a bunch of healing juice on Dr. Quack's face. Unless anyone has any objections...?"

He'd looked towards Dr. Quack when he said that. The duck certainly looked like he did, squeamishly looking towards the Empusa and regarding its green abdomen with disgust. He shook his head, mumbling out, "Consarn it, we're already this far and I do want that eye." He looked to Sorun and asked, "Does it at least taste... not disgusting?"

"Yeah, like limes," Sorun said. He took the question as consent and, swiftly, grabbed the scalpel he'd put down earlier while gripping the Empusa's neck with the other hand while holding it up. There wasn't any flair or fanfare with the cut; he'd simply stabbed the small blade into the uppermost part of the abdomen, where it connected with the Empusa's torso, and dragged it all the way down to the tip. The Empusa screamed, a high-pitched, screeching sort of sound and wriggled in his grasp as its lifeblood poured out of the wound Sorun made.

He jolted a bit. Something tore through him the moment the Empusa died in his hand. Some unwell feeling. Not wishing to waste time, Sorun put the feeling off in the back of his mind and held the twitching demon above Quack's head. There wasn't really a better way to do it, and he couldn't even put the corpse down without it disappearing. So he'd just held it over Quack and sort of tried to sprinkle it on him, doing his best to aim it so that the green, glowing fluid dribbling out would land on the doctor's face. He'd started sputtering out immediately.

"Agh, you lied! This doesn't taste like limes at all!" Quack yelled out, shaking his head while gagging out as the green slime poured over his head.

Sorun snorted. "You actually bought that? Wow." Despite his glib tone, Sorun was paying close attention to see if anything was happening. And something was . The green fluid was disappearing off of Quack's body moments after making contact. It wasn't a characteristic of the nectar itself; some had spilled out on the floor and that was remaining in place. It was only the fluid that touched Dr. Quack that was disappearing.

Suddenly, there was a groan from the doctor. He held the eyepatch that was covering his eye and winced greatly, and then made a short sort of shout and tore the eyepatch right off. Sorun looked closer and made an "oof" sound. He imagined there was once a empty eye socket behind that eyepatch. Now there was a little, wriggling ball of meat in there, pulsing and undulating.

"It supposed to burn like this...?" the duck hissed out. His features were scrunched up, in pain. Both Sonic and Nicole, standing off to the side, looked unsure and were looking to Sorun for an answer.

"Well, I don't feel anything whenever I regenerate stuff, but that body isn't normal," Sorun said to them with a shrug. "Probably a lot of friction going on in there, but listen, I'm sure this gunk'll cancel out the burn damage. And hey! You already got a li'l meat blob growin' in there. Just, uh, angle your head up a bit, lemme really lay it on thick."

The doctor did so, though he looked like he was regretting it. With the new angle Sorun was able to aim the small stream of slime directly into the semi-empty socket. It was doing the trick - the object that looked like a mish-mash of pulsing meat was taking shape, growing spherical. It was lightening from a deep red to a glossy white. A blue ring was forming in its center with a black dot in the middle.

"Alright, I think it worked." Despite the doctor's words Sorun kept pouring. "Bleh, Sorun, it worked, you can stop!" He kept pouring. "Sorun I can see out of the blasted eye!"

"Oh, sorry, didn't hear you." And just in time, too, because the Empusa's abdomen was drained to the point it was only dripping a few drops of slime out at a time. The creature itself had died pretty much immediately after Sorun cut it open. Now it was just a limp corpse he was holding up. He regarded it for all of a second before tossing it on the counter besides them. It glowed brightly and then disappeared the moment it left contact with Sorun's hand, and what ended up clattering on top of the counter was a glowing, blue gem. The green slime that had been spilled all around had disappeared as well. Any evidence of that Empusa ever existing was completely gone.

All except for that eye, that was. Dr. Quack was blinking heavily, both eyes looking around to look at whatever drew his attention. He looked about as surprised as Sorun felt; he wasn't even sure that would work or that the eye would stay once he disappeared the Empusa. He felt a bit glad knowing it did, if only because it meant there wasn't some kind of terrible blowback he had to deal with now.

"Welcome back to the world of depth perception," Sorun said in a dull deadpan. "Everything working okay? Eye blurry or anything? I can bring it back if you need a second dose."

"NO!" Quack quickly shouted, turning at Sorun and shaking his head. "I mean, uh... no, no that's fine," he said, quickly coughing to clear his throat. "The eye appears to be functioning fine, it... huh." He blinked and looked around. "It actually feels like I never even lost it."

"Doesn't look it. It didn't do anything for the scar tissue, sorry." There was an ugly patch completely around the duck's eye socket that lacked any fur. Flesh scarred over from the explosion that took the eye to begin with. There were a couple of small slashes going past the eye socket, too, maybe shrapnel from the mine. It hadn't disappeared with the regeneration of the eyeball. "Huh. My scars went away. Might just be another quirk of Devil's Body."

Dr. Quack rose a hand up to feel around the eye socket. His fingers rubbed over the scarred tissue, making an unsatisfied huff leave him. "Well, I guess it was too much to hope for it to go perfectly. Still, the eye is more than I could have asked for. Might run a few tests on it later, but... for all intents and purposes everything looks... completely... fine, Sorun, are you okay?"

He didn't think he was. That feeling he'd felt when the Empusa died was intensifying, making him feel a bit nauseous and causing his head to start spinning a bit. "Nah, uh, I-I'm fine," he mumbled out, stumbling back a bit and grabbing onto the counter with one hand to steady himself. Nobody around him looked like they believed him. "It's... it's all fine, everything's fine..."

A new feeling was welling up and he'd covered his nose and mouth with his free hand to try and head it off. It didn't work. Crimson fluid started to leak between his fingers. At that point he'd given up and let his hand fall away, thereby letting the streams of blood pouring out of his nose splash around on the ground. He stumbled a bit, about ready to collapse onto the ground right there. He caught a swirl of green in the corner of his vision, and suddenly there was a pair of hands holding his shoulder and arm to keep him steady.

Mildly surprised at the assistance, Sorun looked at her. Ever since he explained to Nicole where he'd been there'd been an air of animosity surrounding her, and every time she so much as glanced at his way there was clear bitterness in her eyes. That was all gone right now. No frustration, no hostility, none of that. She just looked plain worried now, staring right at his face and where the blood had been pouring out from his nose.

"It... takes a lot out of me, I guess. When a living thing I made dies..." He held his bloodied hand up to his nose again. That debilitating wave from earlier was beginning to subside, and the bleeding had stopped. His mouth and chin were still a mess of red, though. "I-I'm fine."

"... None of this is fine." She'd started to relax her grip slightly, testing to make sure he actually could stand on his own, and it was only when she was satisfied did Nicole fully release him and take a few steps back. "You're never to do this again," she quietly mumbled out.

Sorun hesitated in responding. That tone Nicole was using - he couldn't place it. It sounded like somebody who was incredibly exhausted and simultaneously on the verge of screaming and he didn't know what it meant. "I'm trying to fix it," he said, as if such a weak thing to say actually meant something. Somewhere deep down he hoped it meant something.

The look Nicole gave him said it didn't amount to much after all. That withered expression somehow hurt him more than killing the Empusa had. "I've matters to attend to. I cannot... I can't with this, Sorun. Please sort out what you need to and find me later."

Before Sorun could give any kind of answer she'd disappeared in a swirl of pixels. He'd watcher her go wordlessly, staring at the spot she'd disappeared from. He wasn't sure at all what that had meant in its entirety. Her being completely fed up with him for now and needing to take a moment to herself, he supposed. He couldn't help but feel the worst.

"What a fuckup I am." He let out a slow, steady breath, and then looked towards the counter. The blue Emerald was still sitting there, ready for the taking. And take it he did, hand reaching out and grasping it. It'd reformed into his katana the moment he'd made contact, fingers comfortably wrapping around the familiar tool as he lifted it off the table. "Fine. Desperate measures. I don't care if I have to lobotomize and slave him with the Yamato. I need to fix this."

So goddamn sick of things like this interrupting his life. Enough. He'd had enough. It was enough months ago. It was enough his first day on this planet.

"Doc, you can go. I think we're done here," Sorun said. He brought the sword closer, holding it in both hands as he inspected the sheathed blade up and down. Seemed to be in order, as usual.

"Uh..." The doctor sounded unsure. When Sorun looked up he saw the doctor looking at him pensively. Or perhaps at all the blood on his face. "I really do think after that little display I should run a test or two-"

"This isn't something that you can fix. We tried that. I'm doing something else now." He looked back down at the blade, but then frown a small bit when he noticed the duck hadn't left. "Quack. I'll be fine. Go."

Dr. Quack made a harsh kind of sound and shook his head. "If you wanna be that way, fine. Tissues are on the counter to clean yourself off. If you need me you'll know where I'll be." He walked towards the room's door, his footsteps sounding more heavy, dragging almost. He opened the door and then stopped halfway, looking back into the room. "And... Sorun, uh, I just wanted to say thanks. You know, for the eye. I know the kids'll-"

"Go."

Evidently he must've taken the hint, because that was the moment Dr. Quack ducked out of the room entirely, closing the door behind him. Sorun wanted to breath a relieved sigh after that. He wanted to, but he couldn't. Because he could still see Sonic standing at the other end of the room, staring at him. It bothered Sorun.

"What do you want?" he asked. He spotted the box of tissues Dr. Quack had mentioned earlier and reached out with his right hand to grab at a few. His left hand was still holding onto Yamato.

Sonic blinked at the question. He shook his head a bit in shock, as if he'd been struck. And then he asked, "What do you mean, what do I want? What kind of question is that?"

"You're still here," Sorun observed. He'd grabbed the tissues and began to wipe the blood off his face, grimacing the smallest bit when he realized some of it had dried on. He'd have to wash it off with the sink at home. "Why?"

Sonic still looked confused. "Of course I'm still here, I don't- what are you even asking?"

Out of respect for the doctor Sorun pocketed the bloodied tissues to throw away later instead of tossing them out on the floor. The question Sonic asked irked him, though. His presence in the room irked him. Enough that when Sorun looked back at him his eyes were glowing green. " What ... do you want?" he repeated.

"I wanna know if you're alright!" he yelled out, sounding a bit frustrated. "I mean, I mean jeez, Sorun, you know, you get kidnapped and disappear and then out of the blue you're back bleeding everywhere and your eyes are, I don't even..." He stopped himself, pressed his palms together, and then took a deep breath before opening his eyes back on Sorun. "I just wanna know what's going on. You know, if you're okay, if I can do anything to help. That sort of thing."

"It's not really any of your business." That tone. That fucking tone of his . So eager to be helpful, so earnest. So free to feel all these things because everything always worked out for him. Never changed, he never changed with him. It was one of those moments where it pissed Sorun off to no end just standing in the same room as Sonic.

"None of my- you're actually being serious right now," Sonic realized. His features hardened a bit, and his voice grew a bit harsher. "I feel like it's my business when one of my friends starts bleeding all over the floor, Sorun. And you think it's just you I'm worried about here? Did you even see how distressed this is making Nicole? Did you even stop and think maybe everyone else is gonna be worried about this!?"

Theeeere it was. Something that finally made that obnoxious attitude drop into something a bit more confrontational. It made the corners of Sorun's mouth perk up just the smallest bit, and the green glow in his eyes intensified. "There's nothing anyone can do to help, so I didn't bother. It won't be an issue when it's resolved. It barely bears mentioning."

The explanation didn't seem to calm Sonic down in the slightest. "So what, you're gonna just go and fix it? Whatever this is? How do you even plan on doing that?"

Sorun didn't dare laugh. As if Sonic would actually let him if he knew what he was planning. "As I said, it's none of your business. There's a path I can take. That's all I'll say on the subject."

"A path," Sonic airily repeated. "Wow, that tells me nothing. Does your 'path' involve that freaky monster thing, because that didn't seem to work out too good for you."

The small grin Sorun had grown died. That fire- no, not even that. Whatever sparks of hostility he'd manage to elicit out of Sonic were gone now, the embers quickly fading. It made him adopt a neutral expression and made his eyes fade to blue as he crossed arms and leaned his back against the counter, sword still in hand. "No, that healing nectar only works on physical wounds. What's wrong with me isn't physical. More... ingrained."

"And you can't just make something that does help you?" he asked. "You can make all this other amazing stuff but you can't spin that?"

"How simple life would be if I could..." Sorun let a bitter chuckle out at the thought. "No. There's nothing I can make that can help me. I can pick and choose some things, but I have a limited selection to draw from. And I'm hesitant on making creatures after what happened with the Empusa. That was quite literally the weakest one I possess; I don't want to imagine the consequences of summoning bigger things. I'm for sure never creating any of the sapient ones." That was just a whole can of worms he didn't feel like dealing with. It wouldn't be worth the headache. Which sucked, because a large majority of the demons he could create were sapient.

Sonic's eyes closed halfway. He seemed to be trying to discern something about something, but then grew visibly dissatisfied as he failed to find whatever he was looking for. "How does any of that even work?" he asked. "Did you really make that creature from your nightmares? 'Cause... I mean if it's bad enough you're dreaming about stuff like that , Sorun..."

The frown returned to Sorun's face when he sensed the concern in Sonic's voice. "I'm fine. And I won't tell."

Sonic grit his teeth and clenched his fingers hard enough to make his gloves audibly tighten. "Agh, why not!?"

"Because it's funny knowing I a hundred percent know how this works and nobody else does," Sorun honestly answered. The frown went away at the satisfaction he felt at seeing Sonic frustrated at the answer. "If it'll make you feel any easier though, Sonic, I'm serious when I say I have a way of saving myself. I'd rather just do this alone and not draw more people into my problems." Anything to get him off his back so he could just go already.

"Well... fine." Sonic didn't look all that happy with the statement, not in the least, but he at least looked understanding. Maybe because he realized it wasn't something Sorun would budge on. Which he wouldn't. "But listen, there was something else."

"What is it?"

"It's..." Sonic blew an uneasy breath out and ran a hand through his quills. He looked uneasy; hesitant in saying what he was about to say, uncomfortable, even. Nevertheless he took a deep breath and managed to say, "Back when you were taken, you... we all came as soon as we could but couldn't find you. Where'd you go?"

"It's a long story. I wasn't there at that castle for long. Was here, was there, I don't feel like recounting the whole thing at the moment. Ask me later if you care that much," Sorun said. "Why?"

"Just wanted to know what happened, sheesh. But, uh... it's about... did you talk to Miles? Like, at all? Not, er, our Miles, Tails, but the other one? The Anti-Tails?"

Sorun hummed in thought. "Little bit. Said something about cutting a deal with you guys."

"Yeah, we did," Sonic said. "Most of Scourge's 'friends' were so sick of the guy they offered to hand him to us as long as we left each others' zones alone after. And after we beat Scourge and looked for you we found him and Antoine's and Sally's doubles."

Oh. This was about that. He probably should have saw this coming. "Yeah, I didn't believe him when he said that," Sorun explained.

Sonic made a heavy breath. "Sorun, we had to bring them here to be treated." He enunciated the word "here" by pointing both index fingers at the floor. "Anti-Sally was fine but you gave the other two concussions! Anti-Miles was bleeding all over the place because of a bunch of wounds! Anti-Antoine lost a finger! How did that even happen!?"

Shrugging, Sorun answered, "It fell off." Sonic didn't look impressed. He scowled at Sorun and crossed his arms, waiting for him to continue. It made Sorun sigh a bit. "I panicked and things got carried away," he revised. He didn't sound apologetic in any way and didn't care to. He sounded more bored than anything else. "And that evil little cyclops told me about what happened with Antoine's dad so, I'll admit, I kinda got a bit angry."

Amazingly that managed to soften the expression Sonic was wearing by a bit. But only by a bit. "You maimed a guy over a grudge?" he asked, sounding disbelieving.

"You better believe I did. He'll have to get a cool robot finger if he ever wants to hold a sword again. Or just use the other hand," Sorun said. It made Sonic sigh and rub at his closed eyes. "Why do you even care?" he asked.

"Why do I-!?" Sonic looked back up in shock. "Other than the fact all their pals freaked out and demanded we help them or all bets were off, you went too far! They were barely coherent when they woke up, couldn't say a single word anyone could make out! I feel like anyone should care after seeing someone like that!"

"'Too far,' he says," Sorun said in a derisive tone. "Listen closely, Sonic. I was kidnapped and taken to a whole other universe against my will. I didn't know you all were storming the gates to help me. I thought I was on my own, and unlike someone like you I didn't have powers to fall back on at the time."

"Then how'd you even escape? How'd you cause those wounds?" Sonic challenged.

"Same reason I'm in this hospital," Sorun answered. His eyes started glowing green again. "I did what I thought I had to in order to survive. So things happened. Don't you dare stand there and judge me when you weren't even there to see what happened."

"You didn't have to tear his finger off. You can't tell me you needed to do that when you managed to fight off three people barehanded."

"And you don't have to criticize me like you're some villain apologist."

Despite the words Sonic didn't seem eager to back off from the fact. Quite the opposite - he looked defiant, about as much as Sorun felt on the topic. It was proof enough that neither were willing to budge on their stances. And for some unexplained reason, deep inside, Sorun actually felt refreshed at the small confrontation the two were having at the moment. Like the friction was causing some sort of joy, the same feeling that'd made him smile a bit from earlier when he'd gotten a rise out of Sonic. He liked the feeling.

But then Sonic had to interrupt it by tapping at his own face, above his lips but beneath his nose. "Hey. You're bleeding again," he informed him.

Indeed he was. When Sorun held fingers to his nose they were pulled back with fresh, wet blood on their tips. It made Sorun sigh and have his eyes go back to blue. "Look, I have enough to deal with without having to hear this from you of all people," he muttered, wiping the blood off on his pants. "I got a failing body and a relationship on the rocks. I don't need inconsequential nonsense like this tacked on top of all that, so let's just agree to disagree and drop it."

"I don't think permanently injuring someone is inconsequential, Sorun."

"I don't care and nothing you say is gonna make me care," Sorun said. "And if you think I'm gonna go all the way over there and fix it by regenerating his finger with another Empusa then you can forget it. Nicole'd never let me anyways."

Sonic grimaces. He was obviously displeased, but at the same time the defiance in his eyes had cooled into acceptance. "I don't see the point arguing this if you aren't even gonna listen," he said. "Just... please promise me this won't happen again."

"Sonic, if I had it my way I'd live the rest of my days with my little courier job and never get into another fight in my life." Something about that sentence seemed wrong. Sorun wasn't sure what. "It was a one-time thing. A temporary bout of mania brought on by desperation and anger given the situation at the time. I don't seek a repeat."

"... I guess I'll trust you on that," Sonic sighed out. The defiant fire died out in him once again, making Sorun feel another odd bout of disappointment. "I just... y'know, I get things were bad and I get everything that happened with Antoine and his old man were awful. I don't even blame you for feeling the way you did. I just don't want you flying off the handle again. You scared some people."

"It won't happen again." Assuming nobody ever attacked him again. From there not even Sorun was sure what would happen. "What ended up happening with Scourge, anyways?" If nothing else he was curious what happened with that green lunatic since he wasn't there to see it.

The question alone made Sonic adopt a disgruntled, slightly exhausted expression. "Ugh, it wasn't easy. He had a stupid throne packed with a power-up and got a Super form. We had to stall and time him out of it to beat him. Took him to Zone Jail after, so he shouldn't be a problem ever again."

"I'll pretend to understand what that means." Whatever this "Zone Jail" was, Sorun didn't care enough to ask. Scourge was out of the picture and that's all he really cared about in the end. "Well," Sorun said, shrugging off the counter, "if that's everything then-"

"Actually," Sonic interrupted, "there's one more thing. You got a message."

"Tell Elias I'm not playing chess with him again. He always wins."

"Oh boy, no, Sorun, it's not that kind of message," Sonic groused with a roll of his eyes. "I don't know the details, just that there was some kind of encrypted-whatever message that came through on the computer the castle uses for communications. They decoded it and said it was for you. Happened a day after you went missing."

That was... huh. Sorun didn't know what to think of that. What was he supposed to think of that? Did he even know anybody outside of the city that'd go that far to talk to him? He didn't think so. A lot of people out there probably assumed he was still dead. His first thought went to Finitevus, but he was one of those people who assumed Sorun was dead. Maybe. "What'd the message say?"

"Asked for you to come to a location out in the middle of nowhere. Came with a set of coordinates," Sonic answered. "Said to meetup at noon in a few days, which... I guess would be today, huh?"

Sorun frowned. He looked towards the wall clock hanging above the hospital room's door, and then looked back at Sonic. "It's noon in an hour," he deadpanned.

"Well, you looked like ya had a lot going on," Sonic said, grinning and shrugging. It caused Sorun to sigh out and make his way towards the door. "Hey, if you want me to tag along-"

"I don't," Sorun grumbled, grasping the doorknob. "My mysterious message so my business. I'm gonna go find out where this spot is and go."

"Really?" The grin fell off of Sonic's face. "Sorun, seriously, we don't know who sent this message and you're just gonna go along? What if it's a trap?"

"A trap by who? Everyone who has a problem with me thinks I'm dead," Sorun said, turning around to address Sonic while keeping his hand on the doorknob. "Unless you blabbed to Eggman I'm not dead, and I'm gonna be tight if you did, Sonic."

"No, no one did," he answered. "It's still weird, though. Nobody with good intentions goes outta their way to make overcomplicated messages and meetups like this without even leaving a signature. It just stinks, is all."

"... Yeah, I guess." As much as it grinded Sorun to admit it, Sonic had a point. It was pretty weird. Enough to warrant caution, even, because after everything he'd been through Sorun's paranoid mind wouldn't allow him to not view it in caution. He still didn't want Sonic coming, though, in case he had to do something untoward. "I'll go call in a favor if it'll get you off my back."

For once Sorun was glad to have left his coat behind at home. It was hot - the midday sun hung overhead and there were only a few light clouds floating in the sky. The location was arid, much more than it should be for being near the east coast of the continent, no plant life anywhere, but it'd turned out the meetup location that was in that message was a few miles out from New Megaopolis, and that place pumped out so much pollution that he wasn't sure there was any plants within a hundred miles of the city.

So here he was, standing on some plateau out in the middle of nowhere. About twenty meters behind him was a drop that just lead to more flat, cracked and barren land. In front of him was a bunch of reddish-brown rocks blocking the way to more nothing-filled land. The place was desolate. Felt miserable just to stand here.

Making an impatient sigh, Sorun tugged at his vest. "I gotta drop this turtleneck and switch back to a normal shirt since winter's passed," he thought. Another impatient breath left him as he looked around. So far there was no sign of big mystery person. Just him and the guest he brought alone for that "just in case" scenario.

Speaking of, he glanced over to the side. Shadow looked even more bored than Sorun did, like he was about to fall asleep on the spot. He was sitting on a nearby flat rock, arm draped over his knee with his eyes half-closed. Sorun doubted he was actually tired. Probably just bored out of his mind.

"Well, thanks for humoring me and coming all the way out here with me. Even if it's turning into a pain," Sorun said, looking over at him. "I know it was kind of a last-minute thing."

"I wasn't busy," Shadow said back. "And this seemed important. You have no notion of who could possibly have a reason for dragging you out here?"

Sorun rose his sword up to his face. He pulled it out halfway, sighed, and then pushed it back into the sheath. "Someone who's gonna be sorry if they don't show up real soon here," he said.

For all his consternation, for all the annoyance Sorun felt at this situation, for the genuine anger that was beginning to brew in him for this beginning to look like a waste of time, the adage that misery loved company was true, because he imagined this being about ten times more miserable if Shadow weren't here. If anything else there was that. It was nice to have a dependable friend like him. Even if he was probably a liar.

"Are you entirely sure this isn't a trap?" Shadow spoke out. He sounded about as annoyed as Sorun felt. "Because this smells like a trap."

"Eh, it's a coinflip. I don't know who'd bother to trap me, but someone dragged me out to the boonies." He unsheathed his blade halfway again to look down at his reflection. "Really wearin' my patience out, too..."

Perhaps in need of some diversion, Shadow's eyes wandered over to the blade Sorun was holding. He maintained his stare for a few moments, and then commented, "I see you retrieved your Chaos Emerald."

"Yeah, the others found and held onto it for me." He sheathed the blade, and then turned his head halfway so one of his eyes met Shadow's. "This the part where you demand I hand it over since G.U.N.'s going around collecting these things for the greater good or whatever?"

Shadow gave him an odd, confused look. Like the tone Sorun used had caught him off guard. "You're a citizen of the Republic of Acorn, which, by default, would put the Emerald you're holding under their jurisdiction. G.U.N. and the Republic have an agreement to not poach Emeralds in the other's possession. You're fine."

"Oh. Okay, cool."

"Where did that question come from?"

"We're out in the middle of nowhere with little else to talk about, just give me some breathing room here."

Shadow didn't look like he believed the excuse, not entirely, but he must not have cared enough to pursue it because he let the topic drop right there. He did have on a sort of sour expression, though. Likely just grumpy from the current situation Sorun had dragged him into, which Sorun couldn't really blame him for. "If this really is a trap..."

"I assure you that this is no trap."

"Fucking finally. Where do I know that voice from?" It came out from behind the rocks that were in front of the two, and Sorun could swear he'd heard it before. An aged male voice that sounded tinny, like it was coming out from an electronic speaker of some kind. Not synthesized, but still electronically altered in some way. He'd heard it before. Where had he heard it?

He remembered real quick when the owner of that voice revealed themselves. They didn't have a body - it was just a head. A metal-covered head in a clear floating bubble, though the six mechanical tendrils sticking out the bubble's sides were new. The head wasn't new. The mechanical-looking echidna head staring over at Sorun with red, electronic eyes.

"Pfft... is that you, Dimitri?" Sorun almost laughed out loud at the sight. The katana in his hand transmuted into the Chaos Emerald, and with a wide smile Sorun glanced over at his companion. "Hey, Shadow, let's kill him."

Shadow thought about it for a solid second. "Alright," he agreed.

"What?" The head's cybernetic eyes dramatically widened, and the bubble floated backwards a bit. "Wait, wait no-!"

A blue, spectral fist flew forwards and grabbed the bubble. Its momentum didn't cease, causing the fist to smash the bubble into the reddish rock behind it, forming a crater and causing cracks to spread out over the rock. The bubble, miraculously, didn't seem to be scratched even a bit from the impact. At the same time, though, it was firmly within the Bringer Claw's grasp, and despite the struggling face Dimitri was making and the efforts of the tendrils winding around the demonic hand, nothing was causing it to dissipate.

"I was worried I was wasting my time coming all the way out here, but honestly? This makes up for it," Sorun called out. The spectral claw extending out from his right shoulder brought the bubble closer until the head in a bubble was in speaking distance from him. Shadow had dragged himself off his rock to stand a few paces away from Sorun. "Now I ain't been on the front lines in a while, got out of the Freedom Fighting biz, but last I heard... you were in league with all those Dark Legion echidna nutjobs that lined up on Eggman's side. I've heard constantly from the others how you command a bunch of squads of echidna whenever the Freedom Fighters fight him."

"G.U.N. has an outstanding bounty for any associates of Eggman's," Shadow helpfully supplied from the side. He was scowling up at the panicking head in a bubble. "Just as an aside."

"Ooh, hear that, Dimitri? Monetary compensation just got thrown in the mix. I got extra reason to kill you now." He glanced at Shadow. "Split the reward with me?"

Shadow scoffed. "They overpay me as it is. You may as well take the whole thing."

"The whole pot, Dimitri, can you believe it? It must be my lucky day."

"Sorun, stop it! Please!" For such an old-sounding voice Dimitri sure sounded shrill at the moment. The tentacles on his bubble were still wriggling around uselessly as he fruitlessly attempted to free himself. "I summoned you here to ask for your help!"

"Genuinely the worst mistake you've made in your life." To emphasize Sorun's point, the tips of the Bringer Claw's five claws pressed down and through the bubble. Dimitri yelped, retreating to the centermost spot of the bubble to avoid the five blue spikes piercing through, causing cracks to spiderweb over the surface of the bubble. "One reason." The smile fell off of Sorun's face. "Gimme one reason why I shouldn't crush your head like a grape and give your corpse over to Shadow."

"Because it's the right thing to do!" Dimitri cried out. The claws dug deeper; the cracks spread. "Because if this were really a trap I would have prepared weapons instead of coming to you unarmed and alone!"

Wait, that second thing actually made sense. With a single mental command the Bringer Claw relaxed the pressure it was exerting on the bubble. It still didn't let go, though it did lower the bubble down a bit so they could all see eye-to-eye. "You lost any and all credibility when you all threw yourselves in with Eggman's lot. You really think anything you say's gonna make me forget that?"

Some of Dimitri's composure returned when it appeared Sorun was willing to talk. The tentacles stopped wriggling and stilled, and Dimitri himself looked less panicked. He still seemed nervous - kept glancing at the claws holding his bubble - and when he spoke he didn't sound completely confident. "The Dark Legion only joined with him because he offered to give us back the cybernetic enhancements Enerjak took from us. I was in the same room with you at the time. I know you saw him do that through the monitor."

"Yeah, I remember. I'm just trying to figure out where in all those words you said is an actual justification for what you've been doing," he said.

"His kind joined league with an omnicidal maniac in exchange for cybernetic implants. There is no justification to be found," Shadow grunted out. "They're fanatics with no regard for life but their own."

"I don't expect either of you to understand our culture," Dimitri spat out at both of them. Whatever defiance he held quickly withered away at the glare both sent him, causing him to make a rattling sigh and look downwards. "And yet... I am asking you to understand our plight." He looked back up. "We're beholden to do Dr. Robotnik's bidding against our will. He booby trapped every single Dark Legion member with a bomb in addition to the cybernetics he gave us."

Neither looked the least bit surprised, which in itself startled Dimitri a bit. "Gave ya the ol' Elijah treatment, huh?" Sorun asked with a small, derisive grin. "What, am I supposed to be surprised he gave you all compliance assurance devices? That's completely in line with that maniac. It's such an obvious move he'd do I'd half-expect him not to do it just to throw you off."

"He's not wrong," Shadow added. "I'm having a difficult time finding sympathy for a band of fools trusting the most untrustworthy person on the planet."

"He was the only person the Dark Legion could turn to," Dimitri argued.

"For what !?" Sorun shouted. "None of them were even hurt! I saw what happened, saw Enerjak heal all those echidna's bodies when he took their cybernetics out! And the second that threat was gone what happened? Those freaks literally threw themselves at Eggman's feet and begged him to saw their limbs off so they could replace them with cyberware they didn't even need!"

"And not everyone wanted to remain in his service for all time!" Dimitri shouted back. "Nobody wanted to serve him under the threat of death! Nobody..." He trailed off, voice growing quieter as he closed his eyes. They opened back up half-lidded, looking practically defeated in Sorun's eyes. "Nobody deserves that," he finished. "Some only did it out of desperation for what Enerjak took from them, not out of some twisted ideal the Dark Legion holds onto."

"Some, but not most?" Sorun challenged. "Your sob story isn't impressing me. Just tell me why I'm standing here talking to you."

"Some of the echidna in the Dark Egg Legion ..." Dimitri sounded like he was trying to spit those words out, "want out. Completely."

"How many?" Shadow asked.

"Six."

A mocking sort of whistle left Sorun. "Wow. A whole six out of, what was it, an odd-hundred?" He rolled his eyes. "What prompted this burst of common sense?"

Dimitri made a sigh. "... Nobody will admit it out loud but everyone knows Dr. Robotnik's days are numbered. I ran the projections. He has, at the least, a few weeks before he's finally defeated by the Freedom Fighters. We're completely routed; cut off from everything and besieged in New Megaopolis. And Eggman must know it, too. He's been frantic, practically raving at all hours of the day, turning more and more into a lunatic. And lunatics are unpredictable. I don't want any of my kind to die because that madman hid a switch in the maddened throes of defeat.

"As for the six Legion members I mentioned, they see Eggman for what he is becoming and have their cybernetics back so they want out. To go join the others of their kind on Albion and leave everything else behind. But they can't, because of the bombs implanted in their bodies," he explained. "I'm a preeminent expert in the field, but that madman is that and a genius prodigy in addition. I cannot remove the bombs without setting off a trigger and detonating them. Nobody can, not through conventional means." Dimitri let his meaning hang in the air for a few seconds before speaking directly to Sorun. "You have... unconventional means."

The meaning wasn't lost on Sorun. He'd caught on immediately. And laughed. Laughed at the absurdity of it, enough that Dimitri and even Shadow were both giving him odd looks. But he couldn't help it; it was too comical. Him . He was the last, shining beacon of hope for a bunch of psychopaths. Little old Sorun.

What a fucking world.

"Hahahaha... ah, man." He wiped a tear that'd come loose from his eye and straightened back up to address Dimitri. "You want my Yamato," Sorun surmised. "More specifically you want its power of separation to take those bombs out."

"It worked on Enerjak. I don't see why it wouldn't work on manmade, physical objects if it works on the divine," Dimitri said.

"Oh, no, it'd work, for sure it'd work. Definitely," Sorun assured him with a nod. "That's not the problem. The problem is why I should care if a bunch of cyberpsycho echidna who keep shooting lasers at my friends get blown up for making the worst Faustian Bargain in history."

Because he didn't. He really didn't care if those echidna died. It wasn't his problem. They had nobody to blame but themselves for getting into this situation. And above all that they were enemies that regularly threatened his friends' lives. Now he was expected to go save them? That's why he'd laughed, because of the sheer absurdity. Like hell he'd save them.

It seems Dimitri wasn't easily deterred, though. "You should care because people will die despite you being in a position to save them. Because you're the only person who can. Because if that button is pressed their deaths will be on your conscience if you sit by and do nothing, Sorun."

"Why should I care?" Sorun repeated.

"You..." If nothing else, Dimitri just looked astonished now. Like he'd actually believed those words would have any appeal on Sorun. It was plain to see they didn't, and it made his mechanical-looking face make a ugly sort of frown as he regarded him in a new light. "What do you want?" he asked, turning to bargaining.

What did he want? Nothing Dimitri could give him. What he wanted was to be left the hell alone, but nobody ever seemed to get that message. What he wanted was to smash his little cyber-echidna head against the rocks so he could get paid and get on with his life-

His life. His shortening life. Which he needed help with. With which he was actively seeking help.

"You thinkin' what I'm thinkin'?" Another Sorun appeared in Sorun's eyes, standing to the side of Dimitri. He had a considering look on his face. "I mean... we were gonna go to Finitevus, but now that I think about it this guy's just as good, ain't he? Even better? He was the original Enerjak, after all. Gotta have some skills."

"I hear what you're saying. But him? Really?"

"You're really gonna be picky about which evil echidna scientist we use here?" Sorun asked himself. "We're desperate here, so cut him a deal. Worst case we still have Finitevus to fall back on, but Dimitri's right there in front of us. Might as well use it."

"Ugh..." He had a good point, even if Sorun didn't like thinking about it. He closed his eyes and shook his head, and when he opened them back up the other Sorun was gone. It was just Shadow and Dimitri, both staring at him expectantly.

Fine, then. If the Dark Legion liked deals so much he'd make one they couldn't refuse.

"Tell you what we're gonna do," Sorun began. "You see this?" He pointed at his eyes and forced them to begin glowing green for a brief moment. It elicited a fascinated gasp out of Dimitri. "This isn't normal. I don't know what caused this and it feels like it's slowly killing me. Fix this, and I'll save your boys. I'll even throw in a free ride to Albion."

Besides him Shadow blinked in surprise, but then quickly saw where Sorun was going with this and took a few steps back. For Dimitri's part, he looked less than enthused. In fact, he looked almost disbelieving. "Excuse me?"

"You were a scientist, weren't you? Researched any and all things related to Chaos energy, to the point you managed to become Enerjak's first host? Lotta people would look at that and assume you were the preeminent expert in this field."

"I am ," Dimitri said, some pride bleeding into his voice, "but... Sorun, your biology, no, your kind is unknown to me, as is whatever this condition you speak of is. You're asking me to miraculously cure-"

"Miracle for a miracle. That's the deal," Sorun interrupted. "I'm not willing to budge on this. It's in your best interest since I can't help you dead, anyways, and I have no clue how much time I've got left."

An electronic, rattling breath left Dimitri as he clenched his mechanical teeth. "I would... need time," he hesitantly stated. "How much is something I don't know, not without examining you first, but I swear to you if you save those six echidna I will do everything in my power to help you."

Sorun considered it for a moment. And then he shook his head. "No. Save me first and then I'll save them. I won't lift a finger otherwise."

Dimitri's expression turned to one of disgust. "You're attempting to leverage a bargain with people's lives ."

"You're not dealing with a Freedom Fighter right now, Dimitri. You're dealing with me," Sorun reminded him. "And don't get sanctimonious with me. One of us is in league with a global terrorist and it sure ain't me. I said it at the beginning: you don't have a shred of credibility to your name. I don't have a single reason to trust you."

"And I'm to trust you at your word?" Dimitri asked.

"I was aligned with a morally just cause and have people with solid credibility who would vouch for me. My word actually has weight. Yours doesn't." Complete bullshit, but at the same time he wasn't wrong, either. Dimitri just didn't have the moral high ground to argue from and both knew it.

The disgust on Dimitri's face turned to desperation. He was losing the negotiation, losing cards to play to sway his way, not that he'd had much of a hand to begin with. He'd come in on blind faith Sorun would help him because it was the right thing to do, because, quite simply, he hadn't known him that long. It was obvious for Sorun to see from the cyber-echidna's reactions thus far. He hadn't come properly prepared to negotiate terms and it showed. "I can just refuse you treatment until you save the echidna." And there it was. The desperation card. Sorun knew right there Dimitri had just went all in with everything he had. "We're both short on time, Sorun. Don't waste what little we have left arguing."

"Refuse the deal?" Sorun almost sounded a bit amused when he said that. "Are you under the impression I'm just gonna let you float away if we don't agree to something here? Dimitri, you either cut a deal with me right now or I'm just gonna kill you for that bounty. Deal or die. Those're the only two paths you got." That was Sorun's last card. He couldn't help but feel he was playing with a stronger hand, and felt all the more satisfied for it.

"You need me." That rebuttal came out of Dimitri quickly. Quick enough it caused a small grin to grow on Sorun's face. "You won't kill your only hope. You're bluffing."

"You're not the only mad echidna scientist in the world. I got Finitevus. And unlike you I actually have a good rapport with the guy. He'd probably help me without the threats."

"That maniac!?" Dimitri screamed out. "He's nearly as insane as Robotnik and you'd trust him over me!?"

"He's actually mellowed out a lot. At least he did last I spoke to him," Sorun said. "I'd rather deal with you since I don't feel like tracking him down, but... if we really can't come to an agreement, then, well..." Sorun let the implication hang off his tongue, going as far as to raise his eyebrows up and down at Dimitri, who remained silent. His face said it all, though. That resigned, defeated expression. It was the look of a man who knew he just lost.

"... Very well." When he spoke, Dimitri's voice came out quiet, subdued. "I'll diagnose and cure whatever this condition of yours is. In exchange you'll remove the explosive devices from the six aforementioned echidna and safely transport them to Albion. And leave me unharmed," he added.

Sorun nearly scoffed at the little addendum he added at the end there. Still, the deal was a good one. Probably his only chance at living. He'd made a show of considering it, but really he'd already made up his mind a long time ago. "Eh... alright. Deal."

And just like that, the Bringer Claw vanished, releasing Dimitri. He seemed to breath out in relief, and his little head orb managed to steadily float there in the air despite the damage.

"I'd like to move quickly if we're to do this," Dimitri said. "I'll need the aid of your city's AI and the nanites to construct whatever equipment I need to expedite the process."

Sorun grimaced a bit. He had enough things to smooth over with Nicole without adding this on top of it. "No other way?" he hopefully asked.

"I hope you don't intend to imply I smuggle you into Robotnik's fortress to look you over in my own lab. You'd surely be discovered."

"Fair point. I can... swing it with Nicole." No he fucking couldn't, but he'd have to manage something. Future Sorun's problem, he decided. "Anything else?"

The head-bubble bobbed up in down. Assumedly it was a nod. "I can't move around very freely. This meeting is one of the only windows where I'm not monitored and won't be missed, something I can only manage a few hours a day. You'll need to use your sword to transport me back and forth to save time and stave off any suspicion. I can message you a pickup location later."

"That's fine. Do I need to worry about a bomb in you? Tracking device, anything like that?"

"No. Robotnik never touched my cybernetics, never implanted a bomb in me. Transportation and equipment is all I require from you."

"Then we're set," Sorun decided. "Send another encrypted message like the last with the details. And... hey, out of curiosity. How'd you even know to call me? I haven't been advertising the fact I'm alive."

Dimitri made a rueful sort of chuckle at the question. "You haven't taken steps to conceal yourself, either. The Dark Legion have eyes in a few major settlements that spotted you."

"Yeah, I wasn't trying to hide. I was doing my job," he deadpanned. "So the jig's up? Eggman knows I'm around?"

"No." Sorun blinked in surprise at Dimitri's answer. "Those spy feeds go through me before anyone else. I concealed your presence, for both your benefit and to uncomplicate things. I hope that small modicum of trust goes a long way with you."

It didn't at all. "Get out of here, Dimitri," he simply said. He was given an unreadable expression by Dimitri - whether he saw that as an answer or not wasn't clear. He simply made a grunt and turned around, floating away, tentacles physically pulling his bubble up above the rocks before he disappeared behind them. There was a sound soon after; the rocks ahead obscured almost everything, but Sorun did see something speed off into the distance. A vehicle of some sort, maybe.

Once Dimitri was gone, Sorun breathed out. He'd done it. Made a deal, maybe secured a path to living. To say he was nervous wouldn't be entirely accurate, if anything he'd been unusually calm, but at the same time he felt like he could breath a little easier. A path. A viable path. It was all he needed and he'd secured it. Now he just needed to survive Nicole and he'd be golden.

The sound of footsteps crunching on the ground drew Sorun's attention. Shadow had approached, appearing more apprehensive than Sorun was used to seeing. "I realize you're desperate, Sorun, but... him?" he asked, sounding surprised.

"It's either this or I go back to hell," Sorun smoothly replied. "What would you have me do otherwise?"

Shadow flinched. "You don't have to dramatize that experience so much." He didn't comment when Sorun rolled his eyes. "Do you truly intend to honor your agreement with him?"

"Oh, no, not at all. The moment he saves me I'm going to kill him," Sorun said in honesty.

Oddly, Shadow's head reared back and his eyes widened. It wasn't the reaction Sorun was expecting. "You're planning on betraying him? Why?"

"... 'Cause I don't like him?" Sorun tried, as if it were obvious. "Where's this coming from? You looked like you were gonna kill him before I was back there. You hyped it up with that whole bounty thing. I literally said 'let's kill him' and you said 'alright'."

"I thought that was just intimidation, I didn't think you were actually trying to kill him!" Shadow hissed out.

"Where is this coming from?" Sorun demanded, throwing his hands up. "I say I wanna kill Eggman and you're all okay, I'm on board with that, but that guy back there, THAT'S the evil scientist that's crossing the line? That's the hill you'll die on?"

"In Robotnik's case it was about killing a depraved individual that's a danger to everyone and making the world a better place. In his case it's preventative medicine. This isn't that. Dimitri isn't nearly on that same scale. And you're speaking about betraying him and killing him for what? What do you even gain from that?"

"Peace of mind, I guess, I don't know, I..." Sorun breathed out and gave Shadow a tired look. "I'm just done , man," he said. "I'm tired of people bugging me and stupid stuff and interrupting my life. You know, I didn't ask to be dragged out here to the middle of nowhere and get wrapped up in more nonsense, I..." He grit his teeth and ran his fingers through his dark hair. "I'm just so sick of it , Shadow, you don't understand."

"I do, actually, that's the same thought I have every day I wake up," Shadow droned out. "But," he continued in a more serious tone, "Sorun... killing in defense of one's self or others is one thing. Understandable. Justifiable. What you're proposing, this... desire to kill out of little more than indulgence, because you're annoyed by someone, regardless of who he is, what he's done, what he represents-"

"Is bad, yeah, I get it, look I don't need a lecture-"

"You apparently do," Shadow snapped. He took a breath to calm himself before continuing. "It isn't something to take lightly, Sorun. Taking a life. I know you've never partaken in the act, but I have. Other soldiers in G.U.N. have. It's not something you should pursue if you can help it. It changes-"

"It doesn't change a single thing, Shadow, because when I did it I didn't feel a single thing."

Shadow froze. Sorun gazed at him with an almost placid expression, calm, not all that expressive. He didn't know what face he was supposed to make - he was stating fact and nothing more. And while this wasn't something he wanted to reveal, he was getting annoyed on how Shadow was getting on his case with this. He at least wanted to set the record straight.

"When?" Shadow asked, voice sounding dry and numb. He looked disbelieving, but at the same time there was a sort of sudden slack in his shoulders. He believed Sorun and was put off by the revelation.

"That alternate future we talked about was a bit of a nightmare to get through, Shadow. Things happened. I moved on."

"And who?" The way he said it almost made it sound like a demand.

"Some random echidna guards, I dunno. They were in my way and had laser guns, so I just reacted," Sorun lied. "And look, Shadow, I know there's supposed to be a significance behind it, alright? Tons of books and movies and whatever back home went into it, I know there's supposed to be some kind of bad reaction, but listen, right there, in that moment?" Sorun crossed and uncrossed his arms. "Nada. Didn't feel a single thing. Even thought to myself, 'that's it? Where's the overwhelming horror, where's the nauseous feeling that's gonna make me throw up I always heard about?' Nothing." He breathed out a sigh and brushed some hair out of his face. "And look, I don't know why, okay? Maybe knowing I was gonna reset it all anyway made me think it didn't matter, and in the end it didn't since those deaths were overwritten. Maybe there was so much happening I didn't register it, but even after all this time I've processed it I don't even think about it because it just didn't feel like something to acknowledge. Maybe I'm cracked in the head. Who knows?" He shook his head and pointed at Shadow. "But don't stand there and give me a bunch of spiritual nonsense about innocence or whatever. I know you're looking out for me, and I know you're speaking from a place of experience, but those words ain't for me."

"I..." The words trailed off as the left Shadow's mouth, terminating in a long sigh. The usual scowl he wore morphed into a deep frown. His eyes almost looked sad, if that were even possible for him. "I suppose I shouldn't be so surprised. If nothing else I'm glad you didn't come out of the experience any worse for wear," he mumbled out, and Sorun almost laughed at that. "Even so... it's not the act of killing itself I take issue with. It's that you're speaking of it so casually. I've seen people be lost in the act, Sorun, soldiers who committed it so much it lost all significance to them. People like that are little better than Robotnik."

"I'm not-" Sorun began.

"I didn't say you are," Shadow interrupted, holding a hand up. "I acknowledge you had reasons. And that's fine. I just want you to think of these things," he said. "If you need pragmatic reasons, when all is said and done and you hypothetically commit this act, what will people think when Dimitri disappears and everyone knows you were the last to see him? What would everyone back in the Republic think of you if and when they found out? That you killed for so little reason?" Shadow paused to let the question sink in before continuing. "I'm only saying this because I've seen how far you've fought to reclaim some semblance of a normal life and I don't want you to undo it due to some stupid impulse. It's not worth it. Just honor the deal and go your separate ways after."

"The only issue I have with that is that 'his separate way' is going back to Eggman," Sorun harshly muttered. "I'll admit I'm using him, but he's any enemy, Shadow. Me wanting to kill him isn't out of something as petty as being annoyed, it's because he keeps trying to kill my friends. And I'm supposed to, what, just overlook that?"

"He said it himself. The end of the Doctor's reign is fast approaching," Shadow reminded him. "They've made it this far. I doubt they'll err when it's this close to being finished. In a few weeks none of it will matter anymore."

He had good points. Sorun knew he had good points, but at the same time he couldn't let go of that feeling. The feeling that he really wanted to kill Dimitri, make things just that much safer for his friends, if only by a little bit, that one single thing that could go towards protecting the status quo he'd built for himself in this new life. And at the same time it could potentially damage that status quo. Shadow wasn't wrong there. And there'd be no undoing it this time around. And yet, he really wanted to kill Dimitri.

"... I'll think about it," Sorun decided. Shadow didn't look happy with the answer, not at all, deigning to offer nothing more than an acknowledging grunt. "Hey, don't... don't tell anyone what I did. Please," he mumbled out. "I undid it anyways so it doesn't even matter. It's debatable I even killed people."

"I won't," Shadow assured him. It was no small relief to Sorun, who somewhat regretted speaking of the deed to begin with. If nothing else he was glad he confessed to the only person he knew would understand. "Have you thought about what you're going to do about the fact you need to bring Dimitri into New Mobotropolis?"

Sorun tilted his head in confusion. "What do you mean?"

"I mean he's a criminal working with Robotnik. The kind of person the Republic would want to imprison," Shadow said in an obvious-sounding tone. "And you want to bring said wanted criminal into the city and then let him walk off to the Doctor scot-free. What do you plan on telling the others?"

"... Plan, huh?" Sorun cupped his chin, humming and nodding his head. "Hm. Yeah, that'd something, wouldn't it?"

Shadow immediately saw it for what it was. He made a loud scoff and palmed his face. "I should have known. You made that deal without even considering that factor, didn't you? It didn't even cross your mind."

"Of course I didn't, why would you think I thought about this!?" Sorun shouted out, more mad at himself than Shadow. He made a groan and ran a hand over his face. "Gah, what a... fine mess this is."

Shadow's mouth straightened into a flat line. His version of a sympathetic expression. "If it's any consolation I think they'll be understanding. Provided you present your case in a tactful manner. They've forgiven worse, I believe."

"Yeah, I hear way back in the day they gave Snively a chance at turning a new leaf. Did jack all, but hey, maybe they'll go for this. Exonerate a war criminal for me," Sorun mused in both a lighthearted and simultaneously disparaged tone. "It'll be like Operation Paperclip, where back home my government recruited a bunch of scientists who committed crimes against humanity but were given amnesty as long as they forked over their research data." He rose his hands up in the air and slowly spread them out. "It'll be like that. We'll call it Operation Staple. As in if Dimitri tries to double-cross me on this deal I'll gouge his eyes out with a stapler."

"His eyes are mechanical," Shadow pointed out.

"Then I'll beat him to death with the stapler, Shadow, you- that- I mean- wou-would you just let me worry about this, man? I got this. Now do you want a ride back to base or not, 'cause I have Yamato right here."

A/N- Trivia time: the term "the ol' Elijah treatment" is a reference to the character Elijah featured in the game Fallout New Vegas, featured prominently in the Dead Money DLC where he forced the main player character and other characters to do his bidding by strapping them with bomb collars (as a funny aside he didn't make the collars. He found them and just assumed in pre-war America corporations rigged their employees to explode. Thankfully that world's America wasn't that dystopian, though it was inching awfully close to that level. No, those collars were used to contain Chinese POWs in internment camps to be used as test subjects for experiments. Which honestly isn't any better than blowing employees up now that I think about it).

Anyway, that's entirely why Dimitri's plan going in didn't work. He was banking on informing Sorun of all the horrible stuff being done to the Dark Legion to tug on some heartstrings and lean on his sympathy, but Sorun's referenced playing New Vegas in the past and would obviously have seen worse, so he ended up practically laughing in his face. Doesn't help he doesn't like Dimitri and has zero sympathy to abuse.

Worst part is I'm not even making much of this up. For the people who never read the comics I'm not improvising the bomb thing - these echidna really were canonically dumb enough to trust Eggman not to put bombs in them. I think they were going for the Cyberpunk thing where they're literally addicted to cybernetics and were that desperate to get them back, but I don't know, it wasn't super clear.

Chapter 100

Recursion Error

Episode 100- Does it come with a cup holder?

So how was he to smooth things over with Nicole?

No, seriously, what was he supposed to do? Sorun didn't have a clue. He knew what he'd done. He'd fucked up. He'd fucked up because he was genuinely a terrible person for someone to date. And he knew this, he was fully cognizant of his shortcomings. He always believed he'd screw it up somewhere down the line. Nicole hadn't. The fool had faith Sorun wouldn't drop the ball, but he knew, he fuckin' knew going in he would. And he never told her going into the relationship, because he was too selfish to try and jeopardize his chances.

And now he needed to patch things up, not even for the relationship, that was probably a done deal, but because he was actually dead here if he didn't get her help. But he didn't have a plan. He didn't have any solid notion of what he was supposed to say here. Here's was Sorun had: a list of requests and that was it. Nothin' else. Not a thing .

So when he walked into that science center, marched his ass all the way up into the server room, saw her at the far end typing away at a bunch of holographic screens and completely focused on whatever she was doing, Sorun didn't know what else to do but lean his back against the wall next to her, arms crossed and face completely set in a neutral expression. She wasn't even looking towards him, probably pretending he wasn't there. He decided to just go in.

"I need two favors from you."

Nicole stopped typing. Actually she'd gone completely still, expression frozen as she continued to stare at the screens. That slowly changed as she turned her head towards him, face going through a number of expressions before settling on anger. It hadn't been the right thing to say, go figure.

"Excuse me?" Her voice came out harsh and disbelieving. "After everything you've done that's what you come to me with? Demands? Are you completely serious, Sorun?"

"In hindsight an apology would have been a more appropriate opener."

"Then by all means! Apologize!" she yelled. "Apologize for hiding the fact your life was in jeopardy again and lying to me about it AGAIN! Explain to me the exact series of events that lead you to break every single promise you ever made to me and how whatever is going on in your life justifies every single thing you've done!"

Sorun sighed, looked ahead, and tapped his elbows. Yeah, that was fair. "I don't see how it's my fault I got abducted and taken to an evil castle in some random-"

"I'm not upset about that ." Oh, it wasn't even anger anymore. At this point Nicole's voice was smoldering. "I'm not going to hold events outside of your control against you." She whirled towards him, fists clenched at her sides and teeth bared. Wow. It really was that bad. "You said you were trying to get better, that you were done disregarding your life, and you'd promised to me that you were trying your best to get better and make the best of things, Sorun. And then I find out you're doing the exact opposite." She turned back to the screen and continued typing. "You didn't even have the courtesy to call and tell everyone you were safe somewhere. You could have saved everyone three days of grief but didn't because it simply slipped your mind."

They were all fair points. Coupled with soul-shattering words. A weaker Sorun would have crumbled at this point, but much like how a bone became stronger after being broken and healed, his spirit had been broken down so many times at this point it just caused him to continue to quietly stare ahead. He wasn't sure why it was like this. Maybe the earlier verbal beatdown was as bad as it could possibly get and this was it. Rock bottom. Nowhere lower to sink so he just had to weather it all, and by golly did he have experience in that.

It wasn't like he didn't want to salvage it, though, oh no, by all means in the best possible world he'd walk away from this meeting with everything he'd had prior. Sorun wasn't confident he'd manage that, but he'd try. So he decided to try and speak from the heart, no preparation, no pre-planned words, nothing like that.

"I thought I could fix this," Sorun began. Nicole didn't even look at him, just kept typing away at the screens, so he sighed and continued. "I didn't know how serious it was at first. I noticed some off things and thought it was nothing. And the worse and worse it got, the more I kept trying to deny it, pretend it didn't exist. Because I'd gotten it , you know? I'd gotten my life back, got a job, a house, a good group of support friends, a community, geez, I got you . And after everything that happened! After I had to fight in a war, and fight god, and all the other stuff I don't care to mention - and I'm still upset over the fact I had to fight god - and after all that I was, you know, home free. Good to live a normal life. And I wanted that. I wanted it for me, and I wanted it for you, too, because you deserved it even more than I did. Geez, I even wanted it for our pet."

Nicole looked down a bit. She still wasn't looking towards him, but her typing had slowed down significantly.

"So I noticed I was getting sick it just seemed too cruel, especially after everything else. So I ignored it, pretended it didn't exist, and... for a time it was like I'd leaned into that idea so hard I genuinely actually did forget about it. But then it got bad enough someone noticed and I had to confront the reality." A rose a hand up and ran it through his hair. "And I didn't call because... because I really thought I could just fix it, that I could save everyone the trouble of worrying about my health, that I could solve all my problems on my own, come back, and everything could go back to normal. Because I didn't wanna give you any more trouble. Because I knew, above all else, you just wanted a normal life and a normal relationship with a normal guy. And I can't give you that, I'm not normal, and I'm never gonna be because I'm not gonna change myself to fit a bunch of societal norms fixated in a culture I've only lived in for ten months, it's not happening. But I thought I could at least give you some peace of mind, come home and be alright. But I couldn't. 'Cause I'm a bumbling mess." He breathed in after the long-winded speech and let his arms flop down against the wall behind him. "And I'm trying to fix it. Half because I'm trying to save my own life and half because I'm still reaching out for that ideal. And... 'cause people would care if I die, I guess, so it's more a one-third, one-third, one-third thing, but... look, I got nothing to add. That's it. That's the whole thing. And if you wanna break up 'cause you decided to date the most caustic guy in the city, Nicole I'm not exaggerating you chose really poorly, then... pffft, I don't wanna think about, but I-"

"Sorun."

"-really need your help, legitimately, I can't do this without-"

"Sorun."

"-you. Like seriously. You're integral. Chip in at any moment here."

"I've been trying to chip in, Sorun, where is this even coming from!?" The screens were wholly abandoned at this point. She was facing him directly now, eyes wide, face rife with a number of emotions Sorun couldn't place. "I was never considering leaving you over this."

Holy shit, really? "For real?" Sorun asked. He didn't believe her - really, he didn't. What was that yelling otherwise? "But you sounded so mad-"

"Because you were shortsighted, because of your frank disregard to see things from the point of view of others, for... all around being so foolish." Despite this list doing a fairly good job at chipping away at Sorun's soul he felt he was doing a good job keeping a straight face. The shameful expression he wore and the way he was looking down was proof of that. He was holding it together. He was. "And though these aspects of yours frustrate me greatly," Nicole continued, "none of it was so egregious I'd consider that. You would know if I had such intentions."

He still didn't believe her when she said that. The earlier yelling was still too fresh in his mind. "I never meant to-"

"You never do. And I realize this. And I realize you have, in recent time, taken strides to better yourself. I'm freely acknowledging that," Nicole said. "I'm also acknowledging that some things haven't changed a bit. Such as the self-belittling." She stepped closer to him and made Sorun flinch when she cupped his chin. "I didn't choose poorly and you're not nearly as bad as you make yourself out to be. A... handful, yes. But not outright bad. But I never realized you were having issues acclimatizing."

The conversation was taking a different direction than he'd imagined it going. His response came out subdued and unsure. "I'm not... I'm just not used to the atmosphere here completely," Sorun admitted. "I still like it, it's just different."

"I would think the environment here would be an improvement to the previous one."

Sorun looked up at her. "There you go again. Why are you always talking like Detroit was some horrible place and you're glad I don't live there anymore?"

"Because every conversation we've had on that city involved you painting it as a place riddled with crime and corruption," Nicole said in a deadpan.

"But it wasn't! It was a really nice place to live!" Sorun argued. "You're cherry-picking all the bad stuff, that's what you're doing."

"How can I cherry-pick when all you tell me is the 'bad stuff'?"

"I only talk about the bad stuff because that's the only interesting stuff that happened! What, am I supposed to talk about how the weather was? The economy? That's boring."

"I don't wish to argue this when we have more important things to discuss." With a shake of her head Nicole removed her hand and took a few steps back away from Sorun. "Your health, for starters, and what you plan to do about it."

"Yeah, that... ties into those favors I need. Well, one." Sorun sucked some air through his teeth and glanced away, rubbing at the back of his head. The fact the relationship wasn't in jeopardy was certainly giving him a confidence boost but this next part was still causing him to somewhat waver. "And it's, uh, it's a biggie."

"I don't see how a simple favor could weigh any more than your health, Sorun."

"Boy you'd think, um... so you remember Dimitri?" Sorun asked, choosing to get right to the heart of the matter.

Oh, she did. Sorun could tell by the way Nicole's face instantly soured at the mere mention of the cyborg's name. "I remember. And I am also well aware where his current allegiances lie. What relevance is he to this conversation?"

He thought about dancing around the matter to work up to it, but ultimately decided against it. Nicole was mad enough; him wasting their time wouldn't help things. "He's the one that sent that message. We talked. I made a deal with the guy."

The soured look Nicole wore didn't go away. If anything it only deepened. "Forgoing the obvious for the moment, what could you possibly have that he wants?"

"A magic sword that can magic out the bombs that Eggman snuck in those echidna when they joined up with him. A few wanna defect and I'm their only hope." Nicole'd reacted in a fairly horrified manner upon learning this, going as far as to widen her eyes and hold her hands in front of her mouth. "I said I'd do that if he checked me out and saved me. And he needs a place to do this, specialized equipment. Stuff that... you'd be able to make on the fly with the nanites. And also that you'd... maybe, talk with Elias and the council and convince them not to arrest the guy once he comes within city limits."

"That's so... incorrigible." Sorun was confused by what Nicole meant by that, was even afraid she was about to rebuke the deal he'd made with Dimitri, but then she'd said, "He would truly to do something so vile to living people..."

Sorun made a relieved breath. She was still hung up on the bomb thing. "Mhm. I'd call 'em hostages, but, well... there's only six that want out. Kinda makes me think a lot of them don't even need the bombs to motivate them, but I don't really care one way or the other in the end."

Nicole shook her head. "That doesn't make this any better, Sorun."

"I didn't say it did, I- we're getting off track." Sorun slapped his palms together and pointed the fingers at Nicole. "I need Dimitri. Dimitri needs me. So I need him to come here and do his thing. That's the long and short of it."

"... I'm not sure how I'm supposed to feel about you leveraging lives for your own gain," Nicole confessed after a few quiet moments of contemplation. "I realize it's your life at stake, Sorun, but surely you see the... questionable nature of that decision?"

Sorun sighed. There it was. He'd been hoping she'd be so distracted by the bomb detail she wouldn't get into this. "It's kind of raw, I know," he admitted. "But I'm desperate and don't have much choice left." He uncrossed his arms and gestured to his sides. "I've been to doctors on two corners of the world and nobody could help me. This guy might be my only shot, Nicole. Cutting some bombs out of some people in exchange for my life's a pretty good bargain."

"I realize this. I..." Nicole paused, and then made a minute shake of her head. "I'd like... above all for you to walk out of this ordeal okay so things can go back to normal," she quietly said, eyes drifting off a bit to the side. "And I suppose nobody could begrudge you shifting the position to your favor. Especially with somebody of Dimitri's caliber of credibility."

"My words exactly," Sorun said, using one hand to push off the wall while using the other to point at Nicole. "It'll be simple and clean. No violence, no fighting, nothing. We fix each other's problems and everyone gets to move on with our lives." He took a few steps closer to Nicole, hands pocketed and eyes cast down on the floor. "I know I messed up in a lot of areas, no getting around that, I'll fully admit it, but I can still set everything right. I just... need some help. Which I should have asked for in the beginning. This is that. This is me asking for help."

Well, there it was. Him going the "honest" route. The heart had said everything it needed to and now it was up for whims of fate to guide him along while his brain caught up with everything that got said. It was catching up fast, too. Kind of panicking as well, especially since the silence between him and Nicole was going on for so long. It was generating intrusive thoughts now. Oh god, was he too callous talking about the people with bombs implanted in them? Did he make some kind of implication in there somewhere that painted him in a bad light? Was Nicole not serious and really was so mad at what he did that she'd never forgive him and-

Oh, probably not. She couldn't be overly furious if she'd walked over and hugged him the way she was doing right now. It made most of the paranoid, intrusive thoughts go away. Now all that was left were the regular intrusive thoughts that plagued Sorun every hour of every day.

"I'm still moderately upset at you. And I didn't appreciate you attempting to bribe your way into my good graces by healing Dr. Quack's eye," Nicole muttered to him.

"... Well I had to try-"

"Don't dig yourself deeper." She squeezed him a little tighter. Little too tight - it caused his breath to hitch in his throat. "But just like you I want things to return to normal, so we'll make this work. I'll talk to the others. We'll all come to some agreement so we can save you. And then we're going to have a very, very long discussion at home."

Sorun made an unsure hum. "The, um, lecturing kind of talk or the long, quiet talks we'd have at night when-"

Nicole pulled away from Sorun to show him the unamused expression she wore. "The lecturing kind," she flatly stated.

"Yeah, that's... alright." So much for walking away scot-free. He'd be lucky if he got away with just a three-hour scolding with the way she was talking. Which... well, it may not be the worse thing in the world since he knew he hadn't detonated the relationship this time around.

He must have grown some sort of tell on his face, because Nicole's eyes narrowed a small amount. "Why do you suddenly look so pleased with yourself?" she demanded to know.

"Ah, well... I might not terribly mind it." He made an awkward sort of chuckle while leaning his body back while still in Nicole arms. "I just really like your voice. I might just fall asleep listening to you regardless of what you have to say to me."

Nicole's response was to let Sorun go, making him stammer out and hop around a bit to avoid falling onto his back once his support left him. She crossed her arms, huffing out, "You're impossible." She waited until Sorun regained his balance and then asked, "You said you required two favors from me. What was the second one?"

Ah... that. The sudden reminder made a dour mood come over Sorun, causing his expression to lower a bit. "You helped Tails making that portal machine thing that originally brought me here and that you all tried to use to put me back on my world, right?"

"That's correct," Nicole confirmed, though she looked a bit confused at the question. "What does that matter?"

"... The coordinates. The ones to my home. The ones you guys programmed into the machine to open that portal," Sorun said, looking Nicole dead in the eyes. "I want them."

"Why?" Nicole demanded. Her posture had suddenly gone rigid, expression sharp, agitated even. "What could you possibly hope to-"

"Yamato could probably open the way," Sorun interrupted, voice completely even and straight. " Probably . I just-"

"We needed all seven Emeralds, Sorun, so I don't see how that sword-"

"It breaks a lot of rules," he said. "It's hard to explain, Nicole, the sword, it... I've been using it a lot and I figured some stuff out. It's hard to put into words." With his brows furrowed he lifted his hand out of his pocket and gestured at her. "What's got you so upset?"

"Because we've been down this road before and the last time we attempted this you turned catatonic and-!" Nicole cut herself off, eyes widening a bit. She brought her hands up to her chest after, started wringing her wrists while she said in a gentler voice, "I'm... just worried. It was a traumatic experience for you the first time and I just don't want a repeat. That's not even accounting for the radiation."

"Little radiation's nothing. I found out the white-hair thing I can do negates radiation."

"And where did you obtain that tidbit of information?" Nicole asked.

"Uh, story for another time. But listen, it's fine-"

"Fine?" Nicole repeated in a incredulous tone. "Sorun, what even brought this on? Why so suddenly?"

He didn't want to answer, not directly. A picture of a destroyed, blood-red plane flashed in his mind. "I just... need to check something," he said.

"Check something? Check what ?"

"Nothing, it's probably nothing, I'm gonna be wrong anyway, I..." Sorun sighed out and rubbed a hand through his hair. "I just thought I'd go back to my old home. Maybe get some things to bring back, assuming anything survived Armageddon." He looked down. "Maybe... do something with my mother's body. Bury her somewhere. A-assuming I go home and she's not just a burnt-out skeleton in the living room that'll just fall apart if I try and pick it up..."

All the energy seemed to leave Nicole when she heard Sorun say that. Her ears folded completely against her head and grief crossed her face. "Sorun..."

"I just want a little closure. Nicole, I... I've just been thinking some and I need to know. What happened with mom, and Dave. And Billy and Jarod and Jamie. I'm not expecting to find more than corpses, if even that, but I just... I just gotta know."

She didn't look like she agreed. She looked incredibly sad and conflicted, going as far as to say, "Must you?" She took a few steps closer. "I understand the logic, Sorun, but..."

"I'm just gonna keep wondering forever if I don't, Nicole," he said. "It just feels like this thing that'll keep following me if I don't. And if I wanna make a life here, I just... feel I need to do this. So I need the coordinates."

"..." Instead of answering immediately Nicole lurched forwards and embraced him in another hug. I wasn't an unwelcome one, even if Sorun's arms felt too limp to reciprocate it at the moment. "Are you completely sure?" she asked, sounding a mixture of grief-stricken and resigned.

"Not really. I need to go anyway."

"You'll come back? Promise to stay safe?"

"Yeah, yeah, 'course. I'm not going immediately. I'm getting fixed first and having everything sorted before I decided on anything."

"You'll be alright?"

Probably not. "I've... had time to come to terms. Won't be like last time. Promise. I'll go there and come right back."

She squeezed him tighter. "I feel conflicted. I can't understand what you're going through, so I can only trust you when you say you need this. But this seems painful for you, Sorun, and... I just don't know." She tilted her head forwards to rest her chin on his shoulders. "I'll give you the coordinates, but I'd like to talk about this more at some point. Later. When this sickness business is behind us all and we can return to some sense of normalcy, Sorun. Can we do that?"

It didn't feel the greatest. Telling her of all people half-truths. Wasn't like it was an outright lie; he genuinely he had to know. What happened to them. And this was a convenient excuse to do that. To go home. To see what became of his old life. All of that was true.

But that plane. That fucking plane he'd seen. He couldn't keep it out of his mind. Ever since he'd seen the things Yamato could really do he'd been mulling over the idea of going back to Earth briefly, had always thought about it and put it off... but then he'd seen that plane. And Sorun wasn't sure what it was about the plane that was setting him off, but there was something about it, something that was itching his brain.

Thoughts for later, though. All of that was... later stuff. There were more important things to focus on at the moment. Like his health. And the person in front of him right now.

"Yeah, Nicole. That's fine. We can do that."

The boring stuff bored Sorun. The backroom discussions on what was gonna happen, the agreements, a whole lotta other words that were said to him that he mostly blanked out on except for the important stuff. There'd apparently been a council meeting. And a lot of arguing from what Sorun heard. He didn't know the specifics on account of the fact he didn't care enough to learn. He only cared about the end results. And the end results were that they'd all agreed on something. And then when the time came Sorun had to go get Dimitri and ferry him to the castle. There'd been more talks. Sorun still hadn't been part of the talks despite the fact it was his life they were talking about. Something about him having too much bias in the matter. He never cared enough to argue.

It was when Sorun was told that yes, Dimitri would be allowed to stay here until his examinations and treatment of Sorun were done, that he started to care. He didn't know the rest of what was hashed out.

Lotta boring details he couldn't care less for.

The one thing worse than boredom: the anxiety of having to sit in the same room with the floating head guy for hours a day. Being subject to a number of tests, have a bunch of samples drawn, get scanned with whatever machines he kept demanding Nicole make, who, consequentially, was watching them the entire time every day through that camera hanging off the ceiling in the corner of the room. Sorun'd like to say it was out of worry, but really it was more likely one of the stipulations for him being here was that he was monitored the entire time. Likely both, actually.

But he was anxious because Sorun didn't know for a fact that Dimitri would be able to actually do anything. All he could do was sit there and let him run whatever tests he needed and parse over all the intelligible data on the computer he kept using while Sorun did nothing but sit. Because in the back of his mind he knew if he pestered him with questions Dimitri didn't have the answers to this would just take longer to come. If they even did come. But there was a limit to this kind of patience, both because of boredom and because the anxiety was making Sorun sick. The limit was apparently four days.

A sigh left him as he drummed his finger on the examination table he was sitting on. This was arguably worse than sitting in a hospital room. It looked less like that and more like a lab with all the random machinery medical equipment scattered about. They'd been forced to set up shop in the science center since, undoubtably, nobody trusted Dimitri near the hospital. Sorun couldn't blame 'em. Just look at the guy: a floating head in a ball using robot tentacles to tap away at a keyboard as he stared so intently at that screen. Setting off Sorun's anxiety even more. It caused the dam holding back four days of anxiousness to burst, and his boredom needed to be relieved somehow.

"So what's your deal?" Sorun asked, out of the blue.

The echidna stopped typing momentarily. The ball rotated a bit so that one head's cybernetic eyes managed to see him. The purely red lens that didn't mirror the red eye with the black sclera on the other side of his head. "Pardon?" he asked.

"Your deal. What is it?" Sorun repeated. "What's up with you?"

"What's 'up with me' is that, per our arrangement, I'm attempting to cure you. Using facilities begrudgingly granted to me," he grumbled out as he turned to the computer. "You should count yourself fortunate you weren't there for the proceedings. Your obstinate councilors bickered for hours on whether they should let me work here unimpeded or throw me in your prison. The fox councilwoman and pig councilman were particularly vocal on the matter of locking me up," he added with a huff.

Sorun rose an eyebrow. "Whoa, one of our councilors is a pig man? Really?"

"One of... your councilors. Yes." Dimitri spun back to Sorun with a confused expression. "I would... hope you know that. Since he's part of the legislation that governs you."

"Do I really look like someone who pays attention to politics when I got so many more important things to do? Like sleep?" Sorun asked. "But I don't care about him, the fox, Mrs. Prower. How mad did she look when it was decided when you're done here you just get to go back to Eggman scot-free? How mad did she look?"

"Why do you care?"

"Ah, well... she doesn't like me. I don't like her 'cause she doesn't like me. So it puts a bit of a smile on my face when she gets upset at something. 'Tis the human way."

"Is it?" Dimitri's tone suggested that it was an honest question. There was an interested lilt in his voice and his face had grown more curious.

"Of course. When a human does something there's a good chance it's a decision motivated by pure spite and vitriol. It's as potent an emotional fuel source as all the other ones. Like self preservation or love or yadda yadda," Sorun said while spinning his wrist around. "Or Voidborn, I should say."

"... Voidborn?"

"Well I've been figuring that trying to differentiate between humans like me and the humans natural to this world that live over in Station Square is too confusing, so I've been workshopping into re-labeling my kind as 'Voidborn' to end the confusion. 'Cause I'm the last one alive and it's totally my right now."

"But why Voidborn?"

"'Cause our whole universe is out in the middle of complete void that's so far away from this multiverse that when the distance was conceptualized to me it made my brain hurt. And 'cause it sounds cool," the Voidborn explained. "I'm not kidding, either. You know what a googol is?"

"Yes."

"If you go to the edge of this multiverse and go in a straight line towards my dimension and travel a googol googols in lightyears you'll make it a googolth of the way there. That's how far it is. I swear I got an aneurism when my sword told me that."

Dimitri's expression fell flat. "I don't very much believe you. It sounds too absurd. And your sword told you?"

"I mean... it didn't give me a hard number or anything like that. Just kinda, y'know, put the idea of the distance in my head when I looked." Sorun poked the side of his head. "It might not actually be that far. Or it could be even further. I just know it's real far away."

"So you don't know how far," Dimitri deduced with a deadpan.

"I know it's far enough they needed seven sources of infinite energy to open a way there." Dimitri didn't argue that point like the rest. He just put on a thoughtful look. "And that sounds pretty far," Sorun finished.

"Yes. I suppose." Dimitri turned back to the computer he'd been working on. "As to your previous inquiry, yes, all the councilors had sour looks on their faces when they decided to let me work and leave in peace. They looked about as upset as the AI that runs this place whenever I ask her to construct me something."

Ah, well, there was one point leaning Sorun towards killing Dimitri when this was over. "She might be a bit less sour if you call her by her name," Sorun suggested.

"Oh, I didn't mean any disrespect. She's a wonder construct, truly. Whoever designed her personality matrix is an actual artisan," Dimitri said. He actually sounded apologetic , which really threw Sorun for a loop. "I just lament not being able to appreciate it more since she addressed me so coldly every time she speaks."

One... point towards not killing him? Huh. Sorun felt conflicted on hearing that. "... I think she's still upset about the last time you were here and you argued about the nanites," he quietly said, still thinking on the previous words he heard and how perplexed it made him feel.

"Oh? Ah... perhaps I'd been a bit heavy-handed, then. It was a stressful time."

"Could also be your Dark Legion pals keep trying to kill our friends."

"... Also a possibility," Dimitri admitted. And Sorun was once again struck at how shameful he sounded when he said that.

This wasn't the picture Sorun had been picturing. He didn't know a lot about Dimitri, the time they'd met notwithstanding, and while he hadn't expected mustache-twirling levels of villainy from the guy he'd expected... something from a guy that lead insane cybernetic psychopaths called the Dark Legion. Callousness, unscrupulous moral compass, general nastiness. A wayward insult here or there at the very least.

There wasn't any of that. What words they'd shared painted Dimitri as... well, as just being a normal person. Minus being a floating cyborg head. A really old and sad guy. Polite, even. Hell, the only reason he was doing all this was to save lives, and not even his own. But then Sorun kept going back to that Dark Legion thing and just grew confused. Because after spending so long with the man Sorun honestly couldn't peg him as a guy who would hang out with that crowd. The Eggman crowd. He wanted answers.

"Back when I asked about 'your deal' I meant your deal ," Sorun tried again, hoping to get the point across.

Dimitri sighed. "Enunciating your words isn't going to make it any clearer for me, Sorun. Please explain if you've got something to say."

"You command a bunch of evil echidna but you're a completely normal dude. What's up with that?" Sorun asked, hoping the bluntness would make things clearer. "I wasn't expecting you to be a mad scientist but I also wasn't expecting... this," he said, gesturing towards Dimitri. "You. So I'll reiterate: what, Dimitri, is your deal?"

"The Dark Legion aren't a cabal of 'evil echidna'," Dimitri immediately rebuked. The one eye that wasn't just a solid red lens rolled around in the echidna's mechanical eye socket. The sockets around both eyes even conformed to make the shape of rolling his eyes.

"You literally call yourselves the Dark Legion. How am I supposed to take that? How am I even supposed to take that seriously? Cartoon villains don't sound that cartoonish," Sorun said.

"Didn't Knuckles tell you everything?"

"Ugh, maybe...?" Sorun made a pained grimace and rubbed at his shoulder, as if even trying to remember that conversation brought him physical pain. "I'll be real, pretty much ninety-five of that conversation was forgotten. Hearing echidna history was a wild trip and I'm like half-sure it's part of the reason Finitevus was driven into insanity. I don't even know what the Dark Legion's deal is other then the tech fetishism and you keep trying to kill my friends. I never needed to know more than that."

"But now you're interested."

"Sure, I guess. For lack of anything better to talk about," Sorun hesitantly agreed. "Gimme the broad strokes, though. No nitty-gritty details. I won't survive. So. The deal?"

Dimitri sighed. "I suppose these data inputs need time to cook..." he mumbled out, staring at the screen. His head-bubble bobbed up and down in a nod, and then he turned to Sorun. "Pull up a chair."

Instead of doing that, Sorun just rose an eyebrow in Dimitri's direction and gestured to the examination table he was sitting on. Dimitri made an embarrassed chuckle and grinned - actually grinned - before speaking. One of his metal tentacles had even moved its tip up and down near one of his eyes, like he was adjusting a non-existent pair of glasses.

"Ages past echidna society took a massive shift and wholeheartedly shunned the nature of technology. Our kind had been subjected to a number of catastrophes - some managed to paint technology in the light of some boogeyman and rose to power under this ideal," Dimitri explained. "A large number of echidna objected to the policies put in place by the leaders of that time, either through complacency gained through the convenience technology provided or through fundamental differences in ideals."

"Yeah, I guess I'd be mad, too, if a bunch of luddites got elected and tried to take my PC away," Sorun commented. "Why Dark Legion, though? What was the thought process behind that name?"

"... A number of the founding members were rather radical in their beliefs," was the only answer Dimitri could provide. All Sorun could do was scoff. "There was strife, skirmishes, assassinations, attempted use of weapons of mass destruction... civil war, to put it plainly. It was bad enough that the entirety of the Dark Legion was sealed away inside a pocket dimension. A shortsighted solution in hindsight since they'd used their prison as an opportunity to continue researching technology while marshalling their strength and growing their forces. It gets murky from their resurgence onwards. I'm aware Knuckles was involved in actions against them a vast majority of the time, you should ask him if you want to know more-"

"I'm never going to do that."

"Then... that's the bare essentials," Dimitri sighed out. "The ideals of the Dark Legion, frankly, were ones that changed with each new leader, the grand master, as well as trying to adapt to whatever the current situation at the time was. It's difficult to classify them when they've always been in such a fluid state. It was bad enough there was a division at one point and later on a reunification."

"Yeah, this is why I didn't want details," Sorun said. "And right now they're ideals are being crazy? Siding with Eggman?"

"A vast majority of the Dark Legion were transported to Albion when Enerjak removed their cybernetics. Some, those who'd been born into the life, were even happy for it. The ones who'd never even wanted their cybernetics in the first place," Dimitri explained. "The ones that have been fighting alongside Eggman, who allowed him to mutilate their bodies in their reach for technologically-aided perfection, were the most radical-minded of the group. The ones who follow Lien-Da's ideals."

Sorun hummed at that name. It sounded... weirdly familiar? Had he...? No, he'd never met her. He was pretty sure. He'd remember if he'd ever met someone with a ridiculous name like... had he? No, no way. The thought made the back of his hand itch for some reason, though. "What's her deal?" he asked.

"You and your deals." Dimitri's head bubble shook. "She's... ambitious. Power-hungry, crafty, shrewd. Has a high opinion of echidna kind and believes them superior to any other Mobian species - a frankly antiquated belief many echidna used to hold. I'm convinced she tried to arrange my assassination at one point in an attempt at a power grab."

"Ah-huh... and all the ones right now follow that one's ideas, huh?" Sorun scoffed again and made a whistle. "Cool, so... they're not just cyberpsychos. They're neo-nazi cyberpsychos. Banger group you got there, Dimitri."

Dimitri frowned. "What was it you said about sarcasm being the last bastion of the witless?"

"Hey, you were listening." He hated it a little bit, but the little reminder of those words Sorun had said and that Dimitri actually remembered made a small grin grow on his face. "But why are you mixed up with them?" he asked, grin dropping. "You don't seem like some echidna purist or a cyberpsycho."

"... You keep using that word," Dimitri pointed out. "'Cyberpsycho'. Where does that term come from?"

Sorun perked up. Someone was asking about video game lore. He loved explaining that. He started explaining with no hesitation. "Back where I'm from there was a tabletop game called 'Cyberpunk' that depicted a dystopian future setting where cybernetic implantation was commonplace in humans and where life in general was horrible because of corporate exploitation on human life and the devastation of the environment. They were making a video game adaptation but it didn't get released before I got here." The thought made Sorun grimace a bit before continuing. "Cyberpsychos were people that got so addicted to cybernetics and the surgeries that they'd just go crazy. Them living in a nightmare dystopian world probably didn't help with their sanity. A guy with bulletproof skin that can dodge bullets and has swords for arms getting PTSD attacks sounds like a recipe for disaster and this was a world so messed up you could buy guns out of a vending machine." He started spinning his wrists in circles in front of him. "I just can't help but draw a lot of parallels. Insanity, cybernetics, obsessive compulsion for self-improvement. Ticks a lot of the boxes."

"Ah, I see." The mechanical tentacles around around Dimitri's body became a bit more animated. His face was alight, too, like he was actually enjoying the conversation. Sorun couldn't imagine why. Guy's quality of life was probably extremely poor if this was stimulating him so much. "So the humans of your world shared much of the same problems the Dark Legion did? They must have for so many of our issues to be similar."

"Oh, no." Sorun laughed at the thought and shook his head. "Nah, the closest thing we had to cybernetics was a pacemaker. Our tech wasn't anywhere near what this place has. We still used explosions powered by dinosaur juice and boiled water to power everything."

The answer made Dimitri appear perplexed. The dinosaur part in particular seemed to disorient him, making his mouth silently move as he tried to puzzle out what that even meant, before asking, "Then how did all this come to light in a... game of all things?"

"I think the term for the phenomenon is 'Orwellian'?" Sorun scratched at the side of his head, and then shrugged. "Humans were really good at self-reflecting upon the flaws of our species as a whole and predicting disasters that would be wrought by man while highlighting these threats in pieces of literature and other media as a warning to future generations, who would then do absolutely nothing to stop it, therefore making those predictions accurate."

"You mean Voidborn?"

"Yeah, Voidborn. To be fair with how the Overlanders turned out I'm not sure the humans here were so much different than us. I saw a Statue of Liberty here."

"Statue of...?"

"Have you ever seen the ruined statue of the giant green woman in New Megaopolis?" Sorun asked. When Dimitri nodded, he said, "Yeah, we had the exact same statue in my world. That city used to be called New York."

"Ah, more parallels," Dimitri noted. There was a happiness to his voice now - he sounded genuinely invested in the conversation now. "It's interesting how, despite the vast distances of our worlds, they drew so many similarities towards one another."

"Eh, I stopped being surprised by anything a while ago," Sorun admitted. "Seen too much craziness."

"I can imagine. I can't help but ask 'why', though," Dimitri lamented. The bright tone he'd had from earlier had turned slightly dour as his tentacles lazily slithered against the floor. "Voidborn, humans, Overlanders, echidna... ignoring messages of old. Repeating the same mistakes over and over. Overlanders warring with Mobians when the planet was ruined by humans of old spurning an alien civilization. My species continually ruining itself. The problems your species evidently harbored. Why do our kinds keep repeating the same mistakes?"

Sorun breathed out and leaned back a bit, grabbing the examination table for support. "I dunno, man. Thousands of pieces of media and historians asked the same thing in my world. Nobody ever came up with an answer. Life is... cyclical, I guess. And people just aren't perfect. Never will be." He leaned back forwards and propped his fist against his head before continuing. "We're on a roll with mad scientists so here's what an evil scientist man from a cartoon said about perfection: it's nothing but a goal to strive for, not an actual state of being to be attained. Attaining 'perfection' is tantamount to stagnation. No more growth; no more improvement. What's the point? What's there to do?" He made a shrug. "What I think is that people are people 'cause of the flaws, 'cause otherwise they wouldn't be people. And yeah, it causes problems. Makes it so that tragedies happen in life. I can't change it, you can't, and for some reason whenever someone tries, between insane gods that wanna reshape the world or mad fascist kings or insane scientists, I gotta be the one to fight them, and every time I look at what their solutions are and they're just plain stupid. You wanna know what I think?" Sorun leaned even further, hands holding the examination table so that he wouldn't fall off. "Living in life sucks and I wouldn't change a thing about it."

Dimitri's mouth dropped open. "If you were trying to craft some pearl of wisdom, Sorun, I don't think you quite made it," he amusedly stated while making a sad sort of chuckle. "Why? What did life's pain give you to have so much faith in it?"

"It gave me a fat stack of video games, Dimitri, that's what it gave me," Sorun said. "I would never have had 'Metal Gear' without the wars that happened on Earth. The wars were terrible; I had it my way they wouldn't have happened. That was common thought for most people. But they happened. Would always happen and no amount of cultural or technological advancement would change that. And we got cool games and movies and comics out of it all. If Yoko Taro never saw his friend plummet to his death and watched his corpse grow an erection I never would have got to play 'NieR' and 'NieR: Automata' because he never would have been inspired to make them."

"What?"

"If all the raw, evil stuff that happened in the mediaeval ages never happened 'Berserk' would have never been inspired. Without 'Berserk' 'Dark Souls' wouldn't have been what it was. Jeez, a lot of things wouldn't have been. Without the Wild West I never would have played the 'Red Dead Redemption' games or watched any of the spaghetti western films. If Japan never got nuked kaiju movies wouldn't have been a thing. It goes on and on, great things spiraling from tragedy. If life were perfect and nothing bad ever happened I never would have had any of this. And a large majority of who I am is because of all that media I consumed. Media that wouldn't exist otherwise. I wouldn't be me . I like life because, for how much it sucks, we get cool stuff out of it."

With the way he was staring at him Dimitri very well might have considered Sorun insane in that moment. It was that wide-eyed, astonished look that looked almost horrified and yet conflicted at the same time. A confusing mix of emotions that couldn't really by reconciled to live in harmony for how different and opposing they were. He gave up - he must have, because Dimitri then used his tentacles as leverage to shake his bubble back in forth as he made a dry, humorless chuckle.

"I don't think people who led lives devoid of happiness and knew only suffering from birth to death would agree with you, Sorun," he said. "You're trying to use the existence of art to justify suffering."

"They don't have to agree with me. That's the world. That's what we live in, Dimitri. That's reality. I'm just trying to make the best of the hand we all got." He made a sigh, ran a hand through his hair, and sat back straight on the examination table. "To a more salient point, life's messed up, and we can't change it without warping it to the point it ain't life anymore. Enerjak tried it and his vision was a permanently stagnated, primitive society that would have done away with free thinking in lieu of just looking to him for answers. Went to an alternate future and the king there just stripped everyone of their freedoms for peace and that place was miserable. Finitevus wanted a clean slate and that would have just circled back to the original problem given enough time. Nobody's ideas ever work. We can always make things better and streamline the experience, always strive for that better day tomorrow, but absolute perfection's out of the question. So I focus on what's in front of me and nothing else. Not the whole world, not the greater picture, this ." He pointed down. "This city, these people, my life. I wouldn't have a life if I tried focusing on more than that. I'll stab god in the face to save the world if I have to and literally nobody else can come up to bat, but I ain't ever gonna spend a lifetime trying to fix the world's problems. A world's just a place full of people and people can sort out their own issues. I have my own problems."

By now that indecipherable expression Dimitri had worn had somewhat subdued. He looked more understanding now, in a 'I'm too mentally exhausted to argue so I'll just agree 'cause you kinda make sense' sort of way. That was Sorun's interpretation of that expression, at least. The small, easygoing smile the cyborg head wore made it hard to tell what he was really thinking.

"All that just for asking what a cyberpsycho was," he lamented. The chuckle this time was more lighthearted.

"Yeah, I guess we got kind of sidetracked," Sorun added. He made a sheepish sort of grin and rubbed at the back of his neck. "You never answered. Why are you with the remnants of the Dark Legion if they're the most messed up ones?"

"Half because of circumstance and half because they're my people," Dimitri swiftly answered. "Sorun, I'd... tried, in the past, to eliminate all the dividing lines. No more Dark Legion, no echidna warring with echidna, searched for something, searched for anything, a way for everyone to put aside their differences we could all stand together. My efforts were time and time again curbed by ambitious fools. Now my species is a tenth of what it was and that small group of mad, technology-obsessed echidna make up a significant portion of our species." With a lack of shoulders Dimitri had to make do with his tentacles sagging on the floor. "I just don't want any more echidna to die."

"So you help them shoot other people? My friends? Seriously?"

"You just justified yourself for only caring about what's in front of you," Dimitri shot back, making Sorun fall silent. "You know the positions everyone's in. There's little choice. What would you do in my stead?"

Sorun didn't move for the first few seconds. Then he sighed, crossing his arms as he thought of an answer. He didn't have to think long. "If Voidborn other than me wound up here and started hurting people using power from Chaos Emeralds... I wouldn't have went out of my way to make sure they survived. Even if they were the last of my kind. If, for example, the Overlanders captured them after going on some insane spree and sentenced them to execution I wouldn't have said a word."

"It wouldn't get that far," was left unsaid by Sorun. There wouldn't have been a chance for capture, trials, executions. Not before he got to them. That would be his problem to solve and no one else's.

"But they'd be your kind," Dimitri argued. "Your people. People who share your culture, your history, your genetics. You'd willingly lose all that without a fight?"

"It'd suck, yeah. But sometimes you gotta take a step back and realize there's things more important than blood, Dimitri," Sorun said. "Extinction of a species is a terrible thing but lives are lives. If you think the lives of those echidna are more important than the lives of everyone they hurt, then that's your prerogative. I don't agree with it, though."

"Then... we will have to disagree on that point." He sounded sad when he said it, Which sounded odd to Sorun. "I've dedicated my life towards the advancement and betterment of my kind, and we're too few in number now. I won't let the remainder of the Dark Legion by wiped out by some madman's petty whims when there's still a chance they can be saved. For what's left of our kind to be whole."

"Even at the expense of others?"

"I'm focusing on what's in front of me. On our kind's problems," Dimitri said, parroting Sorun's earlier words. "But... I understand how that sounds. I know the grief and pain they've caused and I'm not wholly unsympathetic to it all. It's why I agreed to one of the concessions that were demanded of me by the Council of Acorn. When the time comes for the Freedom Fighters to make the final push into New Megaopolis and defeat Dr. Robotnik once and for all I'm to sabotage the defensive systems to give them an easier time."

Sorun's eyebrows rose up in surprise. He'd been mildly upset at Dimitri's stance, if a bit understanding, but admittedly this new bit of news made it easier to swallow. "You actually gonna follow through with that?"

"I'll make my best effort. I truly mean that, not in the least bit because there's a camera recording this conversation," Dimitri said in an affable tone, one of his tentacles pointing at the aforementioned camera. "If nothing else it'll decrease the level of violence and mitigate the chance of bloodshed on both sides. I can trust the Freedom Fighters not to take lives so it benefits me."

"And what are you gonna do after?" Sorun asked. "You all even have anywhere to go? You're planning on stabbing your last benefactor in the world in the back."

"You say that as if I'm the only one plotting behind Robotnik's back," Dimitri scoffed out. "Even his nephew sees the writing on the wall and has been making plans. He's been in contact with this Overlander woman. She's a technomancer based out in Yurashia, has managed to build the largest power base in the continent there. We've discussed it and concluded the Freedom Fighters' victory against Robotnik is all but guaranteed. We're all leaving with Snively to Yurashia to join forces while everyone is distracted with Robotnik's capture."

Sorun blinked and made a hum. "Technomancer? That's a thing?"

"It's an Overlander-specific phenomenon. In extremely raree cases an Overlander can be born with a Chaos Force link strong enough to grant them mental control over all types of technology. I knew of some who once thought Robotnik was one such technomancer, but no, he's just an extremely talented engineer with a nearly supernatural intelligence. This woman I mention is different. She has actual power over technology."

"Well, pfft, good for her I guess." Even the Overlanders over here got to have stuff over Sorun. Figured.

"Not especially, I don't think," Dimitri said. "Apparently their kind are heavily ostracized for their abilities. I wouldn't be surprised if the reason she's in Yurashia in the first place is because Overlander society didn't accept her."

"Honestly, that tracks with human behavior. I'm not surprised," Sorun admitted with a sigh. Dimitri only hummed in response. "So you all are shacking up with her while leaving Eggman to hold the bag? Not the worst exit plan."

"Indeed. I need someone to remove those bombs from my people, and as I've said conventional means won't work. Robotnik was just too clever with the bombs' design. I'm hoping someone of her caliber will be able to help using her abilities," the echidna explained.

"Ah." Made sense. Sorun tried putting himself in Dimitri's figurative shoes and he couldn't really see of a better move to play. It honestly sounded like it'd work, too. With how absolutely hated Eggman was and how everyone was chomping at the bit to get him he doubted anyone would care about them all slipping away. They wanted him above all else.

"Yes. 'Ah'." Dimitri's tone there sounded a bit scathing when he said that, and that along with the narrowing of his eyes indicated he was displeased about something. The look he was giving only lasted a few seconds, though. He dropped it after and asked in a normal voice, "I wanted to ask, since I'm curious. I'm aware you were the one that solved the second Enerjak incident but was largely absent for it. What happened."

"Oh, I killed his soul with Yamato. He's gone forever," Sorun informed Dimitri while making a stabbing motion with his hand.

"... So he's truly gone, then? Forever? Just dead?"

"Deadady-dead-dead."

"Yes, Sorun, thank you, just the confirmation I was seeking," Dimitri sarcastically replied. His face turned a bit somber after. "I can't say I'll ever miss it for all the trouble it caused. Still... a large majority of my life was spent fused to that thing. Knowing it's gone... I don't know why, but it feels like a void in me."

"Yeah, I hear parasites can have that effect," Sorun supplied. "Don't think about it too much. It'll go away on its own."

Dimitri made a "hmph" sound. "Perhaps. Hopefully. Still, I wonder... to suffer complete obliteration like he did as you claimed. What's left for one who suffers that fate? Complete cessation of consciousness, of being and existence? How does one experience such an occurrence? Where do you even go?"

"I dunno. Doubt it was the same place I wound up in when I died. I obliterated the guy."

A perplexed hum left Dimitri. "And that would be...?"

Sorun made a dry chuckle. "From the void we Voidborn are born from, Dimitri. And it's to the void we will return. Unless I pull some tricks 'fore I die but that's an entirely different problem for a different day." His expression hardened, eyes suddenly locking onto Dimitri's who seemed startled by the sudden shift. "But don't ask about that place, Dimitri. I'm serious. You don't want to know."

Dimitri seemed perturbed by the warning. Indeed, the very words themselves seemed to cause an eerie sensation to saturate the room. Sorun could see it clear as day, how the sudden mood was causing Dimitri to look uncomfortable. It didn't last long - the nearby computer dinged. It caused the atmosphere in the room to instantly evaporate, and Dimitri was abnormally quick towards turning his attention back to it.

Tapping ensued as the tips of Dimitri's tentacles flew across the keyboard, striking the keys in a dizzying blur. Data readouts that were utter nonsense and gibberish to Sorun's eyes scrolled down the screen. It must have meant something to Dimitri, though. He kept humming and nodding, though at the same time he didn't look happy about something.

"Your biological makeup is utterly astounding. How a species managed to evolve without the use of Chaos energy..." he mumbled out, almost sounding in wonder. "You're absolutely the weakest physical specimen I've ever laid eyes on as a result but the tradeoff of being able to freely manipulate Chaotic energies the way you can..."

"... Not sure how to take that, but okay," Sorun muttered. "This was all known. What about this?" Sorun's eyes briefly flashed green. "Did the Master Emerald screw something up in me or what?"

"Right..." Dimitri made a rattling sigh and floated away from the computer, then turned to address Sorun. "I don't think it had anything to do with this," he began. "More accurately I don't think it helped any, but it's not the main cause."

"You're losin' me," Sorun said, not really understanding where this was going.

"Sorun, your entire species absorbs Chaos energy like a sponge ," Dimitri breathlessly replied. "Normal organisms, from plants to animals to Mobians to everything living, we're all designed to in live in tandem with Chaos energy through our links to the Chaos Force. It's not enough to sustain us, not alone, but it is enough to empower us, even if it's only to do something as meager as simply move and think. There are, of course, abnormalities such as that Sonic fellow, but the general gist remains the same. But your kind evolved completely independent of Chaos energy. To metabolize energy from food at an efficient rate I've never seen in any other species and to utilize certain chemical and mechanical processes to compensate for the lack of Chaos energy. You're able to move around and live without using a single ounce. That isn't normal. You shouldn't be able to do that, but... it would seem life in your world found a way."

"And this is going where?" Sorun asked. "How is this relevant?"

"Sorun, do you realize it's not just the people, not just organisms, but the very world itself is suffused in Chaos energy?" Dimitri asked. And it was now he was starting to get the implications, because a sinking feeling was beginning to be felt in Sorun's gut. "It's ubiquitous. It's everywhere. Every time you eat food from this world, every breath of this air you take, simply existing here, causes you to passively absorb the ambient Chaos energy around us. Minute, negligent amounts, yes, but after nearly spending a year here it's added up. And you have no Chaos Force link to regulate your intake. I've been comparing samples taken today compared to three days ago and every day since and there is an extremely small but noticeable increase in your levels. The growth has been consistent."

"What? No, no hold up. That doesn't make sense," Sorun argued, shaking his head. "Wouldn't it just get used up? I-I tried, one time in my off time, using a Power Ring to make Yamato instead of a Chaos Emerald. You know what happened? I managed it but it didn't even last a second before disappearing. Same for all my other powers. The Emeralds don't burn out so that's one thing but if you're really telling me this-" his eyes flashed green again for emphasis, "-is because I've just been building this stuff up the entire time I've been here then why does it keep getting worse? Shouldn't it disappear the more I use it?"

"Because your kind doesn't just use Chaos energy. You convert it." Dimitri momentarily grimaced a bit, as if disturbed by something. "Two days ago when we used your Chaos Emerald to manifest some of your abilities, the readings I took... that is not Chaos energy you are using with your powers, Sorun. Frankly, with some of the things I saw in those readings... I'm not sure what I was looking at."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

"It means that when I looked at the energy wavelengths of your sword it had consistent peaks and valleys reminiscent of a heartrate and I'm not sure how I'm supposed to take that."

Sorun did. Demonic energy didn't follow conventional logic, even less than Chaos energy, and from the way Dimitri looked he must have seen a lot more than just the heartrate thing looking at his sword, or even the other powers he'd let him examine. He didn't want to outright tell him, though, for risk of an overreaction. And just wanting to keep it a secret in general. "I know what the energy is. It's... supposed to be weird like that, don't read too far into it," Sorun said. "How does this explain why my condition is getting worse and not better?"

"Maybe you could shed some insight," Dimitri suggested. "You more than anyone else know these powers. This condition - is it similar to anything? Anything at all that could give us some hint towards figuring this out?"

Some. Sorun had formed a pretty solid guess the moment he'd seen his nails growing into claws back at that castle but he'd never wanted to draw conclusions. "There'd always been a... certain ability," Sorun began, leaning forwards while clasping his hands together. "One I'd wanted above all else. I never got it, though. The Emeralds seemed to give me everything but that one specific power, and even when I gained the ability to control them I could still never manifest it. A lot of these symptoms I'm showing, they... resemble it. The power I wanted."

The change in eye color, the claws, the increase in physical ability, the track marks from all the syringes that had been used to draw blood from him healing over too quickly. Sorun didn't want to say it was some nascent, juvenile form of Devil Trigger, one so weak and incomplete it was barely recognizable, but the evidence was stacking by the day. How emotional bursts automatically triggered it. Him learning to switch it on and off. In a weird sort of way it added up.

"Why did you want it so badly?" Dimitri asked.

Because everyone had childish fantasies of something and Sorun's had always been to turn into a cool-looking demon monster since he was four. But Sorun was too embarrassed to say something like that. "It's just something I wanted," he said, not wanting to get too far into it. "The power itself was a transformation. Makes you really powerful. But I shouldn't even have it to begin with."

"Well... you know the spiel. Chaos energy being shaped by the will of the heart and all that. Voidborn such as you seem to take that saying more literally than its intention," Dimitri said. "It's possible you had this ability from the moment you took your first breath on Mobius. That you were never able to manifest it because you already possessed it. You'd just never accumulated enough power to actually utilize it until recently, and I wouldn't be surprised if your close proximity to the Master Emerald accelerated some process you'd already been undergoing during the duration of your stay in this world."

From minute one. He'd had it since minute one. "But this power isn't a good thing, is it," Sorun mumbled out, already suspecting he knew the answer.

The solemn look Dimitri gave Sorun all but confirmed it. "The power you've been steadily accumulating, that your body is converting in order to feed the progress of this... transformation. It's bad enough your kind's biology are negatively impacted by Chaos energy. It's already been doing a number on you. But the changes your body are undergoing to accommodate this ability is only exacerbating the present symptoms caused by that weakness. You simply can't handle it. Looking at all the tests I've run I'm confident in saying this transformation won't even be halfway complete before it outright kills you."

"Oh... halfway, huh? That'll look awful. Won't be symmetrical at all." Sorun made a dry sound. It was supposed to be a completely monotonous chuckle, but he couldn't even manage that as he laid his back down on the examination table, one leg swinging off freely while the other kept its foot down on the metal table. "No way to stop it?"

"... None," Dimitri confirmed. "You'd have to isolate yourself in an environment free of Chaos energy, and frankly speaking, no such place exists in this multiverse. Even if you found one you wouldn't find life free of Chaos energy to cultivate food. This process if completely irreversible."

"Huh..." He laid his hands underneath his head as he thought that over. "So it's either go back to my dead world and live there for a shorted life due to radiation poisoning or spend the rest of my rapidly shortening life here and die of Chaos energy poisoning. From the moment I arrived here this planet's been trying to kill me, Dimitri. I don't know what I did to tick it off so much," he mumbled out. "Thought when I finally got those Emeralds out of me that were irradiating me with so much Chaos energy they were shredding years off my life that everything would be fine, but it turns out I didn't even need the Emeralds to do that. The whole multiverse is out against me. I can't escape Chaos no matter where I go."

He wasn't even that surprised. That was the worst part. Maybe somewhere in the back of Sorun's mind he knew something along these lines were happening, that somewhere in his subconscious he'd managed to piece together most of the puzzle and was ready for it. Or maybe because he couldn't be surprised anymore it didn't come as all that shocking. He was so used to brushing against death all the time it just wasn't hitting like it should. Maybe it was just because he was so fucking tired of it all.

"How long?" Sorun asked. His voice came out hollow and emotionless.

"I can really only estimate. The progression of accumulated power is roughly linear but the damage to your body isn't. The more it's damaged by this the more susceptible to further damage it becomes." Dimitri's tentacles shuffled around on the ground in a sort of awkward gesture. "I'd estimate five years at the worst. Looking at it in a hopeful light maybe seven or eight years. You're already severely damaged from all the time you've spent here and any regeneration ability is going to be of no help because there isn't any physical damage to repair. It's... simply degrading you."

Not surprising either. This transformation was a part of him and it was killing him. It'd be like trying to heal a tumor. And regeneration hadn't helped him out the first time Chaos energy poisoning killed him. No matter where Sorun looked it he came to the same answer: he was sunk.

Man. He looked so pathetic right now, staring up into his reflection in the reflective ceiling. He thought for a few moments that the ceiling began cracking - that the reflection began breaking down and that at any moment it'd shatter completely and shower Sorun in debris. And then he'd blink and it'd be completely intact and whole.

"I could have something to offer you."

Sorun made a quiet scoff. He didn't dare hope. "Speak, then."

Dimitri hesitated. He looked towards Sorun's face, which was still staring up towards the ceiling with a forlorn expression, and had paused for a few moments before speaking. "Within complex organisms such as us blood is usually the main medium for which Chaos energy is distributed throughout the body. If this medium were to be... removed, so to speak, it would dramatically reduce the rate at which your body accumulates Chaos energy."

"So you wanna what? Rip out all my bone marrow and fill me up with artificial blood?"

"Your skeleton, actually. But essentially."

Sorun blinked. He blinked a few more times and then turned his head to look at Dimitri. He looked serious, which worried Sorun.

"I was joking," he said.

"The artificial blood is safer than you'd think. I use it; a majority of Dark Legion echidna with extensive cybernetic modification use it."

"Dimitri, I don't..." Sorun sighed and rubbed his face, then spun around on the metal bed to sit back up. "You seriously wanna tear my skeleton out?" he asked in a tired, incredulous voice.

"Everything but your spine and skull. Those areas are more... delicate than others, and it would leave you with some bone marrow left so you have some semblance of an immune system," Dimitri explained. "You'd have some small amount of organic blood, but the composition would largely be artificial. You'd have to undergo dialysis on a weekly basis to recycle the blood in your system - I can give the crafting specifications for that. And a mechanical skeleton would be useful in helping support a failing body for when your deterioration becomes extremely severe. Mechanized joints that can function independently of muscle attachment points in needy circumstances."

"Okay, this... you're throwing a lot at me." Sorun groaned out and rubbed at his eyes. Become a cyborg. That was his solution to Sorun's mortality issue. "Would it be a cure?"

"No. Replacing your blood would be the most effective means of slowing the progression of your deterioration, but your skin, muscles, organs... all those are still susceptible to the Chaos energy you're constantly bathing in," Dimitri explained. "You could replace those, but none of it would be as effective as swapping out your blood. You could replace your whole body, but at the end of the day you still have an organic brain, Sorun."

"Yeah, I wasn't thinking about full-body conversion." Sorun's hands dragged down his face. "This is seriously what you're offering me?"

"It's either this or you find some way of obtaining roboticization. But not even Eggman knows what that process would do to a Voidborn like you. It's never been done. You'd be tempting fate."

"I'm even less keen on that than this," Sorun mumbled. "Uh, how, uh, how much time would it buy me? Getting the cyberskeleton and swapping my blood out?"

"I could only hazard a guess. Twenty years, maybe thirty."

"That's it?"

"There's no miracle cure for you, Sorun. Your entire species is an unprecedented case," Dimitri informed him. "Maybe in couple decades' time medical technology will advance to the point a new solution can be offered to you. This, what we have right now at this moment, is what I can offer you. And even should this be untrue... a handful of decades of life is better than nothing, isn't-?"

"Quit talking for a moment." Sorun held a hand out to stop Dimitri. He did so, mouth clamping shut as he watched Sorun hang his head in thought.

It sounded good. That was the most messed up part about all this: it actually sounded good. Cybernetic implants were... something he was only partially uncomfortable with, and if it was just his skeleton it wasn't like it would be super noticeable. Might even get to the point he'd forget he had a fake skeleton, some hopeful part of his mind whispered. The dialysis would be a pain in the ass, but manageable. And twenty to thirty years at worse if no other solution ever presented itself was... something. More than he had any right to hope, maybe. That'd get him to what, his forties? Fifties? Wasn't ideal, but hell, people had died younger. And roboticization didn't sound appealing. Doubly so when nobody knew what would even happen.

"Dammit... this really is my only option, ain't it?" That was... yeah. Fuck. If it was the only way it was the only way. With laconic slowness he glanced up at the corner of the room, towards the camera watching the both of them. He knew Nicole was watching all of this and was receiving this information in real time. He couldn't help but wonder what she thought about all this. Probably horrified on how his lift was falling in a downturned spiral for like the millionth time. "Fucking fuck. Alright."

"If you need to take some time to decide, maybe talk with others-" Dimitri began.

"Nobody has any say in this but me," Sorun interrupted. Partially untrue, because if Nicole had an opinion he'd listen and maybe even defer to her. And he knew deep down she'd want him to get this surgery if it meant extending his dwindling life. "The transformation ability. Would I lose it?"

"Possibly. It could slow it down to the point its progress stops, it could eliminate it entirely," Dimitri provided. "I don't believe it'd take away your ability to warp Chaos Emeralds to your heart's content. You may find difficulty without a blood medium, but I don't think you'd outright lose them."

"Think. You think . You don't know," Sorun pointed out. "You don't know if I'll lose all my powers doing this."

"It's a non-zero chance, however unlikely I would pin it," Dimitri amended.

"Still wanna do this knowing there's a chance I'll never be able to manifest Yamato afterwards to take the bombs out of those echidna?"

The floating head sighed. "Honestly, no. I don't. But you'll never agree to saving them first before yourself, will you?" he asked, tone growing grim. "So it's a chance I'll just have to take. But I'm confident with the odds - both of our odds."

... Not super appealing. Death was even less so. The prospect of losing Yamato forever made Sorun feel extremely queasy. If Dimitri had faith it wouldn't be lost, though... "What would you need?"

"Time to create a surgical plan and create the designs needed for the cybernetics. The sourcing of the materials and production of those parts will have to be left to you, though I don't imagine with the aid of nanites production will be that much an issue. We'd need to wait for a window where'd I'd be able to be gone long enough not to be missed to actually perform the surgery and have you wake up to bring me back. Additionally I'll need to confer with your physician - we need to find an anesthetic strong enough to put you under but weak enough not to stop your heart. I'm worried you're more susceptible to suppressants of that nature from some of the tests I ran on your biology."

Sorun was too embarrassed to point out how right he was. "Yeah, you'll have to talk to Dr. Quack about that. He's the head surgeon and physician in the city," he mumbled. "You'll be performing the surgery?"

"I imagine they'll want this Dr. Quack in the operating room with me, if nothing else than to keep an eye on me and to ensure I'm actually holding to my end of the deal," Dimitri remarked. His voice sounded a bit amused. "Other assistants provided by the Republic would be appreciated and I've no doubt the A... Nicole will want to be present as well." There was a pause as Dimitri regarded Sorun. "Am I to take this questioning as you already having reached a decision? You don't want to take any time to think on it?"

"Nothing to think about. It's either this or die without ever seeing twenty-five." Sorun looked down at his right hand and flexed it. Silently, he lamented the fact that it was probably going to be the last time he'd ever flexed the bones in that hand ever again. "What's it going to be like?" he asked. "Having a cyberskeleton? It gonna hurt too badly?"

Dimitri made an understanding sound. "I can understand the hesitation, but we echidna have become rather proficient in cybernetic augmentation, Sorun. I will admit the recovery process will be a bit of an ordeal and we can talk more about that at length later, but I promise you that afterwards you'll never notice a difference aside from the surgical scars. You have my word you'll come out of this better than you were going in. For how little you seem to value my word," he added.

"... It may have a bit more credibility than I initially gave it." In a sudden motion Sorun slapped his hands on the examination table and jumped off, startling Dimitri slightly. His boots landed on the floor with a loud clack ! as he stood up to his full height. "My kingdom for a shiny new skeleton... alright. Let's do it. Salvage whatever life I've got left in me and I'll save those echidna."

A/N- This chapter was nothing like how it looked in the conceptual phase. I planned something completely different. In the original rendition Sorun was a lot more hostile towards Dimitri and Dimitri was supposed to attempt to go behind Sorun's back to the Freedom Fighters to beg them to try and convince Sorun to save the echidna first. There was gonna be this big argument with Sally which would have ended with Sorun saying point blank to her face, "And what exactly are you going to do about it? I'm not one of your Freedom Fighters anymore. You can't order me around. I'll do what I want." Later on he would have directly implied he wasn't going to lift a finger to help the echidna if Dimitri couldn't help him and Sonic would have got in a screaming match with him over it. It was bad enough that Dimitri was going to refuse treatment unless he helps first, at which point Sorun shrugs, holds Yamato to his own throat, and the following would have played:

Sorun: "I'm dead anyways so here's what we're doing now since you wanted to be difficult: I'm gonna cut my throat open with this. I'll have anywhere from five to fifteen seconds before I lose consciousness and bleed out. You got that long to change your mind so I turn the regeneration on and heal the wound closed."

Dimitri: "You're bluffi-"

Sorun: -Cuts throat open-

Google gave me a suicide hotline number when I was researching how long it took to die from a cut throat so that was fun. It was gonna go places. And in hindsight I was gonna have Sonic in the room and 100% he would have just run over and taken the Emerald out of Sorun's hand and he wouldn't have been able to do a thing, maybe I could have written him out of the room at the time, I dunno, but I had a way different plan for this (I'm also kinda glad I ended up not doing it 'cause Nicole would have been there too and, uh, yeah I have no idea how I would have reconciled that).

But none of that happened. Here's what happened: I got Sorun and Dimitri talking and then that, that up there, that chapter, that just happened. It just flowed out. My fingers were flying over the keyboard and I was thinking to myself, "Man this isn't really what I had in mind" but I couldn't stop. And I looked back at it and ended up liking this better? Because on the one hand it's going against the message of "hey Sorun is genuinely growing more insane the longer this goes" that I had planned but on the other hand the conversation he had with Dimitri is probably the healthiest conversation he's had in, like, the last fifty chapters. And that's what happens with this story: flat-out I think the only interesting conversations Sorun ever has is with the villain characters in this setting. I don't know why. It just happened. Maybe because Sorun and the villains can kind of emphasize with each other whereas all the good Freedom Fighter characters don't have an ounce of gray to their morality, they're all white knights, so there's just not a lot to talk about. It kind of makes me pine for the early, early concepts for this story where Sorun actually did take Eggman's deal in the beginning of the story and immediately flipped to his side. I was gonna turn him into a cyborg zombie. And it's kind of an appealing idea now because it would have given him exposure to a way more interesting cast.

Then again I'm pretty sure at this point Sorun's already talked to all the interesting villains and everyone left are pretty one-dimensional and boring, so I dunno, maybe it evens out.

But anyways, yeah, this chapter happened. I don't know why I like it better. I look at what I wanted and realize that would have just been exhausting to write so I just wrote what I wanted instead of what I planned. That's the long and short of what happened. And it made me realize writing scenes where Sorun's losing his mind and going off on people is mentally exerting to me. Like the negativity actually blows back against me in reality and now, just now as I write this, have I realized that. And I really think if I tried going with my original idea for the chapter it would have taken me an extra two or three weeks to write.

That segways into my later point.

You know another thing I realized? Every time Shadow's not in a chapter I'm asking myself "Where's Shadow?" because I've realized the power of putting a crazy man next to the straight man. I kind of regret not putting him into more chapters because there's actually some good content potential there but they lead such different lives I gotta twist the plot just to get them in the same room. Because they juxtapose against each other so much so it's just fun writing scenarios with them together. The crazy man and straight man device works. It really does work.

That segways into my later point.

Now audience. Boys, girls. Children of all ages. Gather 'round. Pull up a chair, grab a snack. Listen to ol' papa Domino jaw a bit (could be mama, hey, you guys don't know, I'm a mystery person behind a screen. There's probably a couple people out there that can peg my gender from my writing style alone but don't listen to those guys 'cause they're probably wrong. And pay no attention to the fact my OCs are always male, that means nothing).

I'd like to face facts. I've slowed down a bit over time. Used to be at the beginning of this I was banging out a chapter a week, heck, I was shipping 'em out as fast as that Coeur guy over on the RWBY corner of the site ships his stuff out, but that's not the case anymore. And it's not for any major reason, no life-changing paradigm shifts, nothin' o' that nature.

It's, uh... alright, listen, chapter one with the big A/N at the beginning I made it clear I wasn't some diehard Sonic fan and that's still true. And I'm gonna finish this story, absolutely, before I hear the alarm bells 'cause I see you all reaching for them. It's gonna get finished. Unless I die, in which case I've left precisely zero redundancies in place to provide you all some closure in the event I'm physically incapable of ever finishing this, so have fun sleeping tonight with that knowledge. That said, we're a hundred in, guys. Over a million words of Sonic. There's gotta be some give somewhere. And maybe that's the problem, maybe that's why I've slowed down, 'cause I've been writing the same thing for years now. I need to spread my wings. I gotta branch out. I wanna chew .

Here's where this going: IRL I was thinking about all this when, one day about a month ago, I was browsing YouTube (and this how it always starts, I swear, YouTube recommends something to me and it spirals from there) and I see this video. I ignore it. But it pops back up in my feed. Over and over. It's not going away. And I see the views are going up explosively.

"Fine, I'll watch it," I say.

I didn't think looking at the thumbnail I'd like it. It was a thirty-minute animated short based off this webcomic I'd never heard of. I went in just to see what all the hubbub was. And then I binged the webcomic in two nights 'cause it turns out it's actually pretty good, and through the whole experience I get exposed to this one character. And this character. Guys this character. You thought Shadow was a straight man, this guy, he's a turbo straight man. Straight man ultima. I've never seen the straight man archetype portrayed so hard in any other media I've ever seen. And I'm looking at the crazy man/straight man relationship I got going on with Sorun and Shadow. And then I look at Mr. Straight Maxima over here. And it's like somebody uses a pickaxe to bore the inspiration straight into my head, the ideas just start pouring in as I think to myself, "What if I make a story where it's just this?" Like the universe just threw the answer to all my problems in my lap. And so since then I've been planning some and then I made a fresh new OC and he's rarin' to go, guys, he's pointing at the field and beggin' the coach to let him in.

Look what I'm trying to say is I wanna work on something else on the side.

That is not to say - NOT TO SAY - I'm losing focus on this story. This other thing, this side project, I wouldn't be dividing attention between the two. I'd only work on it, like, once a week. I just want something, anything , to break up the monotony of writing nothing but Sonic. If anything it might make chapters come out even faster, that's part of the reason, this is a big motivation experiment I wanna try. But I haven't made a final decision on if I really wanna do this 'cause it's a big commitment and I know it'll upset some people, so here's the deal:

Next chapter. The entire next chapter is entirely just a drug sequence since it takes place during Sorun's surgery, okay, so next chapter. I'm gonna workshop some stuff so you see what I'm talking about and also to see if I can actually pull this off. It'll be a learning experience for us all. Then I'll post a poll and you guys can decide if I go through with this madness or not. Even if you all say yes I still might not 'cause this is a hard whim I'm working off right now, but the last time I got that kind of burst of inspiration after YouTube recommended me something weird this story happened so hey, who knows.

That's all, go home.

Chapter 101

A/N- So in a lot of shows there's always that one goofy episode you're not really supposed to take seriously 'cause it's mostly just nonsense. Like that one time in Hellsing where Alucard talked to the spirit of his gun and it was just Bruce Willis for some reason.

I still don't know what was up with that. But anyways this chapter was largely inspired by that.

Recursion Error

Episode 101 - We're holding these synapses together with spit and gum

---

Livin' the life. Keeping it all together. Wasn't easy but he was managing, somehow. He was doing it. Keeping it all together.

"Gebuhh..."

Goddammit.

"Ah, for the love of..." The loud slap that resulted from Sorun slapping his own face echoed across the infinite, dark expanse he was standing in. Because right there at his feet was Sorun. Flat on his back and drooling like a moron. Eyes completely clouded and looking off in two different directions. "They hit ya with the hard stuff, huh?" Sorun mumbled to him as he crouched down to look at him. This happened every time he got drugged off his gourd, and who was left to run the brain in the background when he was down and out like this? Him. This guy.

Wasn't the worst job in the world but for the last ten months it'd been the most stressful one in existence. Sorun shook his head, standing up away from Sorun and pacing away a few meters as he held his chin in thought. "Alright, guess I better go check the systems, make sure nothing burns out like last time ." He grimaced. Something always, always had to go wrong whenever one of these misadventures happened, whether it be a morphine overdose, or mushrooms, or a drunken spell, or that fucking purple coconut. Never failed, absolutely never failed to break something and who had to be the guy to fix? Him. Of course it had to be him because who else was gonna do it?

Once more Sorun crouched down. There wasn't exactly a floor he was standing on - just more nothingness. That said he'd been around long enough to be able to feel out where the hatch was, so after some fumbling he'd managed to find the small groove among all the nothing he was standing on. With a swift upward motion of his arm the hatch was lifted. Where there was once nothing there was now a square hole floating next to his feet that lead down into a metal-lined tunnel. To one side of the square chute was a ladder, which Sorun grabbed onto as he began to lower himself into the metal tunnel. He stopped halfway, turning over to Sorun who was still drooling on the metaphorical ground over there.

Sorun pointed over at him. "Don't worry, buddy, I'll get it all sorted in a jiffy."

There was no response aside from unintelligible gibberish from Sorun.

"... Alright, good talk." Breathing out while shaking his head Sorun ducked fully into the tunnel while closing the hatch over his head. Darkness completely enshrouded him until he'd pulled a flashlight and turned it on. The conditions honestly weren't much better with such a meager source of light, but it was something to work with.

He continued to move down the ladder, often stopping at a random juncture to inspect the walls of the tunnel he was descending.

Inserted into the wall were electronic widgets, softly humming from the electric current running through them as random, colorful lights blinked on and off on them all. Sorun didn't care much for what the random sequences of light meant - the important thing was that they were on and blinking in the first place. Cognitions could take care of the rest as long as nothing was outright broken.

Eventually the bottom of the metal shaft had been reached. A nearby valve had to be turned to engage the manual hydraulic system that opened the hatch below him, which he'd dropped out of the moment it was open. He'd dropped into the new room, with the hatch he'd just fallen through located within the room's ceiling. It was, upon first glance, a "control room" of sorts. Clean metal walls with linoleum flooring along with ample lighting. Computer monitors lined the room, with larger, refrigerator-sized computers pushed up against the walls - giant bundles of cables jutted out from the computers and fed into ports located along the walls. There was one large, metal door and another smaller door on the side. Above the larger main door was the word "Hypothalamus" alit in red block letters etched into an electrical box.

Nodding his head, Sorun shined his flashlight around. Everything seemed in order much to his relief. Stuff was on and nothing was smoking or, worse, on fire. Hated to see that. Admittedly this was one area of the brain he was most worried of since he'd never seen the effect of Mobius-brand anesthesia, but it all seemed in working order.

"Yep, yep, mhm, ah-huh..." He mumbled to himself, looking all around the room and seeing not one thing out of place. Even the giant lightbulb in the direct center of the room, the main fuse of this facility that ensured it could even work in the first place, was bright and shining. If that was the case then maybe he was worrying over nothing and-

The lightbulb winked out.

"SHIT. Again!?" Every time, every goddamn time. Grumbling incoherently to himself Sorun marched up to the lightbulb, flashlight gripped tightly in his hand as he looked it over. Along the way he started to see the problems arise, how the displays on all the computer monitors were starting to glitch out and how the overhead lights were starting to flicker. He stopped in front of the burned-out bulb with an intense frown, trying his first line of defense: whacking it with his flashlight.

Thunk!

Nada. The bulb was still out. He tried his second and last line of defense: he kicked it.

THUNK!

Nope.

"Ugh, now I gotta get a replacement..." Sorun lamented. He breathed outwards, reminding himself it wasn't the end of the world and this is why they had surplus parts in storage. Wasn't like this was the first time, anyways, he just needed it to go as smooth as all those times. So he'd left the room, hearing the pneumatic doors close with a soft hiss! behind him as he gazed out to the familiar, brightly-lit hallways he'd grown so accustomed to walking. If memory served right it was somewhere down this hall on the left...

After a few minutes of walking he'd found it. Storage and Maintenance. Said it right there on top of the door. The sight made Sorun's mood lighten a bit, because of all the cognitions he'd made to keep things together while he was gone at least this one was the nicest one to be around. And they hadn't broken anything as of yet so that was always a plus.

Upon entering the door he was greeted to a very different room to the previous. Where the last room had been a control room this one was more akin to a warehouse. Past the lobby area where a front desk, an office door behind that desk, and some nearby chairs sat, there was a vast room with shelves. Shelves that reached so high towards the tall ceiling their tops could barely be seen, shelves that expanded out so laterally he couldn't see an end to the shelves whether he looked left or right, and shelves that reached so far back there was no telling how far one would have to walk to reach the end. A daunting size to the uninitiated, but really this was one of the smaller rooms in the brain. Good thing, too, because the cognition Sorun had run this place was short. Also not too fond of the dark, which was why he'd had to re-install new lighting to make it practically look like daytime in here. And then painted the ceiling to look like the sky - with how far away it was it was practically the real thing.

Wasting no time Sorun walked up to the front desk and rang the little bell sitting on it. In the back office he heard a small crash, followed by the sound of small, pattering feet running towards the door. It was flung open, though due to the desk obscuring his view Sorun only saw a hat with cat ears jutting out of the top dart out from beyond the door. Arms covered in brown garb placed themselves on top of the counter to lift their body up to see over it. The face of a human child with yellow cat eyes and purple hair popped up from behind the counter, with the eyes widening once their owner saw Sorun standing beyond the counter.

"Sorun! You're back!" A large smile broke out over the child's face upon seeing Sorun. And then they'd let out a high-pitched laugh when Sorun reached out from the other side of the desk, grabbed them under the armpits, and lifted them up and over the desk while holding them up above Sorun's head.

"Hello, Niko." A small smile grew on Sorun. One of the few cognitions in that place that were too innocent to not be nice. It was still great to have someone he could leave on their own and not worry about, and his day was a bit brighter with them around. "I need a new fuse for the hypothalamus."

"Oh, again?" The smile Niko wore fell off and their body went limp, which prompted Sorun to set the small child down on the ground. "What happened this time?"

"It's just the surgery thing, Niko, it's nothing to worry about."

Niko's expression brightened back up. "Does that mean afterward you'll get to stay!?"

"I don't know. Hopefully." Sorun looked towards the desk, frowning a bit when he remembered how tall it was in relation to Niko. "Niko, why do you have a desk that large? I can get you a smaller desk."

"Oh, no, it's no trouble!" The small cat-like child began waving their arms, making the sleeves that were too big for them flap about. "You don't need to go through all that trouble really the desk is fine-!"

Sorun snapped his fingers. The desk disappeared in a white cloud of smoke, and when the smoke dissipated a smaller, more fitting desk for Niko was in its place. "You have a smaller desk now," he said to them. "Why did you have that in the first place?"

"Er, um..." Oh, they looked nervous now for some reason. They'd looked grateful for a second there with the new desk but now they just looked a bit awkward. "Um, Morgana said it'd be better for everyone if we all used the same equipment. Something about... efficiency through uniformity of the workplace? I didn't really get it."

"Ah-huh." He might have to make an extra stop during this visit. "The fuse?"

"Oh, sure! Wait right here!" Niko scampered past Sorun and into the actual storage area of the storage room, disappearing into the labyrinth of shelves within. Another point towards Niko - Sorun didn't have to wait long as they was back five minutes later with a large, glowing lightbulb held in both hands.

"That was fast," Sorun complimented.

"Yeah! We replace this part a lot so it's really easy for me to find it!"

"... I see... Hey, wanna come help me screw this fuse in?"

"Boy, do I!"

Huh?

"Huh?" Sorun squinted. A lot of doors to the more important sections of the brain were locked, but this lock was... not at all how he remembered it. He remembered a standard lock you'd need a normal key for. A key everyone carried. This , this thing he was staring at right now, was not a lock with a normal keyhole.

No, what he was staring at was an electronic screen bolted onto the side of the door leading into the room he'd just left ten minutes ago. The hypothalamus. He needed to get in there so he and Niko could install the new fuse, but when he'd tried to open the door it didn't budge.

"Niko, what is this?" Sorun asked.

Instead of answering immediately Niko looked down and kicked at their feet. "... One of the new biometric locks," they shyly answered.

"Biometric? What? We had normal locks, what- what happened to the normal locks?"

Niko didn't look up at Sorun when they answered. "Morgana took them out..."

"Okay, now I'm definitely visiting him." Suppressing an annoyed groan Sorun shook his head and rose his left hand up. "Okay, so what, I just press it against the screen like this-?"

Something probably not good happened. When he pressed his hand against the electronic screen on the door it flashed red and let out a loud, blaring sound. Niko had jumped in fright at the noise, and Sorun's scowl had only deepened.

"Didn't work, huh?"

"Morgana said only people with administrator privileges can unlock the doors..."

"What? I'm literally Sorun's conscience. Why do I not have admin privileges?" Now he was starting to suspect somebody was fucking with him. Specifically Morgana. A bubbling anger was starting to grow. "For the love of- this is why I just gave everyone a key, to avoid nonsense like this..."

"U-uh, maybe you used the wrong hand?" Niko suggested. They were finally looking up at Sorun with a smile that tried to be helpful, but the yellow eyes were intensely nervous. "Try the other hand!"

It wasn't gonna work, but Sorun wanted to make Niko feel like they were helping. So he sighed and tried using his right hand this time. To no surprise, the same thing happened. It flashed red and blared at them. The door was still closed.

Niko made a dejected sound. "Oh... m-maybe your hand's dirty and it can't read it right?"

Sorun glanced down at his hand. It was pretty much pristine - not a fleck of dirt or grease to be seen. For Niko's sake he wiped his hand off on his pants and tried for the third time. And just like the other two times the lock yelled at him. And then, in a new turn, a synthesized, female voice droned out to the both of them:

"Due to three repeated failures this door has been locked down for a period of seventy-two hours. Your attempts have been logged. If you are having trouble please contact your administrator for assistance. Thank you and have a wonderful day."

Well now the anger was just starting to boil over. The screen winked out and turned into a dark gray glass slab that didn't respond no matter how many times Sorun hit it. It really was locked out. "Oooohh... ooh, I'm, I'm starting to get pretty mad now..." Sorun mumbled out, furiously rubbing a hand across his forehead in a vain attempt to quell the growing migraine he had.

Niko jumped, looking up at Sorun with a startled and worried expression. "Sorun? Don't get mad. Please," they pleaded. The words somewhat had a calming effect on Sorun. He'd began to breath less heavily and his head wasn't pounding as hard, but he was still trying to melt the door open with a glare. "Maybe we can just visit Morgana? I'm sure he can fix this!"

"Fix, yeah, I'll do some fixing alright..." Sorun chuckled out, a manic look growing in his eyes. It caused some visual confusion on Niko's part, and also made them take a step back as they continued to look at Sorun with concern. It made Sorun blink as he took in the reaction, after which he cleared his throat and did his best to straighten out his appearance. "That is to say, uh... yeah, totally, Morgana can fix this. He better fix it or I'll fix him ..." Sorun grumbled under his breath and he turned around, gesturing for Niko to follow. Then he stopped upon realizing something. "Wait, which way is his office again?"

"Oh, it's this way!" Niko ran a short distance past Sorun, and then turned around, waving at him to follow while the other hand still held the giant lightbulb. "Just come and follow me! It's real close by, you'll see!"

Sorun did so. He did so with his hands shoved in his pockets and with a grim look on his face as he thought over how hard he was gonna berate Morgana, but he still followed Niko all the same.

If nothing else the door to the administrator's office was quaint. Unlike all the pneumatic door that sealed off various sections of the mind this door was just a straight-up normal door. Even had a frosted glass window with a little "administrator" sign hanging off it. With how this trip had been so far Sorun half-expected a laser forcefield with automatic turrets mounted everywhere, but if Morgana kept one thing grounded, it was the door to his own office. He had half a mind to just kick it down and storm in but Niko was right there and he didn't want to accidentally get a splinter in their eye.

Speaking a which. Niko. Sorun turned towards the small child with pursed lips. He had some very choice words for Morgana that couldn't be said within the vicinity of a child's ears. "Hey, Niko," he began, taking a knee so the both of them could be at eye level, "I gotta go in and have a chat with Morgana, m'kay? Just gonna be a minute or two. Do me a favor and wait out here."

Niko looked apprehensive at the idea, rocking back and forth on their feet with an unsure expression. They were clutching the lightbulb hardly in their hands as they asked, "You're just gonna talk, right? Promise you won't yell at him?"

He wanted to yell at him so goddamn bad. "Niko..."

"He's just trying to do the job you gave him," they weakly argued. "I know he hasn't done that great a job but he's managed to keep this place standing! Even if he is annoying sometimes..." they muttered out. "So please be nice. He's trying his best and you promised to not yell."

He did no such thing, but Sorun knew if he pointed that out he'd just disappoint Niko, and he had enough to worry about with that weighing on him. So he sighed, and then reached over to pat at Niko's hat between the ears. "Won't yell," he promised. "Gonna give him a stern what-for, though."

Niko nodded, which prompted Sorun to stand up and make his way towards the door. Fortunately he found that the door was unlocked when he turned the knob, which should have alleviated some amount of anger but didn't, and he swiftly entered the room while closing the door behind him.

The office on the other side of the door was large - in fact to Sorun's eyes it looked way larger than the last time he'd been here. It was basically the size of a small penthouse with nothing to show for it. Just a carpet and a plant in the corner. And, of course, the giant desk pressed up against the back wall which was just a giant window that gave a nice city-wide view of the town behind the office. And of course, him , the one sitting behind the desk. The source of Sorun's ire. The black and white, child-sized cat person with a head so disproportionately large he looked like a living bobblehead. Filling out paperwork behind the desk with such an intensity that he didn't even notice Sorun enter the office until he'd cleared his throat.

"Hey, Morgana, it's your boss."

"Ah!? What!?" He looked up, large blue eyes blinking in a panic until they'd locked onto Sorun, who'd moved in front of the desk. After that came the chuckling - the nervous-sounding chuckling and the uneasy grin Morgana had quickly grown while he tugged on the yellow scarf he wore. "O-oh, hey, Sorun! Didn't know you came back! Something the matter?"

"Actually, yeah, Morgana, there is." Sorun slammed his palms on the desk and leaned over it while staring Morgana in the eyes. "As it happens I'm fucking pissed off at you at the moment. Do you wanna take a guess as to why?"

"U-uh..." With how hard Morgana was tugging on the scarf it was almost like he was trying to strangle himself with it. "No? What happened?"

"What happened is that Sorun's in the middle of the surgery and out of it 'cause of the drugs so I came down here to look around, you know, do a li'l maintenance check," Sorun said. "And wouldn't you know it the fuse to the hypothalamus burned out again. Which is a problem because the body's gonna be in a coma until I fix that. But guess what, I can't fix it 'cause some dumbass replaced all the locks with this biometric shit and I put the lock in a security lockdown trying to get in."

In a shocking turn, at least to Sorun, Morgana's expression shifted to anger. He even pointed one of his tiny paws at Sorun and yelled an accusatory tone, "Well why didn't you come get me instead of trying to brute-force it!?"

"Because it's my brain. Because I shouldn't have to go to a cognition to get permission to enter a piece of my own fucking brain, Morgana," Sorun replied in a scathing tone. "For fuck's sake, man, I gave you the administrator position just to hold the fort down while I was up in the surface thoughts, not to reorganize the whole security infrastructure! I used normal locks and gave everyone a key for a reason! To avoid problems like this!"

"I changed it out because that's not a security system! That was you being too lazy to make an actual-working system!" Morgana argued. "With all the different abilities you've seen people possess out in reality we have no way of knowing if there's someone out there that can invade minds, so sorry if I went out of my way to make your mind just a little more secure!"

"I'm aware there's a tiny risk of mind invasions, Morgana, that's why I made the one-to-one recreation of the USG Ishimura sitting in that one corner of the subconscious! If anyone ever invades I'm just gonna kick them in there!"

"And what happens when that's not enough!? What happens if you kick some invader in there and it's not enough to deter them!?"

"I feel like it's enough. There's a cognition of the Darkness Devil walking around in that place." Sorun shook his head. "We're getting way off track, look, is there any other annoying security features you put in I should be made aware of? Am I gonna walk into the subconscious and find out you changed the entire layout of the city? What am I getting into here, Morgana?"

"You have absolutely no right to be mad at me." Morgana hopped up on top of the desk and crossed his arms while meeting Sorun's glare with a steely gaze of his own. "When you gave me this job you said, and I quote, 'Morgana I'm leaving you in charge while I'm gone 'cause you're one of the most responsible cognitions I made. I'm not expecting miracles, just, just please make sure the place doesn't burn down while I'm gone.' End quote." He spread his arms out. "As far as I can see this place is still standing so if you have any complaints I'm all ears."

"We're possibly stuck in a coma for three days 'cause you locked me out of the hypothalamus," Sorun reminded him.

Morgana crossed his arms. He looked disappointed. "Do I really need to remind you time doesn't move at the same pace here as it does in reality? We're fine," he deadpanned. "And I didn't lock you out. You decided to hit the same button over and over for some reason even though it wasn't working."

"... You and your logic," Sorun grumbled. "What about Niko's desk, huh? I saw you gave them way too big a desk."

"Is this seriously what you're so upset about? Locks and a desk?"

"I just don't like you making all these changes, Morgana! It's my mind! I'd like it if you'd at least consult me on all this stuff before doing anything!"

"How am I supposed to consult you when you spend all your time on the surface!?" Morgana asked in a tone matching Sorun's volume. "I've been working my tail off making sure the whole subconscious is working smoothly and this is the thanks I get!? This isn't easy, you know! I'd certainly feel a lot better if you stopped by more to help with some things!"

"I can't , Morgana, and you know why? It's because the last time I left Sorun alone for two seconds he almost killed a kid! You know how hard that would have come back to bite us if I didn't manage to talk him out of it?" Sorun sighed and rubbed at the bridge of his nose. The mere memory of that day made him feel exhausted. "Look, just answer me this: are we really locked out of the hypothalamus for three days? And as you answer I want you to keep in mind I can delete you with a mere thought and the locks would go away with you."

"You're not gonna delete me. It'd make Niko cry and all the other cognitions would resent you," Morgana said. "And we both know if you were serious you would have done it already."

"... Please just help me. Are we locked out or not?"

"... No, we're not," Morgana muttered out after the tense moment between the two passed. "There's a side entrance we can get in through that's accessible through the memory banks. They're locked too, though, so we'll need to deal with that."

"Good enough." Sorun gestured for Morgana to hop off the desk. "Alright, come on. We'll go there and-"

"I'm not in the weekly rotation, I can't unlock them," Morgana cut in.

"The. What ?" Sorun paused mid-step, and the pivoted completely around with wide, glaring eyes. "You're kidding me. You're not kidding me," he realized when he saw the straight look Morgana was giving him. "Are you se- you didn't- the temp admin can't even open these locks, Morgana, why!?"

"Because every cognition is keyed into the locks but they're programmed to only accept one cognition's handprint. Who gets accepted changes to a new random cognition that gets rotated weekly," Morgana explained.

With both hands shaking, Sorun gestured towards Morgana while moaning out, "Why would you design it like this?"

"It's supposed to be an extra layer of security!"

"I messed something up making you, I really did. Ugh." Yeah, the migraine was coming back. Or at lease imagining he was. It made

Sorun groan out and rub at his forehead. "Okay, fine, whatever, who do we gotta go get to unlock the stupid fuckin' locks?"

Morgana's answer didn't come out as words. What came out was an extremely displeased sound, and a narrowing of his eyes as he glanced off to the side in what could only be described as a look of absolute derision.

"Oh, only one person in here can make you make that face," Sorun observed. "Why do you hate him so much? You're both black and white cats; I thought it'd help you get along. You know, be a good conversation starter."

"Sorun, no one gets along with him. Nobody at all." Morgana's voice quivered as he said that, and the face he wasn't making go away. It wasn't a quaver from disgust; it was from pure exhaustion. "Are you sure you don't just want to wait? The locks rotate tomorrow."

"He's really not that bad, Morgana," Sorun sighed out with a shake of his head. "Ah man, his workplace is in the dead center of the city... alright, whatever, come on." He gestured to Morgana once again, who made a resigned sound and jumped off the desk to follow him. "I'm changing all the locks back when I move back down here. I swear, I coulda made Tom from 'Tom & Jerry' and he woulda done a better job at this than you..."

Morgana didn't respond to Sorun complaining under his breath, but he did hear a disgruntled huff from the mascot cat following him around. He rolled his eyes and didn't comment on it as he opened the door to the office to step out into the hallway. He saw Niko standing nearby; it brightened his mood a bit. But only a bit. The lock thing was still upsetting him.

It's not as if he didn't see the logic. On paper Sorun would even admit the idea had some merit. But then these situations happened due to all the needless confusion and he just... ugh. He really needed to come back down here on a permanent basis to sort things through.

"Morgana! Hi!" Niko jumped up a bit and waved one of their hands at the cat following Sorun.

"H... hi, Niko." Morgana didn't sound particularly enthused when he greeted the child and only managed a half-hearted wave while wearing a forced smile.

"Hrm?" Niko had immediately locked onto the fact Morgana seemed to be in a dour mood. And then they looked up at Sorun, wearing a frown that stopped him dead in his tracks. "Hey, he looks sad! You yelled at him, didn't you!?"

"N-no," Sorun stammered.

"I wouldn't say he yelled. More like threw a tantrum," Morgana informed from behind Sorun. There wasn't a snicker or anything of the sort that followed but Sorun could hear the growing grin that was on his face. "You know how he gets. Mad over stupid stuff. Honestly, I don't know what he'd do if we weren't around to keep him in check. And to think he's supposed to be the most responsible part of the mind..."

"You're really milking the fact I don't want to deal with the consequences of obliterating you, huh, Morgana?" Sorun thought out as a grumpy pout formed on his face. It wasn't as if the cat was wrong. The fallout from such a thing just wasn't worth it. And frankly he just wasn't willing to do it, even if he'd never admit it to Morgana. Or any of the cognitions. It'd be like killing his childr- no, he wouldn't go as far as to call them that. Like killing his sibli- nope, not that either.

His roommates, it'd be like killing off his roommates. That he created. And at this point he was too used to them.

"Alright if we're done with this we gotta go take the elevator down to the subconscious proper," Sorun informed the both of them, trying his best to keep things moving. "Unless you put a lock on that, too, Morgana, in which case we're kind of sunk."

There was a sigh from behind him. "No, Sorun, I didn't put a lock on the elevator. I'm not an idiot."

"Ah, that's great. In that case you can call our ride on the way down."

The ride down the elevator was uneventful save for the phone call Morgana had made on the way down. Niko had kept to themself. Sorun had stared out the glass wall rushing past them as the elevator descended, looking out into the city. To any outside viewer who'd never seen it in person it'd just be some random city to them. To Sorun it was the hometown he'd grown up in. Mostly. For the most part. He didn't exactly have intrinsic knowledge of the place's layout despite living there for sixteen years of his life so it wasn't the most faithful recreation. But it was still somewhat accurate as long as one didn't venture too far from the city center, after which it just became a random, chaotic winding of buildings that stretched on and on.

There was also the fact the sky was a perpetual dark purple. No sun, no stars, no nothing. There was the occasional flash of red lightning racing through the wrinkles comprising the purple sky-ceiling, though. Wrinkles that were only visible when that occasional flash of light illuminated them for a split second.

It wasn't a bad place as far as subconsciouses worked. Then again Sorun had never seen anyone else's, so maybe he was a bit biased there.

With a light ding! the elevator came to a stop, and the doors opened to let the three off the circular platform that'd carried them down. The elevator had let them off at a street corner of the city. Nobody in any of the streets as far as Sorun could see looking around, but that was normal. Most, if not all, of the cognitions were inside doing something or other. All except one - the one who'd just honked that horn that blared out into the streets.

The three of the looked to the left towards the sound. A black sedan was tumbling towards them - literally. It was rolling towards them, end over end, sometimes turning over midair and flipping on its side over and over as it approached them. Despite the chaotic nature of the car's approach, the way it was flying towards them as if it were suffering some perpetual accident causing it to constantly fall sideways, it wasn't suffering the least bit of damage despite the constant battering, nor were the three watching it surprised at all at the car's turbulent approach.

And then, at the car's ten meter mark, its position switched. Instead of tumbling end over end it had righted itself. Four wheels, perpetually on fire, made contact with the concrete streets and left flaming lines in their wake as the car spun. Spun and spun and spun, around and around directly towards the three who watched with bored expression. At the five meter marked the car stopped spinning. It was drifting now, the flaming wheels screeching from the friction on the streets, and not in the least bit because each flaming wheel had tiny human skeletons chained to them.

Finally, the car had adjusted its position one final time when it'd reached the three. It'd turned at the last second, and in the same beat stopped right in front of the three, the driver's door and back door facing them. Sorun was the one to move, walking forwards towards the driver's door and then stopping a short distance away from it.

The window to the driver's side rolled down, and a head popped out. Upon first glance it would look like the face of a human woman with creamy-white skin and dark hair falling past her shoulders. Of course, looking closer it was clear to see she wasn't human at all. From the light amount of fur lining her cheeks, jaw, and chin, to the glowing red eyes with cat-like pupils, to the two glowing, yellow gems jutting out of the top of her head that were shaped like cat ears. And from here Sorun could clearly see that the hands gripping the steering wheel were black-furred cat hands with claws jutting out of the fingers. He didn't pay attention to any of this. He simply waved at her.

"Hey Kasha. Thanks for showing up on such short notice."

"Mrow-mrow!" She gave him a happy nod and enthusiastically nodded up and down. "Mrow. Mrow mrow-mrow?"

"Oh, yeah, we need a ride to Wernicke's."

Immediately, there was a shift in Kasha's demeanor. The happy smile she'd worn was instantly wiped away, replaced by a fusion of a sneer and a disgusted grimace. It was clear that the very mention of the destination in question caused her great distress, and the sight made Sorun throw his arms up.

"Oh my god, you too!? Guys, come on, he's really not that bad!"

"He is, Sorun. I told you nobody likes him," Morgana sighed out. He'd opened the door in the back and let Niko climb in the back seat first, and then said, "Really, I'm not sure why you go so far to bat for the guy."

"... Just get in the car, man." Morgana shrugged, but did as he was instructed and hopped in the back. Sorun maneuvered around the car and sat himself in the passenger seat next to Kasha, and then immediately looked down at the gear shift stick between them.

Currently the stick was in the "stop" position, with the "fast" position above that and a third position that just had a picture of flames above that. Kasha had already gripped the stick with her clawed paw and moved it up to the position with flames on it.

"Not that one, Kasha," Sorun said.

"Mrow." With a nod Kasha moved the stick to the final position above the one with the flames. This one had a skull and crossbones on it.

Sorun shook his head. "No, Kasha, normally I'd be fine with it but Niko and Morgana will throw a fit. And you know he will, too. Just put it on normal."

"Mrow..." She looked disappointed, but even still she'd moved the gear shift stick to the "fast" position, which was about as slow as she was willing to go without outright stopping. From behind Sorun had heard two sighs of relief, and when Sorun glanced up he caught Morgana mouthing a thank-you to him in the rearview mirror. He tossed him a thumbs-up in response as Kasha peeled out and began racing down the street.

With a sigh, Sorun sunk back in the car seat. Felt like the first time all day he'd been able to sit back and relax after everything that'd been going on. He rubbed at the bridge of his nose when he realized he hadn't even inspected all the areas he'd been hoping to, that he'd been stopped at his first stop and had to take this major detour just to swap a busted fuse. He was probably gonna have to bring him along too if there were any more locks along the way, and knowing Morgana there would be. He'd be annoyed and probably complain Sorun's ear off the whole way. Sorun's only defense against that was that since the body was unconscious right now he didn't have much to do anyways but that excuse didn't have much rope and he was already dreading what was to come. This is why he just gave everyone a key...

As the city rushed by them Sorun glanced out the window. And then he blanched. A lot of the city looked... bad. Buildings were cracked, windows were shattered, and these were just the details he was managing to glimpse at as they all rushed past him. Only half of the traffic lights Kasha was driving past and ignoring were actually on. The streets were cracked and every once in a while the car would jump after running over a pothole.

"Mrow-mrow..." Kasha made a sad sort of noise at the state of the city around them. Niko had shuffled uncomfortably in their seat as they clutched at the seatbelt holding them, the lightbulb sitting besides them and secured with a second seatbelt, and Morgana made a sigh as he watched out the window. As much as he could, at least, with his short stature.

"... Subconscious has seen better days, huh?" Sorun quietly remarked. In his defense it'd been in worse shape in the past. Not by much but still worse. The stress induced by hell, that absolute void they'd been stuck in after death, had nearly and irrevocably shattered this place. And everything that had happened since had been a fluctuating case of things getting better and worse. Lately, though, it'd been toeing that line. That dangerous line they'd only gone close to during the stay in hell.

They'd come back from it. Sorun would make sure. He'd managed before and he'd manage again.

"M-Morgana's been doing a lot to hold the place together," Niko sadly muttered out.

"It hasn't exactly been easy," Morgana commented from the side. "I've had to put out a lot of fires."

"Yeah. I know it's been rough." Sorun grimaced. "And, Morgana... perhaps I was... maybe... overcritical of my previous assertions-"

"You mean the part where you said I was doing a terrible job?" Morgana asked.

"Yes, that, look I'm sorry." Sorun turned around in his seat so he'd be able to face Morgana, who looked towards him. "I gave you a pretty impossible job and everything that's been going on with Sorun in reality hasn't been making it any easier, I get that, I really do, but-"

"But nothing, you need to come back!" Morgana snapped. "Putting all of us in charge of everything is only putting a band-aid on the problem because you're the only one who can run all this stuff at the same time! Everything around here is breaking down more and more and eventually there isn't anything we're gonna be able to do about it!"

"Morgana, you know I can't, you know I need to be there with Sorun because otherwise-" Because otherwise he would have killed that evil Miles and when all his friends found out this place wouldn't have recovered. Because otherwise he would have kept living in denial of the problem of their body dying off. Because otherwise he would have killed Dimitri out of spite for the world and they would have lost possibly their only shot at some kind of cure, at some kind of way to stabilize his mind. "I... look. I got it all set up, alright? After this surgery everything'll... everything will be fine. I can come back down here and set everything right like before. I won't need to be next to the guy twenty-four/seven. I can... I can fix this. All of this. We're gonna fix all this, I got it all set up. Just need a bit more time." He faced back forwards and ran a hand down his face. "Time and a new stupid hypothalamus fuse..."

Things would be fine. Like how things were when Sorun'd been brought back to life... before Earth happened. Like how he'd fixed things after before fucking Enerjak and the future fiasco happened. Like how everything had been fixed again before this new problem. It was gonna be fine. He was gonna fix it. It was his job to fix it.

Morgana gave the back of Sorun's seat a sad look as his ears flattened. "Sorun..."

"It's fine. I'm not..." He breathed out and shook his head. "I'm not mad about the locks, okay, I've just been under a lot of stress and... look don't worry about it, alright, it's all gonna be fine."

"Mrow-mrow-mrow..." He felt a pressure on his left shoulder, and when he looked Sorun saw that Kasha had put a comforting paw on his shoulder. When he looked towards her he saw her giving him a sympathetic look. "Mrow, mrow-mrow mrow mrow mrow mrow-mrow."

"Thanks, Kasha. I'll be fine, don't worry." He gave her a small smile, but then gently took her hand off his shoulder. "But keep both hands on the wheel, there's a child in the car with us."

"Mrow." She gave him a sheepish grin and put both hands back on the wheel. And then her eyes dramatically widened when she looked back ahead. "Mrow!"

Her cat foot slammed down on the car's break, instantly driving it to a halt. Niko and Morgana grunted when they were pulled back against their seats by their seatbelts. Sorun, who hadn't been wearing a seatbelt, flew forwards and shouted out when his head impacted the windshield, causing the entire thing to crack.

"Agh, son of a... baker who's financially well-off..." Sorun grumbled out as he sat up, rubbing at his head. He mumbled an apology to Kasha and snapped his fingers, causing the windshield to repair itself. Then he pulled his hand away - no blood. It resulted in him giving Kasha a thumbs-up, who smiled in return, and then he turned to the two passengers in the back. "This is why you wear seatbelts..." he chuckled out, pointing at his head. Morgana had just rolled his eyes while Niko gave him a worried-filled half-smile.

"Please be more careful, Sorun," Niko told him, though the worried look was slowly bleeding away into relief.

"I'll try my best, Niko."

The worried look was coming back on Niko's face.

"Alright, now then!" Sorun flung the car door and stepped out. Before them was a library. One large and tall enough that it was a veritable skyscraper. A sign hung above the main entrance way that read "Wernicke's Language and Comprehension Center". Below that entranceway was a large stone staircase that lead up to the doors. A... very cracked stone staircase. In fact there were more than a few sections of the steps missing. "Ah, boy..." Sorun mumbled out as he leaned back into the car. "Alright, I'm gonna go get him. Anyone wanna come with?"

"No."

"Uh-uh."

"Mrow-mrow."

"That's... okay, fair enough." Shrugging, Sorun ducked back out of the car and closed the door behind him. He looked back up at the crumbling staircase, trying his best not to notice all the cracks lining the building's surface, and shook his head as he began to make his way towards the stairs. "Here's hoping he ain't gonna be too cranky..."

Neat. If there was one, single word to describe the interior of Wernicke's Language and Comprehension Center it was neat. Clean, immaculate, even. Not a single speck of dust to be found anywhere. Unblemished olive wallpaper around every corner without so much as a wrinkle anywhere to be seen. Dark grey carpeting that was so clean it, bizarrely, didn't look much like carpeting. And every time Sorun ducked into a new room after roaming the hallways he'd see filing cabinets so perfectly lined up and so meticulously organized it all started to just blend together.

Remarkably it was the complete opposite of how the building looked on the outside. All crumbly and whatnot. But the interior, it was spotless. If this building was based in reality Sorun honestly wouldn't be surprised if it was clean enough to produce microchips in it. Even the air tasted clean. Too clean, actually. Kind of burned his nose the more he focused on it. Was vaguely lemony-scented.

"God, what, does he just douse the whole building with cleaning solution? Does he flood the halls with it?" Sorun wondered as he ducked his head into another room. Empty. Just more filing cabinets. "Where does he even get it all from? Where does he find the time?" He looked into another room only for this one to be empty. He sighed. This would be the sixth floor he'd searched by now. "Where even is he?"

Seventh floor now. For every stair Sorun had to climb he got more and more annoyed. And even more annoyed with every room he looked in only to see it was empty.

"This is getting ridiculous. Mordecai!" Sorun shouted out. He stomped down the hallway and opened up another door. Empty. Again. "Are you serio- Mordecai! Mordecai, where are you!?"

Okay! Eighth floor now! At the rate this was going Sorun was genuinely considering setting the building on fire to smoke the guy out. He could fix it in time. Sorun wouldn't even wake up until the damn bulb got replaced so he could take his time.

"Mordecai, you in here? Mordecai?" Nothing. Just another empty room with filing cabinets. "Ugh, that's it, I'm... hey, wait."

After traversing down yet more hallway he'd come across another room. On first glance there wasn't anything out of the ordinary with this door compared to all the others, solid oak construction, frosted window, standard stuff. Where most rooms had signs that read "vocabulary index" or "enunciation codex" or that one mostly-empty room simply labeled "foreign language lexicons" this one had a sign that simply said "processing" above it. More importantly than that he could see a silhouette sitting down from this side of the glass.

"Finally," Sorun thought as he approached and opened the door. This was apparently a mistake as the second he did so paper flooded out of the room. Long, thin strips of paper that coiled around Sorun's feat in a high enough volume it rose up to his ankles. When he trudged his way into the room he saw that it was more of the same within. The source of the paper was obvious when he noticed the large machine in the middle of the room continually feeding out a single, long strip of paper. There was a small desk it was feeding onto but due to the sheer amount of paper it'd outputted it was just spilling everywhere now.

"Ahem." A voice clearing their throat drew Sorun's attention to the man sitting at the larger desk near the paper-spitting machine that was overflowing with even more paper and office equipment. The cat man. The black and white anthropomorphic cat man sitting at the desk. At this point it was basically a normal sight for Sorun but where this one differed from a Mobian was that the bodily proportions were more in line with how a human's would be. And he had a black three-piece suit on. Sorun had yet to see any evidence to such a thing existing on Mobius. Or if it did that a Mobian would actually wear it.

There was also the fact Sorun had never seen a Mobian with such an unfriendly expression that Mordecai usually wore. It was his default expression. He wasn't wearing it right now. He was sitting at his desk and glaring at Sorun with a borderline-murderous expression.

"He's under substance abuse again, isn't he!?" he accused. His green cat eyes flicked over to the machine that was still spitting paper out. "I know he is, so don't even try to deny it. It's only whenever he's in one of these ridiculous situations the processing center gets inundated with these inane, incoherent ramblings you label as thoughts!"

"Yeah, wouldn't you know it but, and this amazed me when I found out Mordecai, they put you under with anesthetics before they do surgery on you," Sorun replied in a dry tone. "I think it's 'cause otherwise you'd die of shock from all the pain, but I dunno, I'm not a medical professional. I don't know these things. I just have secondhand knowledge from mom."

The white eyebrows that contrasted with the black fur on his face sans mouth knitted together in frustration. "And did the thought of giving me any sort of warning even once cross your mind? Perhaps to allow me the opportunity to shut down the language processing unit attempting to drown me in unintelligible garble? Have I not told you on multiple occasions every time Sorun's reduced to a state he's unable to string two words together the thoughts don't cease and I am forced to process these fatuous speech requests?"

With a blank expression, Sorun reached down and picked up a bundle of the paper. There weren't any words on it, nor even letters. It was just a continuous series of dots.

"I don't know, Mordecai. I think there's something here."

"I am in no mood for sarcasm."

"You never are, but on a serious note," Sorun said, turning the paper over for Mordecai to see, "this is literally nothing. What are you complaining about?"

"Aside from the fact the task of unraveling this inextricably tangled mess before us falls to me while the nigh-inexhaustible processing machine continues to add to my growing woes?" Mordecai rose a four-fingered hand up to adjust the spectacles he wore. "I actually did have to process garbled gibberish for a time once the anesthetics took effect before they suddenly stopped. Would there be a particular reason for that?"

"Fuse to the hypothalamus burned out," Sorun answered.

"Of course it did. It seems to happen whenever one of these 'episodes' happen." Mordecai glanced down at his desk. All the paper there made some of the muscles in his face twitch, and he almost moved to brush it all aside before he sighed, seemingly gave up the prospect, and took his glasses off to wipe them off with a handkerchief. "I would also like to submit my third request for you to snap your fingers and make it so that I am no longer reliant on corrective lenses."

"That wouldn't be accurate to the character."

"I see. In that case please note that my appreciation for your unceasing and unwavering devotion towards accurate portrayals of fictional characters is still wholly absent." He placed the glasses back on his face and looked back at Sorun. "As an aside I've a right to take umbrage with my given task. Every time Sorun has a thought that he wants to translate into physical speech I have to read and approve the requests. All the requests. And I certainly don't need to remind you of the indolent and contraction-filled lingo that makes him sound akin to a street corner hoodlum, do I? It's especially vexing considering we all know for a fact he could use grammar that makes him sound like a civilized man and yet I'm forced to sift through this dreck."

Sorun rubbed at the back of his neck as Mordecai glared at him. "Yeah, I've been trying to ease him back into the habit of using the fancy words, but he's still not a hundred percent comfortable living on Mobius," he said. "It's hard for him, you know that."

"I don't care. MY stomach turns every time I'm forced to process a new iteration of the word 'ain't'." He actually shuddered in his seat, shaking his head in an attempt to do away with a bad memory as his eyes drifted over to a window. "More importantly I feel this is work that could be handled by others while my talents could be utilized elsewhere."

"Oh, here we go again," Sorun muttered out with a shake of his head. "For the last time I'm not transferring you over to the parietal lobe-"

"Why not?" Mordecai snapped out in frustration. "This position is barely a step above blue-collar labor, and anyone could do it. Meanwhile the position of managing the section of the brain that handles math and equations is manned by an unqualified, incompetent-"

"Neco-Arc does a WONDERFUL job of handling Sorun's math, you are just JEALOUS you didn't get the position!" Sorun shouted while pointing an accusing finger at the cat man.

"She can barely juggle numbers together in her head, let alone mentally formulate the simplest and most mundane of equations! Meanwhile you have someone with actual mathematical talent on staff and yet-"

"Gimme the quadratic equation."

Mordecai faltered. The argument he was about to make died in his throat and he blinked in confusion. "Pardon?"

"The quadratic equation man, come on, it's super easy," Sorun said. "Math afficionado guy like you will get in a snap, come on, give it to me Mr. Math Man McGee."

"I-I don't..." Mordecai slowly exhaled. He rose one his four-fingered hands to adjust his tie and said in a slow, even tone, "I don't see how me failing to memorize a single, obscure equation is in any way an accurate indicator of my mathematical ability."

"Obscure? It's a basic formula used in algebra." Sorun grinned again and rose a hand up. "But alright, alright, maybe that was mean of me, I came in too hot with a hard question like that, so I'll give you a simple one. The Pythagorean Theorem. Give it to me."

Mordecai stared. He stared at Sorun with an indignant expression and refused to so much as open his mouth.

"The Pythagorean Theorem, Mordecai, come on, they teach it in middle school geometry. Easiest equation in the world. Hit me with it."

"... I don't know it," Mordecai bitterly admitted.

"No, you don't, and you know why?" Sorun tapped at the side of his head. "Because you're a cognition based on the memory of a character Sorun read in a webcomic a few years ago. You're not the actual character. You're a scrap of memory I wove together and gave autonomy to so you could run this place while I was living up on the surface, which means you only know as much math as I know, and I only know as much math as Sorun knows, and Sorun doesn't know what the Pythagorean Theorem is because he forgot that shit MINUTE ONE after graduating middle school!" He let his hand drop back to his side with a short breath. "I'm not saying this to put you down, I'm saying this so you realize everyone in this place, including you, is equally bad at math. So it really doesn't matter who I put in charge of the math center."

"She sets fire to the building on a bi-daily basis," Mordecai dryly informed him.

"She used to," Sorun corrected, "which is why I made Cait Sith the safety inspector. Place hasn't been on fire since. He's been doing a really nice job."

"Yes. He is. In the parietal lobe." The cat man gave Sorun a pointed look. "So well, in fact, he's solely preoccupied putting out fires in the parietal lobe while the rest of the subconscious falls apart at the seams. I'm assuming the bits of detritus that no doubt fell on your head while ascending the front stairs to the building was a good enough sign as to the state of things down here?"

Those outer walls had been pretty crumbly. It'd took him a couple minutes to shake off all the dust and bits of rock in the lobby. Sorun hoped Mordecai wouldn't notice the mess he made. "I'm working on it, Mordecai, okay?" Sorun sighed out. "We just need to make it past this surgery and we're golden. Little bit more patience, 's all I'm asking. Morgana can put out all the other fires meanwhile."

"Ah yes. Morgana. Whom you put in the managerial position." He sneered at the mere mention of the other cat's name, scorn clear in his voice. "I fail to see what he did to deserve that position."

"He was the only cognition I trusted to have the responsibility needed to carry the position out."

"And I'm not?" Mordecai sounded offended. "I'm not responsible?"

"... I mean arguably more so but-"

"Then why -?"

"Because you're the only one I trusted to do this job," Sorun impatiently interrupted. "Okay? Sorun may be terrible at math but he's great at grammar, as much as he refuses to admit to anyone despite how hard I've been pushing. And that kind of translated into you since that was a part of your character's thing, hell, he admired you for it, it's one of the only reasons the memory was strong enough for me to actually make you," he explained. "So I needed you to organize all the vocabulary in his thought cabinet and sort out his grammar, and honestly, Mordecai, this is one of the only places I've seen that isn't on the verge of collapsing. You're doing such a good job that Sorun over in reality still has completely coherent speech and by god has that been a big help. So I need you here. Like, I really need you here to keep doing what you're doing because you're the best person for the job and I need someone to keep this place running until I can come back and just do it all myself."

"... Yes, well..." Mordecai's demeanor didn't outright shift , Sorun wasn't sure he was capable of wiping that scowl off his face, but he did sit up a bit straighter in his seat and his voice did take on a lighter tone. That had to mean something. "I suppose, given the circumstances, that can be an understandable explanation. Resource allocation can be a difficult job and I don't think you've done an outright terrible job-"

"Also Morgana's position requires him to talk to everyone and he's more approachable than you," Sorun continued. "You're a wet dishrag. No one likes you."

"The opportunity to end it on a high note was there. You let it slip between your fingers on purpose just to spite me." He glanced down at his desk. During the duration of the conversation its surface had become overladen with more paper, making Mordecai's ears flatten down. "Why did you come here to begin with? Did you need me for some particular reason?"

"Oh, right. That. Yeah, the biometric locks Morgana put in are queued into your signature this rotation and I need your help to get into the hypothalamus to swap the fuse out."

"Ah, of course. The infamous security system. I should have known." Mordecai sat up from his seat and carefully pushed his chair in. Sorun noticed he was making a rather concerted effort not to look at the desk that was slowly being buried by paper. "As it happens I'm of the opinion that a diversion is in order and wouldn't be opposed helping with a small errand."

"Oh yeah, sure, 'course. Work'll still be here when you get back, right?"

Mordecai's eyes narrowed. "Yes," he breathed out, taking a few moments to painfully exhale. It was a sound akin to a man breathing his soul out. "Let's go."

"I've enough on my plate, Sorun. You're cleaning the lobby once this is done."

He'd noticed all the dirt Sorun had dragged in. It was going bad. "I will, I will..."

"Honestly, I'm overburdened enough without having to clean up after you. I already keep my workspace spotless and the least you could do is respect that by not tracking filth in through the door," Mordecai continued as the two descended the steps to the building. Ironically the discussion was making the cat man more animated than Sorun had ever seen him, and part of him was fascinated with the display he was witnessing as a result. "I don't think it's that much to ask for: mutual respect and consideration for peers."

Peers was stretching it given their relationship, but Sorun would let it slide. "I already said I'm sorry and I'd take care of it, man, what more do you want from me?"

"Much. But I won't waste my breath." They'd reached the bottom of the stairs. In front of them was Kasha's sedan, flaming skeleton wheels and all, and upon noticing the vehicle Mordecai's face wrinkled in displeasure. "We're to use her services as transportation then...?"

"Hey, Kasha's the best driver down here," Sorun said. By virtue of Sorun having little to no driving skills, but he didn't think Mordecai would appreciate that little factoid. "Also Niko's in the car so could you calm it down with all the snipes?"

Mordecai looked towards him with a flat expression. Really his normal expression. "I've better things to do than insult children."

"Yeah, but Morgana's in the car, too."

" Ah ." Now he seemed to understand. One of his hears flicked and his black and white tail swished behind him as if irritated. "That's a considerably more difficult task."

"Ugh, man, look I know you don't like kids, and I can sympathize, but can you just cool it for an hour? One hour? That's all I'm asking for."

With a hum of consideration, Mordecai looked back towards the car. "I'm willing to acquiesce provided you convey to our driver she's to act with some modicum of care behind the wheel while transporting us," he said after a moment of thought.

"She knows, Mordecai, she knows. It's why she has the stick shift set on the 'fast' setting."

Another ear flick. "That doesn't fill me with as much confidence as your tone suggests you think it does."

"Look, just wear a seatbelt and you'll be fine. C'mon." Sorun turned back to the car and made to approach it. He'd made it three steps, and then paused when he realized he didn't hear the clack of Mordecai's loafers striking the concrete next to him. He turned and saw that the cat man was still staring towards the sedan, but now with narrowed eyes. He looked like he was trying to puzzle something out.

"Sorun," Mordecai began. His head turned towards Sorun, and suddenly his didn't look so pleased by something. "Where does Kasha come from? Her memory, I mean. What character is she based on?"

Sorun perked up before answering. "Oh, she's a boss from 'Nioh 2', which in itself was based off Japanese folklore. The game took place in Sengoku Period Japan so it really leaned into yokai folklore for enemy design. The game itself was a hit, one of Team Ninja's best products they ever produced with a combat system that revolutionized the entire genre with its intricacies that nobody else was ever quite able to replicate-"

"I couldn't care less about the extraneous details," Mordecai interrupted. "I'm interested in why a character from the Sengoku Period is driving a sedan. I didn't realize the Japanese were so advanced they'd manage to invent automobiles in the 1500's."

The accusatory tone he'd suddenly taken had forced a grimace upon Sorun's face. "I, uh... well I had to give her something to drive people around in because two big wooden wheels weren't gonna cut it."

"I see." Mordecai adjusted his spectacles as a frown settled on his face. "So what you mean to say is you breached the integrity of the character by giving her a vehicle."

"I took a few artistic liberties, so what?" Sorun defended.

"Artistic liberties!? I'm condemned to congenital eye defects because of your insistence on preserving the image of the characters you based us cognitions on, but you'll freely hand Kasha a vehicle without so much as a care in the world! I demand an explanation for why she gets your 'artistic liberties' but I do not!"

So he'd been caught. Sorun really did think he'd be able to keep it up longer than this, but the jig had to end sometime down the line. He sighed out and rubbed the back of his head while thinking on how to smooth this over with Mordecai, and shortly thereafter realized he couldn't. So instead he asked, "Okay, you want the honest truth, Mordecai?"

"I quite literally just asked for that exact thing, yes," Mordecai dryly responded.

"Yeah, I guess you did." Long time coming, he supposed. With a completely straight face, Sorun admitted, "I just like to mess around with ya."

Oh, he didn't like that answer. No, Mordecai looked very displeased by that answer. In fact this was probably what an angered Mordecai looked like. The fur on his tail was standing up on end and his face was so angered that his lips were peeling back, exposing his fangs. And his eyes. They were widened to the point the lids were quivering and the pupils were extremely narrowed.

"I'm partially blind and that's funny to you ?" he hissed out. "Do you know what life is like being dependent on these cumbersome things on my face?" he continued, pointing at the glasses.

Okay... maybe he had a point. Because now Sorun felt bad, especially with that look Mordecai was giving him. And in hindsight maybe keeping a man crippled for laughs wasn't his... no, yeah, running that statement back he just now realized how horrible it was this thing he'd been doing. "Alright, fine. It wasn't tasteful, my bad," Sorun said, snapping his fingers, "but I still want you to wear the glasses around me. Consider it a work uniform."

Mordecai blinked. That furious expression went away in a flash and he'd blinked a few more times. And then he removed his glasses and glanced around, blinking even more. "... I'm not thanking you for undoing a mistake," he finally said, replacing the glasses back on his face as he regarded Sorun with his usual scowl. If anything at all had changed he wasn't showing it.

"Yeah, that's fair." Honestly it was a way better reaction than Sorun was hoping for, if a bit anticlimactic for how quickly Mordecai just accepted his new reality. But honestly, with him Sorun couldn't be too surprised. "C'mon, car's right there."

Wordlessly, Mordecai marched right alongside Sorun until they'd reached the actual car. From there their paths diverged: Sorun went over to the side of the car to get into the passenger seat while Mordecai situated himself in the backseat with the other two. When Sorun had sat down and - after making sure to buckle his seatbelt this time - closed the door, he looked in the backseat and immediately noticed the tense atmosphere back there. Niko was looking the exact opposite direction of Mordecai, Morgana had his arms crossed and was glaring at Mordecai, and Mordecai was glancing at Morgana through the corner of his own eyes. Kasha was keeping to herself and already pulled out onto the road, though her claws were nervously tapping at the steering wheel.

"Mordecai," Morgana greeted. His tone was cold and didn't at all sound inviting.

"Diminutive mascot," Mordecai greeted back in a bored voice before looking ahead. The greeting made Morgana growl in anger.

"Hey, what'd I say?" Sorun snapped, looking back at the both of them and pointing. "Quit it, both of ya. I'll take Niko out with me have Kasha turn the stick shift up to max with you two in here, I swear I'll do it. We're gonna have a nice, smooth drive over to the memory banks without any arguments or insults or anything."

The threat seemed to have some effect, as both black and white cats instantly snapped their eyes forwards without saying another word. Sorun continued to stare at them for a few seconds, and then pointed at his eyes with both fingers, and then used those same fingers to point at the two cats before finally moving back into facing forwards in his seat. He glanced to the side and saw Kasha looking at him, with her hand on the stick shift.

He considered it. Genuinely considered it just to mess with Mordecai and Morgana. But Niko was there, too, and he couldn't do that to them, so he mouthed a "no" to her.

Kasha made a grumpy pout and faced back towards the road.

"Alright, we made it to the memory banks," Sorun sighed out in relief. Honestly a miracle considering they'd managed the whole trip without anyone saying a word between each other, but that may have been more because he pretty much threatened them. Mordecai in particular had been unusually still the whole time, and even during the elevator ride and the short walk here they'd been silent.

He had a feeling it wasn't gonna last, though, because now that they'd finally made it here the real work began. Before them was a metal door that simply read, "Memory Banks". He turned back to the three behind him; Kasha had driven off after dropping them off to do whatever she did in her spare time. Thrill riding, most likely.

"Okay, so due to events completely outside my control the main door to the hypothalamus is locked so we gotta cut through the memory banks," Sorun explained. Morgana rolled his eyes with Mordecai glancing at him in confusion out of the corner of his eyes. Niko merely gave an enthusiastic nod. "Shouldn't be too difficult."

"If I may, I've never been to this portion of the mind before," Mordecai interjected. "What should we expect to find inside?"

"Oh, it's a giant labyrinth of filing cabinets," Sorun said. "That'd be bad enough usually but due to the neural structure of the human mind the layout of that place constantly changes. I tried making a map one time but gave up. Fortunately there's a service hatch we can take to circumvent all that."

Morgana hissed. "Ah... yeah..."

"I love these sounds you're making, Morgana, they're certainly not filling me with a sense of dread and anger," Sorun said in a chipper tone as he turned to Morgana.

"Uh..." Bobbing his head, Morgana slowly began to look down as he mumbled out, "we don't... have that service hatch anymore. I took it out."

Sorun laughed. "Nah, you wouldn't do that, Morgana. Not with so many things at stake. Things important to you. All hinging on the fact you didn't that the service way out. There's no way."

"Sorun-"

"No no no no, I don't think you're understanding how much you're putting on the line with this-"

"It was a security risk!" Morgana shouted, looking back up at Sorun. "Half the reason that place is a maze is to make it so intruders can't find what they're looking for and to make it so they can't navigate it to other sections and the service hatch made that redundant, so I took it out!"

Okay, so he wasn't joking. He really did remove the shortcut Sorun put in. Exhaling roughly through his nose, Sorun did his best to quell the growing anger he felt while mentally reminding himself Niko was standing right there. Rubbing at the bridge of his nose, he muttered, "With every word Mordecai comes closer and closer to taking your job, Morgana, I hope you know that."

"Do you mean that?" Mordecai asked, ears perked up. "After everything you said at Wernicke's?"

"The thought's crossed my mind," Sorun grumbled. "Ugh... fine. Fine! We'll just-" he threw his arms up, "-cross the maze! They're my memories, too, so I'm probably the only one who can." He spun around and walked towards Niko, and then crouched down so they could meet at eye-level. "Niko, uh, this next part's gonna be a pain and I think you've gone through enough, so why don't you just hand my the fuse and I'll take care of everything from here. Take the rest of the day off. Go get some ice cream."

"Oh, uh... okay. If you're sure." Hesitantly, Niko handed the lightbulb to Sorun, and then stepped back a bit while adjusting their hat. "Are you sure everything's gonna be fine? You know," they continued, eyes darting towards the two cats standing nearby, "with them?"

"... Hey, don't worry about it." Sorun patted the child on the shoulder. "Just go enjoy the rest of your day while I fix everything. I promise it'll all turn out fine."

"Well... okay! If you're sure!" A big smile broke out on Niko's face as they whirled around to wave at the other two. "By, Mr. Morgana! Bye, Mr. Mordecai! Please get along while I'm gone!"

Neither of them made so much of a sound as the cat child ran between the two of them and scampered off behind the corner. They didn't even turn to look at him go. They just stared at Sorun with blank expressions. As soon as Niko was out of earshot Morgana was the first to speak.

"Okay, so can I go, too? 'Cause you only need Mordecai for this and-"

"Oh hell no, it's your fault we're on this carousel of madness, you get to suffer along with us," Sorun bitterly exclaimed, shooting him a sharp glare. It caused Morgana to make a resigned sigh and hang his shoulders. "Now," Sorun continued, spinning around to the door, "let's get going before I act on my desire to turn Morgana into a plush toy and give him to Niko to play with. Or Kasha to strap to the front of her car."

"Is this going to take long?" Mordecai asked, utterly ignoring the way Morgana froze up and how his tail completely straightened out. "I have work quite literally piling up as we speak."

"I don't imagine so, no."

---

5 hours later

"You lied."

"In my defense it was a statement made in ignorance." Sorun's head thumped against the metal cabinet wall he was sitting against. He breathed out and made an exhausted sound, because at this point the drain was starting to feel real. Mordecai was sitting across from him in a similar position and in a similarly disheveled state. "I thought it'd be easy."

"Well, it wasn't," Mordecai stated matter-of-factly. There was a bitterness to his tone that was hard to miss, but at this point Sorun just didn't care enough to acknowledge it. "I suppose in some twisted point of view this is a fortunate turn of events. By now I won't even be able to enter the room it'll be so overflowing with paper. You've rendered me incapable of doing my job."

"Just burn all the paper. It's not like Sorun's gonna be up for a while, anyway, he ain't talking," Sorun suggested. "I wouldn't have even noticed if you'd slacked off and not did anything, Mordecai, I don't see why you're so insistent on this. Just don't do the job when it doesn't matter."

"It's because I have professional integrity, something I would hope Sorun's conscience would hold but am continually seeing evidence to the contrary."

"Hey, I do a great job."

"This isn't a great job." Mordecai scoffed and turned his head up at Sorun. "This is a woeful display of incompetence that has lead to the deterioration of Sorun's subconscious, not in the least bit due to your failure to properly allocate personnel to their proper stations. No, sir, this is not at all a 'great job'. This is mismanagement at its finest. I won't even mention the coma."

"We're still early enough everyone still thinks he's under from the drugs. For how long it's been they're probably not even halfway done with his surgery." He was reasonably sure of that, at least, which was why Sorun wasn't overly concerned with how this was going. At the end of the day this was still faster than waiting for the lock he'd locked out to come out of the three-day shutdown, but damn. This was going nowhere fast.

Humming, Sorun glanced around. There wasn't a ceiling to this room. Nor even an end for how far he could see past all the cabinets surrounding them. Just an infinite expanse of black with overhead lights hanging off of nothing illuminating the entire space. The cabinets themselves weren't traditional cabinets. They were continuous cabinets that stretched out into ten meter-high walls that stretched and turned into corridors that turned and terminated at random junctures. A true maze. One they were stuck in.

Idly, Sorun's eyes wandered over the surface of the cabinet Mordecai was leaning against. It was covered in small doors with various labels stuck onto them. Memories. Memories and memories and more memories. Some cabinet doors were bigger than others and some sections of wall were more numerous than others with cabinets. He could see how it was irritating Mordecai, who kept glancing around at the cabinets. The way his mouth would twitch and make his whiskers bob up and down, the way his eyes kept quickly kept glancing around. The sight was practically making him anxious and he'd had to suffer it for hours.

"This organizational system is atrocious. It doesn't even look like there is a system," Mordecai said. "Do you just haphazardly toss memories wherever they may fall and leave it at that? How do you ever find anything?"

"The human mind is a chaotic thing that can't be neatly organized, Mordecai. I do the best with what I got," Sorun said. "Usually navigating this place to pick out individual memories is as easy as a snap but only the main ego Sorun can do that. And with him out I can't borrow that ability like I usually do."

"He can't even come down here and you need him conscious for that?"

"No. I can do it if he's sleeping or unconscious. He is neither of those right now. The dude is out from the drugs." Sorun ran a hand through his hair. Just another struggle in the day of the life of being Sorun's conscience. "But I can kinda... feel my way around. The layout's never static but there is a sort of 'order' to the way all the memories are lined up. Just not the conventional kind of order you know. It's like a loose thread I've been following."

Mordecai's white brows furrowed. "That makes no sense."

"It's not a thing I can put into words, it..." Sorun held his hands up in an attempt to gesticulate some sort of explanation, but then sighed out in failure and let his hands drop. "Look I can feel it out, let's just leave it at that. Broadly. Not clear enough I got a map in my head but it's something, and I'm telling you, we're close."

"You said that an hour ago," Mordecai accused.

"We're close! It's why I had Morgana go and scout ahead! Mostly 'cause he can turn into a car and can do it way faster than us. The exit's right there, I can feel it." Speak of the devil, the sound of a revving engine caused both Sorun and Mordecai to swivel their heads down the corridor they were sitting in the middle of. A black van with blue headlights rolled around the corner and drove right up to them, and then disappeared in a puff of smoke. Morgana appeared out the other side, huffing and puffing and holding his knee with one of his hands. His other hand was holding a cellphone.

"I... I... I actually found it, you guys. Sorun was right. The exit's near," Morgana panted out. Mordecai perked up at hearing this and was already beginning to stand up. Before Sorun could move Morgana held the cellphone out to him. "Also you got a call."

"Hm?" With a curious expression Sorun took the cellphone out of Morgana's hand and turned it over. He immediately grimaced when he saw the call was from the prefrontal cortex. "Ah, boy. Something happening with Pitou?"

Morgana gave an exhausted shrug. "I... I dunno. Sh-she just sounded really distressed."

"Aw, that ain't good. She's one of the more level-headed cognitions." He should be more worried, but with how this day was going Sorun just didn't have it in him. So, bracing for the worst, he held the phone up to his ear. "Hello?"

"WHY ARE ALL THE ALARMS GOING OFF!?" a voice screamed at Sorun from the phone. It was so loud it made him wince and hold the phone away from his ear. "SORUN WHAT'S GOING ON!? THE SYSTEMS ARE ALL HAYWIRE, NOTHING'S LISTENING TO ME!"

"Ah, yeah, uh, Pitou!" Sorun cleared his throat and stood up from his sitting position. "Yeah, it's that surgery thing we talked about. Right about now Sorun's getting his skeleton torn out of him, so a couple of the nerve monitors might be turning red. Just ignore them, it's fine."

"THEY'RE ALL RED! THEY'RE SCREAMING AT ME!"

"Sounds like you got everything covered, Pitou, good work!" Sorun's thumb quickly hit the button to end the call before another reply could come through. He then sighed heavily, clutching the phone while considering everything that happened, and then as calm as he could handed the phone back to Morgana. "It's goin' well over there," he informed him.

"Ah-huh. Yeah." He didn't look like he believed him at all but also didn't care enough to argue. "Can we just go get this over with?"

"Yes. Please," Mordecai chimed in, already walking his way towards the end of the corridor. "I'm liable to do something untoward if we tarry any longer than we already have."

Sorun made a grunt of affirmation and pointed at the end of the hall, gesturing for Morgana to lead the way. Much like the past five hours the trip was uneventful. Mordecai's standards were too high to complain so he just silently smoldered the entire time they walked, once in a while casting an irritated look at the cabinets. Morgana looked too exhausted to argue about anything so he just trudged along. Sorun was in much the same boat as Morgana was with a dash of aggravation mixed in. Could be worse, all things considered, but at the same time Sorun was struggling to see how it could be worse. At least the end was in sight.

The door. It was bulky and metal, but otherwise normal aside from one of Morgana's fancy fucking locks sitting on it. Though nobody outwardly sighed there was indeed a collective sense of relief that passed by the three when they finally came upon the door.

"Hey, look at that, guys. The end. It's in sight," Sorun laugh-groaned. "Few more steps and we're home free."

"Yes, yes, hurrah and all that, now tell me how to work this contraption so I don't have to lay eyes on this organizational nightmare you call your memories for a second longer than necessary," Mordecai demanded, stopping next to Sorun and huffing out in exhaustion as he laid eyes on the door.

Sorun's eyes darted to the side at Mordecai. "Been over this, Mordecai, ain't my fault-"

"I heard you the first time, but the fact remains the dismal state of this... place makes me never want to step foot in here again." A disgusted sneer settled on Mordecai's face as he glanced around at their surroundings. At all the cabinet doors surrounding them. "No uniformity to any of the cabinets, no organizational system for all the labels, alphabetical or otherwise, and I can forgive the fact that the layout evidently remains outside of your control but at the very least-" He stopped dead when he noticed something. There, lying on the ground nearby. There was a cabinet that had been pulled out of the wall and was now lying on the ground. It was empty. "What is that?"

"What's what?"

"That." Mordecai pointed at it. "On the ground there."

Sorun looked to where he was pointing and saw the cabinet. His lips automatically constricted when he saw the "CPR" label on the cabinet. "Uh... the cabinet that contained all of Sorun's CPR skills," he quietly mumbled.

"Why is it on the ground? Why is it empty ?"

"Look, man, you know, uh, reasons." Sorun cleared his throat and turned away. "There's only so much data you can frontload into the short term memory before it can get transferred to long term and a lot was happening that day so some stuff had to be deleted to make room for other stuff. I must've forgot to sweep the cabinet up."

"What was more important than the knowledge to apply cardiopulmonary resuscitation?" Mordecai demanded, whirling back to Sorun with an incredulous expression. "That's a critical safety skill and you just discarded it? For what?"

Sorun pursed his lips. His eyes darted to the wall that cabinet was next to, the wall with the giant cabinet that had the "Warhammer 40k lore" on it, and was desperately hoping Mordecai wouldn't turn around and read the wall. "Mordecai do I honestly seem like the kind of person that would let Sorun trade a genuinely useful life skill for something useless?"

Apparently he did because the very moment Sorun posed that question Mordecai turned back around and looked dead straight at the wall Sorun was really hoping he wouldn't look at. And while Mordecai was squinting his eyes to properly read the label on that wall Sorun was biting his lip, because he was running on blank on how to spin this. Morgana was just hanging back with crossed arms, looking thoroughly unimpressed with what he was seeing.

After a couple seconds Mordecai froze. And then his shoulders hunched up, signaling to Sorun that he'd read the label and wasn't liking what he read. "You're quite serious?" he asked in an icy tone, turning back to Sorun. He looked angry again. "You deemed that frivolous nonsense more important than the ability to potentially save someone's life?"

"I tried to talk him out of it but he ignored me and went on the wiki," Sorun mumbled in defeat.

"And what was your plan for when someone was in desperate need of aid Sorun couldn't provide because he filled his head with fictional refuse!?"

"... Well he just punched him until he got better."

Mordecai's mouth dropped open. His ears folded in disbelief and one of his eyes were twitching. "... Unbelievable. This is gross negligence. Dangerous ineptitude of the highest degree." His features were slowly creeping further into anger as he continued to go off on Sorun. "Need I continue to describe how you're objectively unfit for the position you're in?"

Sorun pocketed one of his hands, the other holding the lightbulb under his arm. His face looked outwardly calm but his eyes were narrowed in Mordecai's direction. "Who are you to tell me that? You're not qualified to judge me."

"What qualifications are needed for me to observe my surroundings to see the world falling apart around us?" Mordecai asked. "That isn't an allegory; the state of the subconscious is at a point it's quite literally breaking apart at the seams. Perhaps more examples are in order? The crumbling sanity of the individual whose head we are all trapped in and inexorably a part of, of which you are charged with preserving, and how you seem to be scrambling to hold it all together to a point you had to hand-craft us cognitions to handle portions of the mind. Meanwhile every one of us were woefully unprepared to fulfill your wildly unreasonable expectations because you can't even handle the simplest-"

"And you would have done a better job?" Sorun interrupted in a cold tone. "If you were in my shoes you would have failed five minutes in. Let me remind you that you're a living memory. A thought. You have your own personality but in terms of skill and ability you're only as good as I am. As Sorun is. Less so, even, since you're a lesser part of the greater whole. You would have done better? If you were in charge of keeping Sorun on the straight and narrow he would have bashed Hope's brains out with that wrench when he was paranoid about being lead into a trap to be experimented on. You know how bad that would have fucked us? It'd have been over for Sorun."

"This doesn't mean a lot coming from the same guy that encouraged Sorun to torture those two spirits back when he died," Morgana piped in from the side, though his tone didn't have all that much energy in it. He was looking down at had a sad expression on his face.

Sorun looked back at him. "It's not my job to make Sorun a good person. It's my job to keep him in one piece. Physically and mentally. And he's not back to the point he can handle things on his own mentally. Not yet. That's why I need to be there to keep him from doing something wrong until this surgery's done and things go back to normal. We have one path left to getting him back to a normal, stable life so I can build his sanity back up again and I..." Sorun looked back at Mordecai. His shoulders sagged. He just felt so tired of this... "I gave you all impossible tasks, I get that. But it was never supposed to be permanent. And at the end of the day Sorun's choices are all his choices. I'm just the voice in his head that runs all the boring background stuff." He took a calming breath, slumping a bit when a wave of exhaustion hit him. "... I just need a little more time, Mordecai. Time and a new fuse for the hypothalamus. "

Mordecai scoffed, but otherwise he held back a rebuke. He looked thoughtful, silently removing his glasses to wipe off the lenses with his handkerchief. Most likely out of habit; he didn't even need them anymore. "Given the dire state of things I suppose your actions have been apropos. We all seem to be under a significant amount of stress. At the very least I'm relieved to see you're not flying by the seat of your pants and have some semblance of a plan in order, albeit a vague one."

Sorun stuck his thumb out over his shoulder. "If you don't wanna admit I'm right and you're wrong then whatever, you do you, but please just open the fucking door already so we can get this done."

"I'd complain about your exorbitant use of expletives but I'd feel it'd be tantamount to talking to a brick wall." He walked past Sorun who grumbled something under his breath and stopped in front of the door. "To reiterate my previous question, how is this done?"

"Just put your palm on the screen and it'll do the rest," Morgana instructed, with Mordecai following along and placing his hand on the palm scanner. Lights shined out of the screen as sensors began scanning the hand's palm. "I really hope we made it, though. It'd be a bummer if we made it all this way only for the lock to have rotated, huh, guys?" Morgana grinned out while making a nervous chuckle.

"Don't even joke about that, Morgana," Sorun hissed. "I swear if that thing blinks red-!"

The screen flashed green and emitted a light beeping sound. With a silent swish! the door opened. Not hesitating for even a moment Sorun stormed right into the room, not even bothering to wait for the other two.

Unlike the last time he'd been here most of the lights in the control room were off. Most of the monitors, too, though there were still some barely flickering to life. Didn't matter. The burnt-out bulb in the center of the room was the only thing that mattered. It shouldn't have proven difficult to unscrew a giant lightbulb to put a new one in, but for Sorun it was proving a more arduous task than expected. The weariness he felt made unscrewing the thing an exhaustive effort. He didn't even bother setting it down. He'd tossed the lightbulb aside and let it shatter on the ground.

Somewhere from behind him Sorun heard Mordecai make a disgruntled hiss at the mess of glass shards littering the floor Sorun had made.

It was fine. He'd clean it. Everything was fine. The new lightbulb was plugged in and glowing. All the lights were coming on. The warmth radiating from the lightbulb wasn't very comforting to Sorun who was practically pressing his body against the bulb but it was fine. It was working. He was fixing it.

"It's gotta work," he mumbled out. "I don't know how much longer we can keep it up. It's gotta work. I gotta fix it, I... fix it. I'm gonna fix it. Everything gonna be fine 'cause I'm gonna fix it. It's fine. It's all fine. I'm gonna fix it."

He heard a few footsteps behind him and suddenly remembered there were two other people with him. Sorun glanced over his shoulders - both of the black and white cats were looking at him. Morgana looked worried and Mordecai looked... something. He wasn't really wearing an expression but one of his eyebrows were rose up at him. Sorun didn't have the energy to guess what that look even meant.

"... Look, guys, I'm gonna be real for a second. You both are the only dependable cognitions I bothered to make so I really need you two to hold the fort down while I'm gone," Sorun said to them. He turned around, groaning as he collapsed against the lightbulb while holding his head. "Just for a little longer. Alright? Please? Until things settle back down on the outside. And then I'll come back and I'll fix it all but... some more time. Just a little bit more time and I can fix everything."

"Y... yeah. Yeah, that's... we can do that," Morgana said after a long moment. He looked up at Mordecai with a pleading look. "And I think we can manage to work together to keep things running for a little bit longer, right ?"

"... We can certainly make a concerted effort," he agreed, no emotion in his tone as he looked back at Sorun. "Provided you're expedient in finishing whatever business you have in reality and returning to your proper duties here. But yes. We'll 'hold the fort down' until you're ready."

Sorun gave them both a shaky thumbs-up. "That's great guys you have no idea how much I needed that reassurance... ugh." He pushed off the lightbulb and rubbed at his forehead. His head hurt. "There's still a few things I wanna go check but afterwards I'm thinking ice cream. That sound any good to you guys? Huh? Ice cream trip? You guys down for an ice cream trip?"

"No."

"No."

"You both suck."

A/N- Man. Sorun was a normal guy at the start of this story. Now his brain's run by cats.

Anyways, look, I'm not explaining myself. I said everything that needed to be said last A/N. Poll's up. That being said pretty much everyone in the reviews seemed supportive of the idea so I got a pretty good guess for how it'll go but I'm going with it anyways. Even if I already made up my mind and I'm just gonna ignore what the poll says anyway in lieu of just doing whatever I want. I just wanna see what it says.

Chapter 102

Recursion Error

Episode 102- Ouch oof my bones

"Aw man it all hurts."

It wasn't an exaggeration - Sorun's body ached. Deeply. The painful result of having most of his bones removed, having all those muscles and tendons be sliced and re-connected to the new ones, and all those nerve endings that had received much the same treatment. The result was a deep ache permeating every inch of his body from the neck down. And this was while he was on the painkillers. He didn't wanna imagine what it would be like without those.

The only bright side to this was that Dimitri assured him this was temporary and eventually the pain would disappear after his body healed and adjusted, but still... it hurt. A lot.

Otherwise... he wasn't really noticing a difference. Felt a bit heavier, maybe, but that was about it. Everything moved right and nothing felt out of place. There was barely even a cosmetic difference. He was looking at his arm now, with the sleeves on his coat and shirt rolled up. The stitching running up his whole arm, the back of his hand, and all his fingers was noticeable, but the hairline surgical scars weren't nearly as bad. He didn't know what the hell kind of surgical wizardry Dimitri pulled off to make it possible, but he did it. All that age was good for something after all apparently. Sure, naked he looked like some kind of patchwork monster with all the stitching covering his whole body but once those were out all the scars would hardly be noticeable.

The artificial blood was... certainly another thing, but they'd hooked a dialysis machine up in his house and sitting in place for a few hours a week wasn't looking like it'd be the worst. He already did that with Nicole whenever they played video games. The fact his blood was white now and it was making his already-pale skin even whiter than it already had been was gonna take a bit longer to get used to than the scars. But he'd deal. Somehow.

"I gotta be the only guy on the planet who has to go through these lengths for a normal-ass life..." Sorun sighed out loud and dropped his arm, and then looked on up ahead. They were in the same desert wasteland Dimitri'd asked to meet up in the first time. In fact the rock Sorun was sitting on right now was the same rock Shadow had sat on. Even the afternoon sun and sky looked the exact same. The only difference was the gathering of six echidna up ahead.

When he'd first saw them Sorun couldn't help it. He'd laughed. How could he not? Calling themselves the Dark Legion was one thing, but when he saw they literally wore black cloaks and hoods to hide their faces he couldn't. He'd laughed and pointed and didn't regret a single second of it despite the sour looks they'd all sent him. Shit was too hilarious.

The sound of scraping sand drew Sorun's attention. Dimitri had floated on up, metal tentacles softly drifting through the sand as he looked towards him. "The cybernetics are holding up okay?" Dimitri asked. "I realize this is quite sudden since you just got out of surgery today, but... well, urgency demanded-"

"It's part of the plan, Dimitri, no need to stress about it," Sorun said. He blinked a bit blearily; he was still fighting off the lingering effects of the anesthetics they'd given him. He remembered there'd been a lot of yelling and protesting from Dr. Quack about him moving about so quickly, but he hadn't heard the argument. It'd been in another room. Didn't stop him from getting dressed and grabbing his Emerald. Was probably gonna get yelled at when he got back. Didn't matter. "And other than the fact it feels like I just hit the ground at terminal velocity I'm just swell. You're a genius with this cyborg stuff."

"Hmf. Well... I'm no Robotnik, but I do what I can." The corners of his mechanical lips turned up and his bubble bobbed upwards a bit in a show of pride.

"Yeah... quick question, though." Sorun's eyes were cast downwards, towards the blue Chaos Emerald resting by his feet. "One of my powers, uh... the one with a regeneration factor. I can't just...?"

"Sorun, we discussed this. Unless you want to regrow your skeleton overtop the artificial one and find out what it's like to have two skeletons inside your body I advise you never use that ability again, do you understand me?" Dimitri asked in a serious tone. That small prideful grin from earlier had vanished. "Even in the best case it would result in massive bodily trauma. Regeneration or no it could kill you."

It probably wouldn't. Devil's Body was made of sterner stuff, but yeah, Sorun wasn't too keen on finding out what it felt like to have a skeleton exploded out of him. "It just messes up some plans I had is all," Sorun mumbled out.

"Plans?"

"Personal matter. Forget it." Sorun glanced over at the six robed echidna. "Gonna go save those goobers now."

Dimitri frowned. "I'd prefer you not refer to them in such a derogatory way."

"I will start thinking about it when they stop looking so ridiculous." Sorun bent down and picked up the Emerald. His eyebrows knitted a bit. Before when he finally got control over this power, Yamato came instantly. Automatically, without him having to think about it. Ever since he'd gotten his bones and blood swapped out, though, he had to put effort into manifesting the weapon. Any of his powers, really, and had to maintain a constant focus whereas previously they were just... there. Feeling the Emerald now, though, it all felt more distant. Harder to maintain.

He'd still managed it. The Emerald still dissolved in a cloud of blue particles and electric sparks before reforming into the katana, but it took longer than it used to. It was fine, as far as Sorun cared. Long as it still worked.

Wincing a bit he pressed the tip of the sheathed sword on the ground and used it like a cane to stand up. The pain from the surgery and the brain fog from the drugs were still present and made his footsteps unsteady, but with the aid of the makeshift cane he'd managed to approach the six echidna, albeit with unsteady steps. They'd turned to him, all with hoods that shadowed their faces so that nothing but pairs of yellow eyes were staring at him. Sorun wasn't sure how they were doing that since none of them actually had yellow eyes. He'd seen their faces when he first saw them before they'd hastily rose those hoods up. If it was some kind of technology built into the hoods to make them look intimidating it really wasn't working.

"Okay, ladies, step right up. Doc Sorun's got the cure to all your woes right here," Sorun rattled out, raising Yamato up and lightly shaking it to get the attention of the six echidna. "Come on. Don't be shy. Pain is temporary but being turned into a greasy stain on the ground from a bomb ain't."

One of the echidna broke off from the main group and stepped up. Bit bigger than the rest - wider shoulders and a barreled chest. He spoke out with a deep and baritone voice. "You're the one we're to entrust out lives to-?"

"Sh-sh-sh-sh, just, just lemme... I can't take you serious with this on..." Sorun whispered out, leaning forwards to grab at the echidna's hood. He stiffened up in surprise but otherwise didn't move when Sorun pulled the hood back, only to then whistle when he saw the sight underneath.

With how many echidna faces Sorun had seen, which admittedly were few and far, this one's face didn't stand out all that much. Grizzled, maybe, from that hard expression he was giving Sorun, but otherwise normal. Except for the fact he had a metal jaw. With spiky teeth of all things. It was the teeth in particular that had Sorun grinning.

"Oh, wow." He tapped the echidna's cyborg jaw with the buttcap of Yamato's handle. It made a sharp tink! tink! sound and made the echidna grimace. "Ya got that Auto-Chomp 9000, huh?"

"Stop invading my personal space," the echidna demanded, gruffly. Sorun pulled the sword back but didn't step back from him. "And I don't appreciate your mocking tone."

"I mean between the robe and teeth, man, it's really hard-"

"Cease. Now." Sorun did so, pulling his head back a bit and blinking. "Your deal with Dimitri was to remove these bombs from us, so hurry and do so. And I expect an apology."

The grin Sorun was wearing dropped. "Was just jokin' around, man. Can't take a joke?"

"I'm not interested in jokes. I'm interested in not having a bomb inside of me," the echidna rumbled out. He had a few inches in height over Sorun and loomed over him, eyes that were green and not at all yellow bearing down on him. The other five echidna shuffled back and Dimitri was staring off at them with a worried expression. "You have a task set about before you, human . I expect you to get on with it and then get back to whatever worthless life you were living."

A calm breeze passed between the pair of them. Sorun at first didn't say anything. What he did do was look back at Dimitri with a raised eyebrow, who only shrugged a few of his tentacles in response. It made Sorun roll his eyes. "This is who I have to go out of my way to save, huh?" he thought, crouching down next to the echidna's feet.

He shouldn't have expected much from terrorists, but fuck, he just wanted to share a few laughs. Why'd he have to go and put Sorun in a bad mood over such a little thing?

The voice in Sorun's head was telling him what he was planning on doing in the next few seconds was a bad idea but he ignored him. He didn't feel like letting it slide.

"Well as far as first impressions go you fumbled it pretty hard," Sorun mumbled out, staring down at the ground. He unsheathed his sword and began idly poking at the ground with the tip of his sword. "Can't be a little nice to the guy that's saving your life? You really had to be such a dick over this?"

The echidna scoffed. "You're doing this out of obligation, not out of some moral decree. Not that I'd expect anything less from one of your kind- AAAUGH!"

Most people would scream if somebody stabbed a sword through their foot, so when Sorun plunged Yamato right through the middle of the echidna's foot he couldn't be too surprised he screamed. Pretty high voice, too, higher than the one he'd been using previously. It was a bit funny to Sorun's ears. The other him he was seeing out of the corner of his eye, the other Sorun standing off to the side, didn't look as amused as he felt.

"Are you fucking serious!? Why!?" Sorun screamed, gesturing out towards Sorun.

"Sh-sh-sh, hey, relax. Just relax man. It's fine," Sorun thought to him. It didn't do much to reassure Sorun, who just threw his arms and stomped out of view, grumbling angrily under his breath. Sorun watched him go and shrugged, glancing over at the other five echidna. They'd all stepped back, yellow eyes under their hoods dramatically wide. The one he was stabbing was still screaming.

"Sorun, what are you doing!?" Dimitri yelled, gliding over to their position with a panicked face. "This wasn't the deal, you said-!"

"Can only separate things I stab with the sword, Dimitri. Mere contact or even shallow cuts won't work." It was a total lie. He'd done such a thing in the past and was prepared to do that exact same thing here but then ol' Iron Jaw here had to talk shit and get hit. "I don't know echidna anatomy that well and didn't wanna stab anything important, so I went with his foot."

"That...!" Dimitri stopped himself, sighing in resignation. He turned towards the echidna Sorun was stabbing who was bent over now, holding the leg with the wounded foot while making ragged breaths and letting out pained whimpers. A pained look crossed Dimitri's face and he looked back at Sorun. "You might have said so previously... please just make this quick."

"Sure." Blue energy, like a fine vapor, began to coalesce down the length of the blade. It was a harder process than it had been previously in the past, back when it almost came naturally to Sorun and took him a few seconds longer as a result, but he'd managed it all the same. Fueled by his desire it'd only taken a few more seconds for the sword to find what he was seeking. "Theeere it is..."

With a sharp yank Sorun pulled the sword out of the echidna's foot. With it came a spurt of blood, a pained shout from the echidna, and a small flash of light emanating from the wound followed by a small object flying out from the light. It was a metal, spherical device with various wires sticking out of it and Eggman's atrocious, grinning logo plastered onto the front.

The logo alone was enough for Sorun's mouth to form a hard frown and for him to swipe out with the sword. When the bomb hit the ground it had been split into two pieces. Some of the nearby echidna jolted in panic and one had even gone as far as to duck for cover and shield their head with their hands, but it didn't result in anything. The bomb didn't go off. It was destroyed.

"Ah. Prudent of you," Dimitri commended. "I wouldn't put it past Robotnik to have put pressure and temperature gauges in the device to react to sudden shifts in the environment. It might have gone off just from being exposed to outside air alone. Smart thinking."

"My thoughts exactly," Sorun lied. He hadn't thought about any of that at all. He'd only cut the bomb because he saw the logo and grew angry it its mere sight, but if Dimitri approved, he'd milk it. Might get him to forget about the foot thing. Speaking of which... "Hey, no hard feelings, big guy," he said, standing up and mockingly patting the echidna on the back, though from an outside appearance the gesture appeared genuine. All he'd gotten from the echidna in response was a shaky nod and a pained exhale, which convinced Sorun to move on to the next hooded echidna. They stood stock still, rigid as a statue as Sorun stopped in front of them. "So..." he began, brandishing his sword.

"Urm... uh, yeah..." A loud gulp was heard from the hooded echidna, and Sorun found himself blinking in surprise. The nasally voice he heard was a stark contrast to the voice of the guy he'd just stabbed. He sounded as old as Sorun. "Do... do you really have to stab me with that?" he asked. "You can't... just stab this...?"

The echidna held out his hand; the sleeve on his robe had been rolled up to give Sorun a good view of the arm. It was a cybernetic prosthetic, all the way up to the shoulder. Sorun couldn't help but grimace at how... rough it looked. He'd expected a cybernetic arm like the one Bunnie had: an arm that was shaped to mirror the real arm she had and was all neat and smooth. This wasn't that. This was a skeletal frame of metal with a square palm and sharpened claws for fingers. All function and no care to its form. Utilitarian. It was ugly.

"It'd probably work... but metal doesn't heal. Will you be able to get it fixed at Albion?" Sorun asked, because he genuinely didn't know what things were like there. The foot was one thing, that'd heal, but with how this arm looked it honestly looked like one stab even to the palm would just outright destroy it.

"Pr... probably not," the echidna stammered out. "It's fine. I-I don't care, just-"

Sorun stabbed at the hand's palm, making the echidna shout and jump a bit from fright. There was a metallic screech as the sword pierced through the cybernetic hand, and much like the first time after a small application of the sword's power another bomb was lying on the ground, split in half. The echidna he'd just cut it out of had backed up a bit, holding the wrist of his cybernetic hand and making a sad sigh. A few electrical sparks flew out from the slit in his palm and two of the hand's fingers weren't flexing with the rest.

"..." Well, he had warned him. Sorun turned to the third echidna, just as visually indistinct as the rest because of the robes they wore. "Alright, you're next," he said. "You got a robo-leg or something you want me to-?"

"Shoulder's fine," she grunted out, turning her head to the side. "I don't need any of my parts getting crippled. Just give me a wound that'll get better on its own."

"Suit yourself." Sorun obliged and jabbed her in the shoulder. The echidna hissed out in pain but otherwise stood still the entire process, and soon enough there were three halved bombs on the ground. "Next."

The rest of the "procedures", for lack of a more polite way to phrase Sorun stabbing people with a sword to cut bombs out of them, went about the same. Half the echidna wanted him to stab them in organic parts to heal later and the other half weren't partial enough to their cybernetics to mind him just stabbing those instead. Small talk had been scarce. If they cared about Sorun at all beyond the fact he was saving their lives they didn't show it, but seeing as they'd aligned themselves with a evil techno fetishist cult Sorun wasn't all that sure any of them would have much interesting things to say anyways. It was fine with him at the end of the day. He just wanted this day to be over already.

"This is the place?" Sorun asked, looking down at the slip of paper that'd been handed to him by Dimitri. The supposed coordinates for Albion. "The final last bastion of the echidna race no for real this time?"

A withering sigh left Dimitri, coming out as an electronic rattle. "Sorun..."

"Just let me have my fun." He pocket the slip of paper, intent on burning it later as he turned to the six echidna. Those who could still move nominally were offering a shoulder to those who were a bit too wounded at the moment to move as well. Most notably the one whose foot Sorun stabbed. "Alright, so, uh," Sorun began, calling out to the six, "gonna open the portal to Albion now. Follow me and don't deviate from the path. I mean it."

One of the echidna, the one whose robot hand he'd stabbed, rose his flesh hand. "Wh-what happens if we do?"

Nothing. There was just the path and nothing else. There wasn't any way to deviate except to backtrack. "Lost between the seams of reality. Doomed to wander the endless ether forever with no hope of rescue," Sorun lied in an ominous tone, letting the following silence set the tone. They all shifted uncomfortably at that, the warning likely stirring memories from the Dark Legion's time trapped in a pocket dimension. That was the reason to lie. Watch 'em squirm a bit to get an amused rise out of Sorun.

Didn't last long, though, and when the mood settled Sorun had cut a blue cross into the air which folded outwards into the portal. Some of the echidna flinched back at the sight, Dimitri stared on in interest like he always did, and Sorun meanwhile was tapping his shoulder with the blunt end of Yamato in impatience as he waited for the shock to settle. "Clock's tickin', let's go," he announced, turning towards the portal. The seven echidna, Dimitri included, all fell in line behind him to follow the Voidborn through the portal. Unusually close, he'd noted, likely because of the bogus warning he'd given them. It brough another bout of amusement in Sorun and made him snort out his nose the slightest bit.

If nothing else he'd at least be coming out of this trip with a few laughs.

"Is it really that important to you?" As the group traipsed through this space of rushing blues and blacks, a tunnel lined in a torrent of rushing energy that provided a window into the infinite expanse of nothing, Sorun glanced to his side to see himself walking besides him. "Dicking around with these echidna for a few chuckles?"

"We're owed solace," Sorun thought to him. After wringer this world had put him through he felt a few laughs was the least he was owed. For crying out loud he was a cyborg now because of it all.

"I'm not denying that, I'm just worried about what this is building up to," Sorun snapped out. "You're still thinking about killing these guys."

"What of it? No one will miss them. And they shot at my friends." He was just supposed to ignore that? After a lifetime of fucking around they just get a second chance for new, clean lives? Everyone was just gonna drop everything they'd done?

Sorun sighed. He pocket his hands, looking ahead towards the end of the tunnel with a forlorn expression. "What do you even get out of it?"

"I don't know. Satisfaction?"

"Followed by problems later on if this comes up again? Gah... you're not even completely sure," Sorun muttered out. "Look, I... just want everything to work out. And this isn't gonna help. These guys are never gonna bother us again. We're never gonna see them again unless you ever plan on coming back to Albion."

"Fat chance."

"Then let bygones be bygones and leave them the fuck alone. They were too incompetent to even land a scar on anyone," Sorun said to Sorun. "We never even fought them. It's not our business. All of this is nothing but a transaction and you wanna renege on it and murder them all for what? So you feel slightly better about yourself?"

"You can stop it with the rigorous self-critique." Sorun looked back over his shoulder and at the group of echidna following him. "Why do I have to keep fighting for another chance at life and they get one handed to them after all the mistakes they made? Why do I have to be the one to give it to them? It's insulting. It's..." It was fucking infuriating, that's what it was. His own life kept being ripped away from him over and over and these terrorists got to have a clean slate just like that? Where was the justice in that?

None. Not really. Sorun was thoroughly convinced justice was a made-up word. Worlds full of people wouldn't die off if it actually did. Mad gods couldn't wipe out whole civilizations with a thought if it did. It wasn't truth. Only truth that did exist were truths people clawed into reality with their own power. The tangible. For as much as "might makes right" sucked as a concept it was a hard reality and countless examples from Earth proved it. Here on this planet Robotnik proved it a hundred times over. The damn aliens that bombed the planet thousands of years ago proved it.

Maybe that was why he wanted to kill them. Out of selfishness more than anything else. If he couldn't get his life straight then they shouldn't, either, and if he killed him the world made the smallest bit more sense.

"You moron, we did get a new chance," Sorun said, staring wide-eyed like he was looking at an idiot. "That chrome skeleton you got rattling around in your meat suit's our second chance." He looked back ahead. "But yeah, shit ain't fair. They got it way easier than we did. I'd say leave it to karma but with how things have shook up in our fucked-up life I'm not convinced karma exists. But it's over, you know? They got a way out. We got a way out. We never gotta think about 'em again." A beat passed and Sorun let a breath out. "Just think about it? Forget about pragmatical repercussions, forget about moral ramifications, forget all that. Just think about what you want."

"... What I want?" When he'd blinked Sorun vanished, leaving Sorun alone with all these echidna he didn't want to be around. It was just in time, too, as the other end of the portal was upon them and nobody had so much as slowed their stride as they all stepped through.

Criminy, but did Albion look awful. From what he knew this place was an island, and looking behind where they'd just come out of there was indeed a rocky shore leading to ocean behind them. And in front of them was a small settlement that didn't have so much as one intact building. Results of a bombing from what Sorun heard, but at the very least if there'd ever been any debris it'd been swept away. He even spotted some local echidna off in the distance milling about, staring off at them. And as Sorun stood rooted to the spot, staring back, the six echidna he'd just saved walked past him, muttering amongst themselves and looking around in wonder.

Yamato's weight was very noticeable in his hand. He knew it wouldn't be hard. He'd lost his green eyes with this new skeleton but the power this sword had alone was enough that he could kill them all before they'd have a chance to do anything about it. He rose the sword up a bit, glancing down at in in contemplation. He could. He could really do it.

"What do I want?" He wanted people to leave him the hell alone so he could just live his life. He wanted a life, period. And... he had that now. Despite it all, despite how hard this entire multiverse worked to make Sorun's life hell, he'd clawed out a life. What did he want above all? He wanted his friends to be safe and these echidna weren't a danger to them anymore. He wanted more dates with Nicole and he didn't want that relationship jeopardized if news of him murdering these people over selfish reasons ever got back. He wanted to live his life normally without having to worry about a stupid thing like that hanging over his head, wondering when it'd come to bite him.

He didn't want to ruin people's lives just to make himself feel a bit better.

... He didn't wanna break his word with Dimitri because Sorun had kind of grown to like him and he'd feel like shit if he did that.

"I... don't have to do this." Sorun lowered the sword. Fine. Fuck it. Everybody got a happy ending. He swiftly turned around to Dimitri, who was hovering near the entrance to the portal they'd just walked through. Sorun stepped right next to him and said in a low murmur, "The deal was only for me to get them here, so they'll have to hash things out with the locals. I don't wanna stay any longer than necessary. I hope that suffices."

"It does," Dimitri confirmed. He sounded relieved, like a weight had just been lifted off his nonexistent shoulders, and- agh, he was smiling at Sorun, he couldn't bear to see that. "Sorun, thank you. Truly."

"Yeah yeah yeah fine whatever let's go," Sorun quickly said, speedwalking his way through the portal. Though he couldn't see it Dimitri's smile had turned into an amused smirk, and he'd followed behind Sorun. The cybernetic head had exited the other side of the portal to once again see the sight of the desert wasteland around them, with Sorun sealing the portal shut with a swipe of his sword.

Huffing, Sorun slammed the sword back into its scabbard. Damn Dimitri. Damn smile. He was wrong, he shoulda just killed them after all. This embarrassment was too much to bear. He debated ripping the sword back out to cut another portal so he could abruptly leave Dimitri in the dust, and had even made the motion to do so, but before he could draw the sword free the echidna had to open his mouth again.

"Sorun, before you go. There's something I wanted to ask of you."

"What, more? We barely survived this deal and you want-?" Sorun stopped himself when he looked back at Dimitri. The smile was gone, serious expression in place. "What is this?" he asked, fingers tightening around the sword's handle.

"Not what you might be thinking. A request, a selfish one, admittedly, and yet I..." Dimitri trailed off, sighing. His mechanical tentacles were limply sweeping at the ground. "You kept your word, and after seeing that you can save my people from the bombs, I-"

"Dimitri-"

"I don't want my people going with Snively to Yurashia to that woman," he said. There was a pleading edge to his voice Sorun was dreading to hear. "The technomancer woman I told you about, Regina, she... she may not be as insane or maniacal as Robotnik is, Sorun, but mark my words her thirst for control and power is just as insatiable. I worry for what plans she has for my people, if she'll even be able to help with the bombs the way you can help, and I..."

"Want me to save 'em instead," Sorun finished in a hollow voice. Because he was the more reliable alternative. Because he wasn't a mad tyrant or whatever the hell this Regina woman was. Because they'd built a modicum of trust between them. The solemn look Dimitri held only confirmed it. "You're askin' a lot."

"I know I am, but between you and her I would rather leave the fate of my people in your hands," Dimitri said. "I-it isn't too late. I can tell them your solution works, they may choose not to-"

"May? They 'may' choose not to go to Yurashia?" Sorun repeated. "What, some of them want to go overseas to the conquering magic tech lady?"

Dimitri grit his teeth, shame flashing across his features. "Some would consider it an opportunity to strengthen to Legion. For a large majority the bombs aren't even a matter of consideration."

Oh, for fuck's sake. "Okay, look," Sorun said, already making his mind up right then and there, "don't get me wrong, I think you're okay, Dimitri, but I'm not going to bat for a bunch of terrorists. 'Specially not for free."

Dimitri's head floated back a bit, tentacles flailing a bit in panic. His voice took on a desperate tone. "But-!"

"You're not even making it sound like they would want my help," Sorun said, and any argument Dimitri was prepared to say died right there as he started to look more and more resigned. "I get they're your people and all but only six outta the whole bunch actually tried getting out. You yourself made them look like fanatics, and where I'm standing, well..." Sorun shrugged. "I don't want to go out of my way for people like that. Made an exception this time 'cause they asked and I needed the help but not again. I'm done."

"..." The desperation left as understanding settled in Dimitri, making him rattle off a breath. The tentacles jutting out of his bubble went limp as he hollowly mumbled out, "So that's it, then? They're to be left in her hands?"

"Dimitri, I'm gonna be real with you. This Regina lady? She doesn't even live on the same continent I do. I don't really care about what she's doing in her spare time. And since we're being real I'll flat-out say it, I'm not interested in saving your psycho echidna pals. And above all that I'm a package courier. None of this has anything to do with me. Frankly I want this conversation to end so I can get back to that."

"... I understand," Dimitri hesitantly said after a long moment, though his voice was more quiet, now. "That lot hasn't done all that much to garner sympathy. I don't think that puts them out of reach of redemption, but... you're right. I don't have a right to ask so much of you. I just hoped..."

It wouldn't really surprise Sorun is this was some sort of last-ditch effort by Dimitri to try and guilt trip Sorun, but he'd been down this road before and it wouldn't work, even if seeing him in such a pathetic state was wrenching Sorun's heart a bit. But his mind was made up. "It's not happening, Dimitri," he told him.

"Then... I suppose we're done here." A sad sort of look had settled on Dimitri's face. Resigned and sad, though at least he wasn't glaring at Sorun. In fact it barely looked like he was looking at Sorun at all. He had a far away, defeated look in his gaze, for as much could be seen in those mechanical peepers. "I'd like it if you would open a portal to our usual rendezvous spot. I have preparations to make for Robotnik's downfall and our move with Snively."

Sorun did, so, wordlessly unsheathing his sword once more and cutting another portal through the air. Dimitri hadn't wasted a single moment moving towards it, though he'd stopped at the portal's threshold when Sorun cleared his throat.

"Hey, uh... just wanted to say thanks. You know, for the skeleton," Sorun said, voice a bit awkward. He found himself having mixed feelings for how this meeting was ending.

Dimitri didn't so much as turn to address him. "... Take care of yourself, Sorun." And then he'd left, floating through the portal. Sorun waited on the other side for a full minute to make sure he'd made it to the other side before closing it, and he felt so drained afterwards he couldn't even bother to sheath the sword again. Not physically, though the new bones and blood were making the process of using Yamato more intensive. Mentally speaking he just wanted to crawl in bed and sleep the rest of the day and night away. Maybe tomorrow, too. The whole week if he could spin it.

He sighed. As if Honey would give him a week off after intensive surgery.

"Sorry, Dimitri, but at the end of the day this just doesn't have anything to do with me," Sorun thought after the head left. He'd be lying if he told himself he hoped things worked out for the best regarding those echidna, because honestly he just didn't care about them, but he did actually sort of care if things worked out for Dimitri. Hard to not have a little gratitude for the guy that extended his life and his heart was in an... admittedly weird spot regarding the Dark Legion, but Sorun got it. Sort of. Couldn't blame him for trying get Sorun to help more. He hoped he wouldn't hold it against him.

Still... despite it all, despite the absurd lengths he'd gone through... he was done and it was finally in reach. A normal life. In a better world he wouldn't have had to go so far for something he should have had to start with, but hey, it was here now. Not just in reach. He had it . Normal life. He should have felt ecstatic about it but more than anything else he just felt tired. The happiness could come later when it finally sunk in that he'd done it.

"Let's... let's just go home," Sorun muttered out, staring down at the cold blade he was holding. Staring down at his own reflection in the blade. "No more fighting, no more nonsense, no more... no more." He shook his head and cut a cross through the air. "Done with all that. It's over... it's all finally over. I can go back home now."

A/N- Ahhh... you smell that? It's the smell of democracy. The thin veil of democracy draped over the absolute dictatorship that is this profile. It smells like a poll with overly favorable results. Not that it mattered 'cause I was gonna do it anyway, made it blatantly clear I wasn't actually gonna listen to the poll, but it's still nice to see.

Wanna reiterate I'm not evenly splitting attention between the two stories. It's more a 90% and 10% split of attention with 90% focus going to this story. I'm only planning on working on the other one once a week just to shake things up once in a while. Won't affect upload speed here at all. May even drop the story if it ain't working out.

Look what I'm saying is don't worry about it. And with how fast I go first chapter should be up in like five months or something,

I dunno.

Chapter 103

A/N- Domino here comin' in with the stealth patch. So... upon passing a cursory glance over at the comics just to get all my ducks in a row and to make sure I wasn't mixing events up it came to my attention I accidentally mixed up Robotropolis with New Megaopolis. I called the latter the former. In my defense there's, like, four or five something-opolises to keep track of in this world and I haven't taken any written notes since I started this story, I've been running off sheer memory. So I got some wires crossed and I'm sorry for that. I went back a few chapters and fixed it but I honestly wouldn't be surprised if that little mix-up isn't shotgunned around earlier back in the story and I wouldn't even know where to begin fixing that short of scanning over all the chapter files.

So uh... yeah, whoops.

Recursion Error

Episode 103- Corn syrup-based lifeform

"Sorun! I demand thee come out here at once! I would trade words with you!"

The blinds covering the windows to Honey's shop rattled. Fingers pried open a gap, allowing a pair of golden eyes to peer out at the stork Mobian in the green unitard yelling outside her shop. "Sorun, he's back," she said.

A pair of blue eyes settled next to the golden ones. And then there was a sigh. "Ugh, for the- open the window, he wants some words I'll give him words."

The clasp to the window was unlatched and the blinds were risen up. After the window itself was opened Sorun leaned his torso out, facing towards the stork Mobian glaring angrily at him from outside the store while ignoring all the odd looks the nearby passerbys were giving them. "Irv, you nerd, what is it now!?" Sorun yelled out at him.

"You know precisely what it is!" the stork yelled back at him. "I come to you not as Irving but as a representative of the New Mobotropolis Courier's Guild! And we demand you cease poaching work from us at once!"

"Oh, as if! It's called the free market!"

"You already possess a lucrative position working in Honey's shop! you have no reason to be taking potential business opportunities off of our plate for your own gains!"

"Yeah, and what are you gonna do about it!? Jack diddly squat, that's what!" Sorun yelled out, slapping at his own chest. "Ya got nothin' on me! Nothin'! All you got are formal protests I'm never gonna listen to 'cause guess what!? I'm working within the confines of legality!"

"You're a rogue, sir! A dastardly rogue with no respect for your fellow couriers! No respect at all for our trade!"

With a clenched fist shaking in Irv's direction, Sorun yelled out, "It's no use, New Mobotropolis Courier's Guild! I'LL NEVER STOP UNDERCUTTING YOU!" With a huff he ducked back into the shop and closed the window, and then harshly pulled on the nearby string to drop the blinds back down in front of the window. He glanced to the side; Honey was giving him a pointed look with crossed arms.

"Sorun, I'm about ready to file a complaint at the castle over this. Those mail nutjobs are scaring the customers off," she said, tail flicking to the side in agitation.

"Ah. Yes. Of course." Sorun's eyes drifted to the side, towards the other end of the store where Larry was dressing up a mannequin in Honey's latest lineup. A mannequin that was just a headless skeleton held together by metal wiring and rods. "The irate mailman outside is what's scaring people off and not the fact you're making mannequins out of your employees' skeletons."

On the other end of the store, Larry paused in his actions, shirt in hand. His eyes flickered over the display mannequin, and after a few more moments he shouted out in fright, leaping back as the shirt fell from his grasp and fell on the ground. "GAH, what- this is real!?" he screamed, a horrified expression etched on his face as he stared at the skele-quin. "Why!?"

Completely nonplussed by it all, Sorun nodded. "Yeah, Honey wanted to turn my old bones into a mannequin. I had them bleached and gave them to her."

"No, why!?" Larry repeated, this time gesturing towards Honey, who looked equally as nonplussed as Sorun did. "Why would you do this, why!? what could you possibly get out of this!?"

"What do you mean, why?" Honey asked, sounding more confused than anything else. "Look at it. It's an attention-getter. It's the same principle behind the rule of contrasting colors: put some of my merch on a skeleton and the contrast will be so eye-catching that people won't be able to help being appealed by it. It's a solid marketing strategy."

"She needed another mannequin and didn't want to pay for it," Sorun translated, casting a knowing smirk her way. She sent him an irritated pout and turned away in a huff, but the damage was done.

"And that doesn't bother you at all?" Larry incredulously asked, gesturing towards Sorun. "Those were your bones, Sorun. Those were inside you and now Honey's hanging clothes on them."

Sorun shrugged. "Nah, I don't think they mind."

"Oh my gosh, why...?" Larry moaned out, holding his face in his hands.

"Hey, it wasn't like I was doing anything else with them. It was either this or send them off to the school to be used as an educational display model." A dark look overcame Sorun's features. "There's no way I'd ever allow my bones to become a part of an educational institution. They deserve better than that."

"I'm working with crazy people," Larry muttered under his breath. He rubbed at his face and smacked at his cheeks, trying to beat away the concerns. The worries. It didn't work, as when Larry addressed Sorun again he had a tired look in his eyes. "What was all that yelling about, anyways?"

"Oh, that." Sorun's right hand tightened around the object it was holding: a thin, silver cane. It clacked on the floor as he stepped out from the window, Sorun speaking as he crossed the room. "The local couriers are upset over my side-hustle."

"Side... hustle?" an unsure Larry repeated.

"Yeah, over at the castle. Elias pays me to transport stuff for the council sometimes and all the couriers keep crying about it. They're just jealous I can do their job a million times better 'cause I can open portals." He stopped at the other end of the store where a small, miniature fridge was leaning against the wall. "Pfft," Sorun continued as he bent down to open the fridge, "imagine physically traveling all over the world instead of just opening a portal. Losers."

"Don't you feel bad, though?" Larry asked. He walked over to where Sorun was and was now leaning over a waist-high display cabinet full of shoes. "It's just feels a bit unfair that you're-"

"Unfair? Unf- lemme tell you about unfair." With a bottle of cola in his free hand Sorun spun around, using the end of his cane to shut the fridge door while pointing the cola bottle at Larry. "Unfair is becoming a refugee 'cause your planet died and then getting grifted by the job market in the city you live in. You got grifted by the same market; you wouldn't be working here of all places if you actually had a choice."

"Hey!" an offended Honey shouted from the store's counter.

"My point," Sorun said in a lighter tone, flashing a grin and placating look towards Honey, who only offered a flat look in response, "is that turnabout is fair play and if the job market grifted me I get to grift it." Grin dying, Sorun turned back to Larry. "So no. I don't feel bad about it. And if they start protesting outside my house with picket signs I'll drop the ocean on 'em."

"You ended up getting a job, though," Larry argued.

"Yeah, 'cause I happened to be friends with a business owner!" Sorun rebutted. "For all my talents none of them are actually good in the working environment so I'm taking what I can get. And it ain't like they're starving. It ain't like they're out of work. And honestly they should be grateful that things're so peaceful they get to complain about small stuff like this."

Larry's lips pressed together, not being able to find a good counterargument. He could only watch as Sorun tossed his cane up, grabbed it halfway up the shaft, and then used the handle of the cane to pop off the soda bottle's cap. It spun through the air and landed on top of the minifridge next to Sorun. "Hey, what's that?" he asked.

"What's what?"

"That," Larry said, pointing at the cane.

"... A cane?" With a raised eyebrow, Sorun rose it up for Larry to see. "This may surprise you but getting your skeleton ripped out of you is a fairly intensive surgery and I can't really move at a hundred percent yet. It's better than it was a week ago but... eugh. Can't really do more than walk. So, you know, cane," he explained, waving it around a bit.

Larry winced a bit. "Ouch. Should you be working?"

Casting a dry look over at Honey, Sorun answered, "I dunno, Honey says I'm good enough to be working and who would know more about the health of my body than her?"

She didn't look very amused by Sorun's words. "Sorun, you've moved one box all day. For the past week you've moved one box a day. I'm practically paying you to stand around and drink soda. I even offered to give you a paid week or two off but you were all, 'nah, Honey, it's fine, I can't let the grind die' or whatever."

"Boxes across the whole world ," Sorun reminded her.

"That means nothing when you can teleport with your sword. It's literally just a few steps for you."

Sorun rolled his eyes and turned back to Larry. "I'm fine. I just need the cane to get around is all."

"Where'd you get the cane?" Larry asked, gazing over at the silver implement. "Looks really fancy. Never seen anything like it before."

With a passive expression, Sorun held the cane up. Larry jumped back a bit when the cane dissolved into a cloud of blue energy and particles, and then instantly reformed into a glowing blue gem. Then the gem dissolved and reformed into the cane. "It's mine," Sorun answered.

"Oh, wow! It's one of your, uh, one of your things!" Larry leaned back over the counter. His eyes were wide, practically sparkling with stars, his mouth a wide "o" in wonder as he gazed at the cane. "Does it have any cool powers like your sword?"

Sorun blinked. "It's a cane."

"Yeah, but does it do anything? Does it transform or summon something or-" Larry made finger pistols and jerked them up and down, "-shoot out some sort of weird energy thing or-"

"It has the ability to help me walk from point A to point B." Upon seeing Larry's face deflate at the description Sorun chuckled a bit. "It's just a cane, man. The metal's a bit special but that's it. It's probably the most mundane thing I can make with a Chaos Emerald." He tipped his head back and began drinking from the bottle.

Honey spoke up from her side of the store. "I wanted to ask, is it okay for you to be handling that?" Her eyes lowered to the cane Sorun was holding. If he didn't know any better he would think she almost looked concerned. "I thought all your problems kept happening 'cause of Chaos energy..."

"Honey, Honey, Honey..." Sorun stepped over to her side of the store, twirling the cane in his hand and leaning against the sales counter as she looked at him. "Cards on the table I'm not too sure holding this thing all the time is doing more damage than breathing the air on this planet. But hey, what else is new?" Sorun asked before tipping his head back to take another swig of soda.

The cat frowned. "It's probably not doing anymore damage than this," she grumbled, swiping the soda from Sorun's grasp, who immediately began making whining noises as he sluggishly groped for the bottle. "You know how many of these you drink on a daily basis?"

Mirroring Honey's frown, Sorun stopped with the half-hearted grabs and sprung his hand out to snatch the bottle back. "It's not nice to make fun of a recovering addict, Honey," he said, drinking back the soda.

"To soda ?" she asked, disbelievingly. "How?"

Sorun lowered the bottle, tapping it idly with his finger. "Earth soda was built different. Arguably worse 'cause-" he turned the bottle around to read the label on the back, "-well this stuff won't kill you if you drink too much. But the corn syrup market on Earth was a brutal one and they put it in everything. Soda included."

Honey's face wrinkled in disgust. "You made syrup out of corn? And drank it?"

"Hey, corn syrup was the best invention ever after sliced bread. Especially when they started putting it in sliced bread." Sorun quickly took another swig of soda. "I say that as a former hopelessly-addicted consumer who had to go cold turkey after coming here. That first month was bad. Got shakes."

"... I'm thinking about stopping stocking the fridge with this stuff," Honey said, eyeing the already-empty bottle Sorun was holding.

Back straightening in panic, Sorun pointed a warning finger at Honey. "Hey, no. Nooo . Don't you dare. I already got one feline woman worrying about my health and I don't need another." He shot her an accusing look. "And I see you with your morning coffee, Honey. You have comfort drinks, too. And what would Larry say about you letting the company fridge go dry? What'll that poor guy drink?"

"I only drink water," Larry called from the other end of the shop.

Sorun's head whirled over to Larry's direction, mouth hung open in shock. The one time Sorun needed him to not be the most boring person on the planet and then he goes and pulls this on him. "... Not even juice, man? For real?"

Larry shrugged. "That's just how it is, Sorun, I-I just really like water."

"I don't know what to say. Who even are you? Why are you like this?" Shaking his head in some approximation of disappointment, Sorun walked his way over to the recycling bin near the door and tossed the empty glass bottle in. "Boss, uh, tell you what I'm gonna go ahead and clock out. I got a double dinner date to get to."

Honey gave Sorun a dismissive wave, not even bothering to look over at him. "Yeah, sure, go ahead. Nothing left here for today anyways." She looked over at Larry. "Oh, that reminds me. Larry, there's a new shipment of fabric I need you to go unload."

Larry's mouth dropped open. "What!? You just said-!" He cut himself off and pointed at Sorun. "Why can't he do it, he's barely done anything all day!"

Sorun's response was to double over in mock pain and hold his stomach. "Ouch, oof, my new artificial bones... oh, t-the pain, it's... it's overwhelming." He shuffled his feet a bit as he turned around, dipping his head to hide the small grin he was wearing. "Gotta... go recover from intensive surgery..."

"Y-you fibber!" Larry's protests fell on deaf ears, as Sorun was already stumbling out the door... only to shift into a normal, stable gait with his cane the second he was through the shop's threshold. "Sorun you fibber I saw that!"

The concept of going on a double dinner date was somewhat of a weird one to Sorun seeing as one of them didn't eat. Still left three out of four, which at seventy-five percent was a passing grade to be fair, but he didn't like Nicole being left out of things. She'd insisted so much, though, and so many plans had been made behind his back. Because Nicole and Bunnie had been talking and apparently that was a thing women did, they just made plans behind their partners' backs and they were forced to just go along with it.

He also didn't know if this could even be called a double dinner date. They didn't go to a restaurant or anything. This was just Antoine's house. Which wasn't bad , per se, because he liked visiting him, and they were having a nice time. But at the same time Sorun had kind of assumed Antoine would be the one cooking because he was pretty much the only person in their circle of friends with actual culinary skills.

It didn't really shake out that way.

"You know I shouldn't be surprised about the heavy aroma of carrots wafting in from your kitchen, Antoine, I really shouldn't. And yet I am." The both of them were in the house's living room, sitting down on the floor with a coffee table between the both of them with cards sprawled out on it. The girls were in the kitchen. Probably plotting more. "I thought you were trying to diversify her diet?"

"Oui. I was. I tried." He looked at the cards in his hand, single eye-ridge raised in confusion as he considered what he was looking at. "Sorun, I am not zinking we are playing zis right. Are you being sure you are not misremembered anyzing about zis game?"

Oh, he was sure. Though Sorun's face was set in a neutral expression he was grinning like a schoolboy on the inside. It took some persuading on his part but Nicole had briefly made a printing machine for playing cards to print out a very special deck for him to play with. He told Antoine a long time ago that one day Sorun might bring Uno into this world, and by George by did. He remembered just a few days ago when Nicole had given him the cards made to his specification and she'd been interested enough that they'd tried the game out.

She didn't want to play the game anymore after that first time. In fact she hadn't talked to him the entire day after.

"No, trust me, we're doing it right," Sorun assured Antoine.

"I started zis game weeth seven cards and now 'ave twenty," he protested, shaking the massive deck he held in his hands. "And yet you are having only four!"

"I told you the game was to get rid of the cards. It's easy, look." He played the blue draw two. "I play this card which makes you draw two more cards and cycles the turn back to me." Antoine grumbled and did draw two more cards, but then froze when Sorun played a blue reverse. "Then I play the reverse to bounce the turn back to me." A third blue card. "Then I play this blue skip card to skip your turn and make it my turn again. Uno."

"Ze game iz about to end, isn't it?"

"Yeah. And then I play this blue four and win the game," Sorun finished, smugly grinning while Antoine narrowed his eyes at him. "It's all strategy, man."

"Strategy? What strategy? Zere iz no strategy!" Antoine exclaimed with a loud scoff. "You keep abusing zese ridiculous rules, making us switch ze hands on zeroes and sevens and stacking ze cards!"

"It's your fault for not keeping the plus twos and fours in reserve."

"Oui. My fault . Jeu stupide et regles stupides..." Antoine threw his cards down in a huff, staring down at them scornfully. "Was zere anyzing fun in your world or did you all just torture each other for amusement with zese ridiculous games?"

"We're gonna skip Five-Finger Fillet because I don't want to answer that." Sorun scooted around the small coffee table, ignoring the odd look Antoine was giving him, until he was sitting right besides the coyote. "And we did fun things. Real fun things! And I'll introduce 'em all. Like karaoke, everybody loves karaoke."

"Kary... oak?" The words came out slow and unsure from Antoine's mouth, slightly slurred, like he was having trouble simply even pronouncing the word. His face even wrinkled a bit, as if just saying the word brought some kind of distaste to his mouth. "I am not... understand," he said after a short pause.

"'Do not understand', you're gettin' there." Sorun stretched his arm out and draped it over Antoine's shoulders, who made a surprised yelp when Sorun drew him in further. "It's, uh, it's singing songs, basically. We'll set it up, a whole karaoke bar, I'll... I'll find a Frank Sinatra album if I go to Earth and bring it back and we'll sing over it.

Or maybe I'll just bring back a whole machine, and we'll set a place up!"

Antoine made a nervous sort of chuckle, limply grabbing at Sorun's wrist, the one hanging off his shoulder, as he looked at Sorun. "My zinging voice iz... not zo great, Sorun. Zat wouldn't zound good at all."

"Nah, that's the beauty of it, the karaoke machine shows you the lyrics and the tempo and everything, you just sing the words it's super easy!" Sorun made a playful laugh while lightly shaking Antoine again, who chuckled along with him. "'Sides, it doesn't need to sound good, that's the point of karaoke. It's just a dumb thing to do with friends."

This was... great. Yes. This , this whole thing. Eating out at friends' houses and hanging out. Going to bed knowing he'd wake up to a stable life. Sometimes it still felt like Sorun was living in a fever dream even after managing to get his life back in order, but here it was. Him just sitting there. Laughing with a friend. Because... hell, he didn't know when the last time was he did that. When the last time was he could just cut back without some awful something weighing him down. Or even the times he'd refused to just relax around other because of reasons Sorun couldn't even recall anymore because he didn't care enough to recall. It didn't matter anymore. He was here. Livin' the life.

He didn't want it to end. It felt too great.

"Oui, fine, but zen we would all be making fun of each other for ze terrible zinging," Antoine chuckled out. "Soneek would have ze worst zinging voice of zem all, we'd 'ave to invite him."

The good feelings died and Sorun's smile dropped off. A burst of anger flittered through his heart, raging until he'd managed to calm in down with a short breath. "Well, I was... thinking it'd be more a couple thing," Sorun hesitantly said with a tight voice. "We could bring our girls, make it a competition, maybe invite another couple like, uh, I dunno... Charmy and his girl, they'd like it. Not Mina and Ash, though, she sings professionally, she'd smoke us all." A small frown formed. "Sonic isn't in a relationship right now so he can't come."

"I'm not sharing you with him. I won't share ANYTHING with him. He doesn't get to come. It's our thing. OURS."

"Ah, fine, zat's fine." Sorun's mood lightened considerably when Antoine seemed agreeing to the idea. "But, you zaid... going to ze Earth." Sorun noticed that the lighthearted expression Antoine was wearing just a few seconds ago had turned into a worried look. "You still want to go zere?"

Sorun and his big mouth. The mood was brought down a tad and now he was almost regretting bringing it up. "... Because of this new skeleton of mine I can't use that body to survive the conditions there. So that plan's been... put on pause, somewhat," Sorun confessed. He untangled his arm off of Antoine and scooted back to his previous position on the other side of the coffee table. "I talked about it with Nicole and she said if I really wanted to go she could maybe use the nanites to put together some kind of protection suit for me, but at that point I... I don't know." He tapped idly on the table as he glanced out the window. Wasn't much to look at; it was the dead of night and pitch black out. "Between searching for answers and scavenging for cool stuff to bring back here I don't know. I like where I am right now and don't really want anything to change."

"... Would zings change?" Antoine asked after a moment. "What would change?"

"I mean... I guess nothing." Sorun looked back at him. "Pragmatically speaking nothing that happens there will affect my life here. Nothing but where my head is, I guess. And I like where it is right now." Where he was happy. Where he wasn't seeing hallucinations of himself yelling at himself. Where things were finally fine . "I really wanted to go but now I kinda... just don't. But then on the other hand there's this, I don't know, feeling, you know? Just... things I want closure on that I won't get unless I go."

"Zo zat's it? Peace of mind? Nozing more?"

"I guess. Yeah. That and the karaoke machine." They both shared a short laugh at that. "You think I should?"

Was this how bad it had gotten? He'd gotten so indecisive over the whole matter he needed to ask others? Sorun supposed it was. He was happy here and he didn't want to disturb that by disturbing ghosts. But at the same time he didn't know if he'd ever be fully content without getting answers for mom and Dave and all the others. But without Devil's Body that trip would be phenomenally harder, even with Nicole's help. But her help would make it feasible.

So many buts but so little conviction.

Antoine made a long sigh as he thought. The question seemed to make him uncomfortable, that was plain to see on his face, and yet when he next spoke it was with deliberate sincerity. "Sorun, I 'ave not been through zis particular kind of tragedy zo I do not know. I do not zink I have ze right to tell you what you should do. But if you are always going to be zinking about it, zen... maybe talk with Nicole more. About all ze radiation and how to avoid going to ze hospital. Again. You've been zere enough and will worry ze poor woman to death."

"Yeah, I know." That didn't really help him as much as Antoine probably thought it did. It was more or less the same conclusion Sorun had already come to. "It's not like there's a hard time limit to this or anything," Sorun mused, drumming his fingers along the table. "I can afford to wait. Wait as long as I want, really. Maybe I'll seriously considering going through with it if the feeling doesn't go away after a while."

Deep down Sorun didn't think it would. Not really. Not with how long he'd already been considering the possibility of going back to Earth.

Over time it'd strengthened and waned, always in flux due to his indecisiveness, but the urge never actually left no matter how weak it would sometimes get. He was worried that, given enough time, it might actually outweigh the desire to continue living in his cushy new life here. It was a large part of why he couldn't just let it go.

Sorun sighed. He didn't know. "Maybe we should step away from the serious stuff," he mumbled out, glancing over Antoine's shoulder and at the kitchen. He kept catching glimpses of Nicole and Bunnie's shadows in there, kept hearing a few clipped whispers and giggles. "What do you think they're talking about back there?" he asked Antoine.

"Oh, we'll never know, Sorun, ze mademoiselles keep almost everyzing to zemselves," Antoine lamented. "If I had to be ze guesser I would be guessing zem telling embarrassing stories of us but zey will never admit it."

"Hey, we can... we can think of things to make fun of them over behind their backs, too," Sorun weakly said, though he found a withering sigh leave him at the doubting look Antoine sent him. "No, yeah, you're right, they're too perfect we'll never find a single thing."

"I am afraid zo," Antoine sighed out, quickly glancing over his shoulder. "... Maybe ma cherie's preference in diet concerning ze carrots. It could be worse. At least she doesn't like corn." He made a disgusted face. "I hate ze corn."

"I don't like it, either," Sorun said. "Corn syrup's amazing, though."

Antoine blinked in confusion. "Corn... syrup?" As soon as the words left his mouth his lips wrinkled back in distaste. He looked genuinely offended by what he just heard. "Non, non zat zounds... what iz zis, Sorun, what iz zis evil thing you are bringing into my home?"

"It was an American staple was what it was. Which was honestly terrible, I'm serious, don't bring it back into this world while it still has some innocence left," Sorun said in a half-joking, half-warning tone.

"For all the heart disease it caused, though, you had to hand it to my world for finding so many industrious uses for corn. I don't remember any of them but they did a lot with it." He cupped his chin while grinning over at Antoine. "Corn here is so different, though, you only got the yellow kind. We had white corn, red corn, black, purple, even blue. We practically had corn for every color of the rainbow and then some."

"Vraiment?" Antoine leaned forwards with an interested gleam in his eyes. "Did zey actually taste palatable?"

"I heard they tasted different but I never tried it. I don't like corn." Sorun's grin grew a fraction. "It's real weird, though, the corn here doesn't try to fight you when you harvest it like Earth corn did."

"Eh?" Now Antoine looked a bit startled, with the coyote's back going a bit straight as a nervous chuckle left him. "Zis is, uh... you trying to zay ze funny, oui? Zis is a joke?"

With a serious expression betrayed by the amused gleam in his eyes, Sorun pointed at Antoine and said, "Ain't nothin' funny about corn harvest, Antoine. We lost an average of three hundred farmers annually to corn harvest." Antoine's jaw dropped open in shock. "Except for that one time, of course," Sorun continued. He leaned back and tilted his head up at the ceiling, narrowing his eyes while speaking in a deeper octave. "So many lives lost during the Corn Wars... of '08 ."

"Mon Dieu. What happened?"

Sorun shook his head in false remorse. "Thousands died to the corn, Antoine. Pulled into those corn fields never to be seen again." His eyes tilted back down and caused his grin to grow back when he saw Antoine was shaking slightly where he sat. "They say all those scarecrows you'd see out in the fields were actually the bodies of farmers propped up by the corn as a reminder of the Corn Wars. As a reminder of what every side took from one another. And every time someone would try to take them down it'd just make more scarecrows. The corn was relenting, unceasing." He glanced towards the window. "Come to think of it doesn't that chicken lady that runs the produce market have a scarecrow in her garden?"

"Eek!" It'd been too much. When Antoine had let out that frightened squeak and jumped up in the air, hands pulled up to his chest and teeth chattering, Sorun couldn't help it. He laughed, which made Antoine flush in embarrassment before he'd crossed his arms with an indignant look.

"Sorun, dear... you promised you wouldn't make up stories about your old home."

Feeling himself go ramrod straight, all amusement washing out in an instant, Sorun's eyes snapped to the direction of the voice he just heard. Nicole was standing at the entrance of the kitchen, a large platter held in her hands and an unamused look on her face. Bunnie was standing next to her with a similar platter, mirroring her expression.

A worried chuckle left Sorun. "I never... explicitly promised..." he said while rubbing the back of his neck.

"Please don't make us continue this conversation at home," Nicole said with a roll of her eyes. "We're just getting done setting the table now, so please come join us in the kitchen."

Sorun watched the both of them retreat into the kitchen, and then looked back at Antoine, who had his arms crossed and had that indignant look. "Look, uh, I didn't, none of that was- can we just go eat?" he pleaded.

"Ugh... oui, oui, let's go." Shaking his head with a sigh Antoine stood up and ventured towards the kitchen, with Sorun walking behind him. By the time the both of them arrived in the kitchen the table was set with three spots and a fourth spot that was completely absent of any plates or cutlery. Antoine and Bunnie were already setting themselves down at the table, with Bunnie wearing a teasing grin and saying something that made Antoine hide his face in his hands. Sorun didn't even get a chance to sit down before Nicole was at his side.

"Where is your cane?" she asked, worriedly. Sorun didn't even get a chance to respond before she'd grabbed at his arm, like he'd collapse right there without it. "Did you leave it in the living room?"

He'd be annoyed if this wasn't so endearing. "I don't need it that much, Nicole, I was just walking to another room," he weakly argued, though there wasn't much energy behind his protest.

"You still can't move as well as you used to, Sorun. What if you fell?"

"I'm not gonna fall from-" Sorun cut himself off when he heard the snickers. From both Antoine and Bunnie, the traitors. " You really gotta do this in front of company !?" he whispered out at Nicole, who only shook her head as she gently guided Sorun to his own seat, against the mumbling protests he'd made. She'd only let him go and moved to her own seat once he himself was sat down.

He liked it better when she was so doting on him without spectators. From the warm feeling in his chest he wasn't sure his heart was of the same sentiment, but his brain could argue with it over the matter later. The food was now.

And what food it was. There was a meatloaf - whatever meat it was made from and where it was acquired from was a question Sorun had utterly given up on ever getting a straight answer for. A lot of vegetables set out... he'd try and avoid those... no fries, neither Antoine nor Bunnie ever made fries so he couldn't be that surpr- OOH BREAD.

"Gimme." No hesitation, absolutely none, the second Sorun saw that load of bread he immediately snatched up his knife and reached for it. His hands didn't even make it halfway to the bread before Nicole swatted them away.

"Sorun, you know better," she chastised. "No dessert before you eat the actual dinner."

"But it's Bunnie's carrot bread, Nicole!" Sorun whined out. "You can't just make me wait for it!"

"Ah followed mah Antoine's advice and added the pumpkin spice since ya'll seemed to really like it last time," Bunnie added.

"SHE ADDED THE PUMPKIN SPICE, NICOLE, COME ON."

Nicole's stare was unwavering, despite Sorun's protests, much to his chagrin. "Dinner first," she said in a flat voice with no room to argue.

Utter defeat. It was no use. During the small argument Antoine and Bunnie had already filled their plates with food, so grumbling under his breath Sorun reached over to cut some of the meatloaf off for himself. After he did so he picked his fork up, but not even two seconds passed before Nicole spoke up again.

"The vegetables, too, you need the nutrients."

Sorun froze, knife and fork poised in the air as his eyes drifted in Nicole's direction. "I'll get them later," he lied.

"I want to see them on your plate now."

"Who do you always gotta do this? Why do you always gotta harp on what I eat?"

"Because I care. Now, do you want to talk about your dietary needs when we go home or would you rather do something else?"

"..." Both of them had their eyes locked onto the other's, unflinching. Sorun was the one to cave, breaking eye contact first and mutely - albeit with some hesitance - shoveled what he hoped was a satisfactory amount of vegetables on his plate while ignoring the satisfied smile Nicole was wearing now.

Utter defeat. Again.

When the snickering started back up Sorun's eyes shot up to Antoine and Bunnie. "What are you two comedians laughing at?" he grumbled out.

"Aw, nothin'. Nothin'." Certainly didn't sound like nothing between the light chuckling Bunnie was making and that smirk she wore. "It's jus' funny watchin' you two go at it. Reminds me o' the arguments we used to have." She passed a cursory glance over at Antoine as she bent over her food. "Usually ended the same way, too."

Antoine didn't respond. What he did do was look over at Sorun so the two's eyes could meet. Upon doing so Sorun was taken back by the sheer look of sympathy the other male was giving him. It was a look of complete understand, one that screamed out, "I understand, brother. It's all going to be okay."

Sorun could only respond by giving a jerky nod in silent thanks. It was a world they both lived in, but at least they could share in it together.

All these thoughts were completely forgotten when Sorun noticed movement out of the corner of his eye and saw the shimmering, transparent plate of food that was in front of Nicole. It materialized further to look solid after a couple of seconds, but it didn't change the fact that Sorun knew it was just a hologram. He looked up and gave Nicole a questioning look.

"Really?"

"I wanted to feel more included," she bashfully admitted. The admittance made Sorun jolt a bit in his seat when he heard how shy she now sounded over the question and it made him want to immediately refrain his earlier comment. "I also felt it rude for me to just sit here while you all eat and-"

"No I was just surprised it's fine you can do whatever you want," Sorun quickly interrupted, going as far as to wave his hands at Nicole while nervously smiling. She seemed a bit taken back by the response from the way she leaned back. "Just, are you sure?" Sorun asked, calming down a bit as he looked down at the food. "It's not like you actually get anything out of doing that."

"I'm satisfied with just going through the motions," Nicole answered. "It feels normal."

"Alright." All he really needed to hear was that she just wanted to do it, but it felt nice knowing she liked the act that much. "It's cool if you wanna be like Plankton eating the hologram food." He suddenly grinned a bit and made a breathy chuckle. "'Good grief, he's naked!' Classic."

Nicole tilted her head a bit. "... Pardon?"

"That's another thing I gotta do if I go, scavenge around Earth for episodes of 'Spongebob'. It's a generational classis," Sorun mumbled to himself, cupping his chin and staring down at his food in thought. It drew the attention of the other three at the table, who were largely being ignored by Sorun as he deliberated with himself. "There's gotta be a DVD box set in a Wal-Mart bargain bin somewhere. Although... oh, I don't know, maybe it's not such a good idea after all." He scratched at the side of his head. "What happens if they all get obsessed over it? There isn't another media like it here. Could spoil 'em, and I'm not too sure about disturbing the mental ecosystem with something so unnatural to these parts... these are pretty dire ramifications for introducing an otherwise solid cartoon."

"Should... iz zis a conversation topic?" Antoine wondered, glancing back and forth between Sorun and Bunnie. "What iz he even talking about?"

"Uh... I don't know." Bunnie fixed Nicole with an unsure look. "Nicole, you live with 'im. You know what he's rambling on about?"

Nicole shook her head. "No. Sorun?"

Sorun looked up at her. "Yeah?"

"What are you thinking about?"

"Weighing the risks of potentially destroying a fragile ecosystem versus an injection of cross-world culture into the minds of today's youth," Sorun answered, though it didn't seem to answer anything for the other three as they still looked confused. "I'm lookin' at it and I don't think it's a good idea."

"That's... that's good," Nicole hesitantly answered, slowly nodding. "I don't think destroying ecosystems is the right thing to do."

"But would it be the responsible thing to do?" Sorun wondered. Would it really by right to deprive the youth of this art when he was in a position to do something about it? The only one? Did he have the right to make such a life-altering decision?

"I do not think a case can be made where the answer to that question is 'yes', Sorun."

"Yeah, you're probably right." With a disappointed sigh, Sorun sat back in his chair, eyes up at the ceiling. "Sucks. I woulda shown them the splinter episode first. Really get those kids' blood pumping. Ah, what could have been..."

"Can you please give me a concise explanation of what exactly you're talking about?" Nicole asked in a pleading tone.

Sorun blinked over at her. "I just did," he said.

"No. No you did not. None of that was concise. You're assuming I have context where there is none," she argued.

"The context is irrelevant. What matters is morality versus pragmatism, the core theme of this debate."

"I don't even know what this debate is-"

"A fact that is completely moot as consensus on an appropriate course of action has already been decided. Which is doing nothing." Sorun shifted his attention to his food and began cutting into it. "Good old nothing. Man, I love doing nothing. Doing nothing is the best, ain't it, Nicole? Glad we decided to do nothing."

Nicole continued stare, utterly lost and holographic food utterly ignored. "We decided on something?"

"Yeah, on doing nothing."

"When?"

"When you said destroying the ecosystem is a bad idea."

"How is that relevant!?" she exclaimed.

"I feel like we're not on the same wavelength here." Sorun paused in his motions and glanced up in thought, playing back the previous words of this conversation in his head. And then he grimaced. "Okay, yeah, I think I see where the confusion is coming from, that's on me, my bad." He looked back at Nicole while absentmindedly still cutting into his food. "I wanted to bring back something from Earth to keep the kids here entertained, but, well... it involved a media format that hasn't really been innovated here yet. On one hand it'd be inspiring but on the other hand I feel like there'd be a lot of negative repercussions to introducing such a foreign piece. I dunno. Am I thinking too hard about this?"

"What I think is that there could have been a legitimate discussion here if you had been this forthcoming with context initially." She paused, looking conflicted with her next question. "You're... still intent on going there?"

"... I'm on the fence about it," Sorun admitted, biting into his food. He noticed out of the corner of his eye that of all things Nicole looked a bit relieved to hear that, and he'd sighed through his nose and decided to focus back on his food. He couldn't blame her for being concerned over it, not really. If their roles were reversed he'd be worried about it. Wouldn't have even blamed her if she outright refused to let him go, and though he was happy she saw how important it was to him he felt he would have been... understanding for the most part if she said no. "I'm not really in a condition to do that anyway," he continued in a mumble. "Might have to put a pin in the idea for the next couple months."

She looked even more relieved to hear that. Even smiled a bit, which... Sorun didn't know how to feel on. Maybe a bit glad someone cared about him enough to be this worried. Maybe a bit annoyed.

Over on the other end of the table Bunnie and Antoine had decided to shift attention to their own meals, the conversation between Sorun and Nicole completely lost on them. But while Antoine had abandoned them entirely in lieu of just eating his food Bunnie was only halfheartedly paying attention to her own meal while glancing back and forth between the other couple. After a few moments of quiet she'd cleared her throat.

"So, er, Sorun! The, erm, the new skeleton treatin' ya alright?" she asked. "Any concerns ya had?"

Sorun's head snapped over to her. "Oh, no, everything's been alright with it, thanks," he answered. "Body hasn't really adjusted to it completely yet but it's getting there."

"Don't hurt none?"

"Not anymore. Moving's just... weird." Sorun pursed his lips because he wasn't entirely sure how to put it into words. Aside from the weight difference the motorized joints took some getting used to because they didn't always listen to his muscles. It was a problem that was becoming less and less prevalent with time as he learned to work with it but it still startled him sometimes when his arm or something else moved in a different direction he wanted it to.

"Well, alright. That's great tah hear." Bunnie pointed her fork at Sorun with a small grin on her face. "Was gettin' kinda lonely being the only cyborg around an' all. Could maybe make a little club outta it!"

Sorun tapped the side of his plate with his knife in thought. "Do mine really count, though? You can't even see them. It's all interior."

Bunnie waved her mechanical hand. "Aw shucks, that don't matter none. And ah feel like a skeleton's a pretty big thing to swap out."

"By that logic you'd have to invite anyone with any technological implants into your club," Nicole commented from the side. The holographic meatloaf she'd taken a piece out of shimmered and briefly turned into static. "If I recall Sonic still has that translator implanted in his brain. Would that not make him eligible?"

"Ah guess that's a good point. Maybe. But that tiny li'l thing...?"

"I am not seeing ze difference," Antoine said with a shrug. "Sorun?"

"I don't want him in our club." Before he'd heard his name Sorun had been glaring down at the table, clenching down hardly on his own utensils. When he heard Antoine he'd relaxed and looked at him. "He didn't replace anything like us," he responded in a blank voice. "It doesn't count."

"That seems pedantic," Nicole pointed out. "Is it really that significant a difference?"

"Naw, Sorun... Sorun's onto something, ah think." Bunnie glanced at her own cybernetic arm, frowning a bit. "It ain't an easy thing tah get used to. Most he had tah get used to was understandin' more voices than usual." She shrugged and returned to her food. "Guess we ain't too serious with it. Two'd be too small fer a club anyways."

The sadness from the club not being formed was dwarfed by the satisfaction Sorun felt that Sonic wouldn't have been invited to their hypothetical club, which brought his mood up a fair bit. "Yeah," he said. "With all you've had to deal with you're probably sick of other cyborgs anyways."

"Ugh, don't you get me started now," Bunnie groaned out. "If I nevah hafta see another one of them crazy Dark Legion fellers it'll be too soon. Ah'm just glad that mess is over with."

"You should have seen the people's reactions at the announcement of your victory," Nicole said with a small smile. "Everyone was dancing in the streets. It was very amusing to see."

"I was sleeping in bed at the time. Recovering." Sorun's voice became a bit distant as he stared down at his food. He felt his mood begin to drop once this topic had been brought up. "Big congrats on the win and all. I just..."

"Just what?" Bunnie asked.

Sorun glanced up at her. He hadn't wanted to bring it up. It was a couple of days after his surgery, when the Freedom Fighters did their big final assault on New Megaopolis. They'd won, everyone had seen it coming and Dimitri had made good on his promise to sabotage the defenses so the win had been even easier than predicted. Sorun, of course, had been asleep at the time and had to be filled in afterwards.

He remembered it a bit fondly. He'd barely made it out of bed before Nicole had just appeared, smile wide and laughing as she'd hugged him so hardly they'd fallen back on the bed. And after a whole ten minutes of her profusely apologizing she'd explained how they'd won. Final victory achieved. Eggman Empire was dismantled and no more.

Really, it was an event that should've had the whole world celebrating since it was finally free now. And from all the noise that night from all over the city it practically felt like the world was celebrating. There'd even been a big feast and everything. And Sorun would admit it didn't feel as momentous as it should have, it felt like that was the general consensus among everyone, but to be fair it was a conclusion they all saw coming months in advance. Nobody'd been holding their breath on them losing, not really. The victory didn't come as a surprise. It was more... relief, maybe. At the world finally being liberated.

And Sorun would be right there alongside everyone else if it weren't for one single detail.

He hadn't wanted to ask about it. He'd figured it wasn't his fight so he didn't have a right to question it. Didn't have a say, even if he'd personally fought the guy in the past. But he'd be a liar if the most important detail of the end of the conflict didn't rankle him, didn't keep him up that night as he kept thinking it over, all the double-takes he'd taken when he heard. And he was assured it was all fine. And he believed those words since they came from Nicole. But now the topic was here and he couldn't help the question.

"Why did you just leave him?" Sorun asked. He was so eager for in answer the question was almost a demand. "I just don't understand."

Nicole didn't have much of an outward reaction to the question. Antoine and Bunnie were different: they'd both stiffened, growing visually uncomfortable at the question as they glanced at each other. "Sorun-" Bunnie began.

"No, really, I don't get it," Sorun continued. "The guy terrorized everyone for a decade- okay, wasn't the same Eggman for a large chunk of that time but nobody really cares about that detail," he amended. "After everything he did, when you finally beat him back, beat everything he threw at you, finally, finally got that definitive win... you just left him there ? Left him in that dome in New Megaopolis?"

When the Freedom Fighters had come back from their final mission and he heard they didn't have Eggman in tow wearing chains Sorun had been stunned. Because he figured that was the entire point of everything, that it was the inevitable conclusion to it all. Part of him even dared to hope that the reason was because something had happened and he died. Maybe took himself out in some ill-fated last-ditch "you didn't win!" suicide attempt or was shot in the back by the Dark Legion or something, anything, just some explanation.

But no. The Freedom Fighters just left him there after they won. They didn't capture him, didn't do anything. They won and left. It didn't make sense to Sorun. It... honestly almost sounded like insanity to him. He was barely tolerable over the idea of imprisoning but this ? This was so far beyond the pale of what he expected he didn't even know what to say. So he'd said nothing, deciding to trust them all since in the end it was their decision. But he couldn't help wanting to question it.

"Sorun, Robotneek..." Antoine began, swallowing at the very uncomfortable topic. Not that Sorun saw how it was uncomfortable. "He was... driven insane."

"This is known," Sorun said. "The man's insane. I think everyone in the world is aware."

"Not that kind of insane," Bunnie mumbled out with a shake of her head. "You'd've had tah been there, Sorun. When Sonic beat him fer the last time the man just... snapped. Was rollin' around on the floor and frothin' at the mouth. None of what he was saying made a lick o' sense."

"Zere were no words. Ze man was rabid. Completely mad," Antoine added. He touched the top of his lip with his fingers. "Sorun, he tore hiz own mustache clean off."

In any other circumstance Sorun would have laughed when he heard that, but felt that wasn't appropriate right now so he kept it in. And frankly with the current subject he wasn't completely sure he was even in the mood.

"To put it in Snively's words it seems that Sonic had trounced Robotnik so many times he couldn't mentally comprehend it," Nicole said. Sorun looked over at her in disbelief because she actually sounded sad, of all things. "I don't fully understand it myself, but I don't know the man's mind and perhaps that's for the best. But they speak the truth, Sorun. Robotnik's loss came as such a shock that he isn't even capable of forming words anymore." She paused, eyes drifting down to her holographic food in thought. "I'm not sure what better a prison there is than one's own mind," she muttered after a time.

"So you all just left him there? With Snively? You're not even gonna do anything against him?"

"No. The goal was to neutralize Robotnik as a threat, and though we didn't intend it in his current state the only person he's an actual threat to is himself," she said.

"Oui. Snively agreed to look after ze madman, so we left," Antoine finished. "Eet iz doubtful ze man will make trouble, and even eef he does he iz no Robotneek. Ze war's over. Haz been for some time and we're just now realizing eet."

"Ah think it's best tah just enjoy it for what it is," Bunnie added, glancing at Sorun. "He can't hurt no one no more. We're all still here and if somethin' does go south ah doubt it'll evah be as bad as anythin' Eggman evah threw at us."

Sorun exhaled. They made good points. He couldn't really refute any of them. At the same time he was having a hard time agreeing with them, because he still wanted that man dead and in the ground so he never had to think about him ever again. He had to wonder how much it mattered, though, if at the end of the day it all worked out anyways. Maybe it didn't really matter in the end if he was dead or stark-raving mad, probably in a straight jacket and tossed in a rubber-padded cell somewhere. Maybe it wasn't even his business to criticize. It was their war. He'd just fought in it a bit.

"Ah. Whatever. I don't want to think about the Twenty-First Century Schizoid Man anymore. He'd doesn't deserve the effort," Sorun said. It was whatever in the end. He had a new life and it wasn't worth pursuing the thoughts anymore. Wasn't his business and wasn't worth the time. It was done. Over. And any thoughts of maybe going on his own to finish the job were discarded, because dammit, he'd built too much to risk losing it doing something stupid like that. No. If they said it was done then it was done. He could easily live with that.

"Sorun," Nicole chastised, sending him a admonishing look. "I know the man has done little to deserve respect-"

"Nothing, he's done nothing."

"He's entitled to some decency regardless," she said.

Sorun sighed. She just had to be so nice, huh... "It was a reference to a song from Earth, nothing more," he explained in a chuckle, though all this served to do make Nicole go from admonishing to giving him a disapproving pout. "I thought it was funny," he grumbled out, returning to his meatloaf.

... Ah, was getting kind of low on meat. And the vegetables were untouched, making Sorun send a nervous glance Nicole's way. If only Sonic's pet dog was here for Sorun to smuggle veggies into his stomach like he'd done in the old days when he lived in his family's house.

"A song? Oh, speakin' o' songs," Bunnie started, suddenly smiling, "Mina and her band's gonna be doing a big concert to celebrate the victory."

"Oh, I heard! Everyone in the entire city is planning on attending!" Mirroring Bunnie's smile, Nicole turned towards Sorun. "Isn't that wonderful to hear, Sorun?"

God, maybe he could just pocket the vegetables and just throw them out in the trash at home. She wouldn't notice, would she? No, not if he was slick enough. "Hm?" Sorun sounded out, still staring intently at his vegetables.

"Mina's concert!" The exuberance at which Nicole said that slightly startled Sorun and forced him to abandon the vegetables to look over at her. "Remember that promise we'd made?"

It took Sorun a second to remember. "Ah yeah. How could I forget that day? A giant robot wolf almost bit me in half. And then we- oh, right, that promise." He felt his face heat as the memories became more clear the deeper he dived in. "We... did say we'd go to the next concert, huh? Since that one got ruined."

"Well... in fairness everyone is going so it will look strange if we don't go, but I don't see how that devalues anything." She reached under the table and grabbed at Sorun's wrist. He froze. It was just a romantic gesture, right? Had to be. It's what the current mood was. "It'll be nice. We can all enjoy ourselves with all our friends over the fact we don't have to think about the war anymore."

Boy, wasn't that a concept: a worry-free, fun-filled day with friends. Was practically a dream come true for Sorun, and a concert did sound pretty nice. And more importantly he had promised. "Yeah. It'll be great." He found himself genuinely smiling at the thought. A fun event with everyone sounded like a nice diversion, especially if it meant a day off work since Honey would likely close the shop if everyone was going. Yeah. It sounded like it'd be the best. A good way of celebrating the fact everything could finally be normal.

"I'm glad you think so." And just like that the smile Nicole wore dropped as she lifted Sorun's arm up from under the table and dropped it on the table's surface. Most noticeably he was holding a fistful of vegetables. "You're still not getting at the bread until you finish eating these, Sorun."

Caught. Not good. It felt like Sorun's stomach jumped up into his throat as he slowly looked from his hand to Nicole, who was giving him an unimpressed look. "... This wacky new skeleton of mine, you know?" Sorun chuckled out nervously, hoping to play it off. "Does all sorts of stuff on its own sometimes, ha ha ha... alright, fine," he grunted, giving up and tossing the vegetables back on his plate.

A/N- I mean listen I'm trying to play it off but there's no fronting it. E veryone who read the comics already knows what's coming. I'm basically holding a giant Wrestlemania sign over here while pointing up to the stands.

Also after five months give or take four and a half months the first chapter of the side project's almost done. Should ship out sometime between Sunday and Tuesday. Or Wednesday if I'm feeling particularly lazy. Thursday at the absolute latest. Maybe Friday.

Chapter 104

A/N- Alright, I'm back from FFXVI

Recursion Error

Episode 104- Going off script

"So are you sure this butter doesn't have any corn syrup?" Sorun asked the Mobian manning the food station. "I just really think it would enhance the efficacy of this butter. Put some thought into it."

"... What is wrong with you?" the sheep asked, buckets of popcorn in hand as he gave Sorun a bewildered stare. "Why would... syrup? From corn? What planet are you from where that would be considered a good idea?"

"Uh... Earth," Sorun dumbly replied. A beat of silence passed between of them, Sorun spending the silence - for how much silence there was with a crowd of hundreds of people in the stadium behind them - looking between the cane in one hand and the bucket of popcorn in the other, and then looked back at the sheep. "That wasn't very tactful, I'm sorry for that," he apologized.

"No no, it's... it's all good," the sheep nervously chuckled, "Soru- er, sir. Sorun, sir."

Sorun cringed back. "Please don't call me sir," he said. "I feel old enough with the cane. It's bad enough I'm seventeen. I'm ancient."

"Seventeen really isn't-"

" Old . Falling apart at the seams." A dramatic sigh left Sorun as he stabbed his cane into the ground and used it as a pivot to spin around, turning his back to the food vendor. "Woe is me to have suffered under the hands of entropy, such is the fate of all who live in this cruel world."

"Whatever you say, man," the sheep sighed out as he waved a hand. "Enjoy the concert."

"Hm?" Sorun glanced back over his shoulder at the sheep. "Oh, thanks. You gonna see it, too?"

"Yeah, but I'm stuck in this popcorn booth 'til it starts."

"Hm. Cool, cool." By that point Sorun had grown bored, so, cane and popcorn in hand, he began making his way away from the food stand and towards the stadium.

As far as stadiums went this one was about as grand as they came. Large. Imposing. Circular. It was about equal in size to sports stadiums they had back on Earth, the really big and fancy ones they'd display during international events. Considering its size it seemed almost an egregious use of space, and when Sorun had asked Nicole why she'd put in a stadium of all things when she designed the city she'd simply said, "I thought the people might enjoy using it." So far it'd only been used to host soccer games and, as of this moment, host Mina's concert, which... fair, Sorun supposed, as there wasn't much else use one could get out of the stadium. Certainly not blood sports. Mobians would never go for that.

Neither would Sorun. He'd never even so much as seen a single game of American football back home. That said he wouldn't have minded terribly if there were ever sanctioned fights with practice weapons in that stadium, maybe even a tournament... Maybe he'd float the idea by Elias one of these days. There was a whole royal guard force. They might go for something like that.

"Even Antoine fights pretty good. I just wanna see something interesting." It took some crossing of corridors in the underside of the stadium, and some stair climbing, but he'd finally made it up to the stadium seats. But, glancing around... yeah. He couldn't find where his friends were. There were hundreds and hundreds of seats everywhere, and those were just the ones he could see. It didn't help that the denizens of this world were all so colorful that it was turning into a rainbow mesh of colors wherever he looked. How was he supposed to find-

The hairs on the back of Sorun's neck pricked up. He didn't even need to hear him. He could feel him standing right behind him.

Clamping down quick on the fury roiling in his heart, Sorun, as calm as he could, turned around. Sure as hell it was Sonic, leaning against one of the guardrails on one of the sets of stairs that ran up through all the seats at this section of the stadium. He immediately noticed how his smile was a bit more subdued than usual, not the - "Arrogant, self-righteous, how fucking dare you do what you did to me" - usual cocky smile he wore.

"Uh, hey, Sorun." He gave a small wave to the other teen. "Noticed you wandering around a bit. Lost?"

"... It would appear so," Sorun answered. His voice was calm and measured, slow in its response. "With all these people I seem to have lost track of the others."

"Heh, yeah. Can't blame ya, with all these seats filled." The hedgehog hopped over the railing and gestured at Sorun to follow. "Come on, I'll lead you b- uh?"

Sorun had cut Sonic off mid-sentence by slipping through one of the gaps in the guardrail to stand besides him. "Don't mind me. We can go," he said. As if there was any chance of him walking behind Sonic. Letting him lead him. They'd either walk side-by-side or he'd brush him off to find the others on his own.

Sonic didn't seem to care, though, as he just shrugged as the two began moving. "Nice that the war's finally over, huh?" he'd asked as they walked.

"You don't sound as happy as everyone else," Sorun pointed out.

"I am. I just..." Sonic hesitated, glancing upwards as he thought. "... I just really didn't wanna win the way I did."

"Driving Eggman insane by accident." He knew from conversations by the others that whatever had happened in New Megaopolis that he'd been off-put by what happened. Everyone had, really, but from how the others talked the experience had downright disturbed Sonic. Sorun didn't really understand how. "What even happened with him? What'd you do?"

"I didn't do anything. He was in this big dumb spider mech, I trashed it, and he just flipped out. I didn't even touch him."

"Were you running your mouth the whole time?"

"I- w-well yeah, but I always do... I always did that, Sorun, and it never caused him to have a mental breakdown before." He looked down from the sky to face Sorun. Forget having a slightly less-than-bright smile, he looked conflicted now. Which only served to annoy Sorun more. "What do you think?"

"I think you won and you should stop worrying about it. I guarantee you're the only one stressing about the fact you mentally destroyed the man, even if by accident." Sorun lifted his cane up and swept it over the stadium. "Everyone else is bursting with joy. They don't care and they shouldn't. He's taken enough time from people."

"... Yeah, but..." He sighed and looked back up at the sky. "Kinda crummy weather, huh?"

Sorun glanced upwards. It was heavy overcast - the entire sky was covered in dark gray clouds. Sonic was right. Unfortunately Sorun absolutely refused to agree with him even if he was factually correct, so instead he mumbled a simple "Mmf" as they continued walking.

They found them eventually. All their friends lined up in seats in one of the rows in the stadium. "They're here, too?" Sorun asked in some surprise. A majority of the Chaotix were sitting in the row below the others, chatting among themselves.

"Yeah, they're visiting to celebrate the big win. Dunno where Espio went. Guess he thought the concert'd be too loud." Sonic blinked and looked to his side. "Huh? Sorun? Where'd you- oh."

By the time Sonic had finished speaking halfway Sorun had already left. He'd already seen who he'd been looking for: Nicole and Silver were sitting in seats at the far end of the row the others were on. Virgil was there, too. Laying on Silver's head, who was pouting and looking upwards at the Chao. He jumped up a bit when Sorun held out the bucket of popcorn to him.

"Take this," Sorun said. Silver did so, hesitantly, and looked to Sorun for clarification. "I'm not allowing you to experience this without a snack. It wouldn't be right."

"Um... I think it's fine?" Silver looked at the popcorn and back at Sorun. "What even is this?"

"The fact you even have to ask saddens me," Sorun said to him. "You lived in absolute squalor in the future if you have to question this. No more. You're gonna enjoy this like a normal person and not some post-apocalyptic survivalist."

"Chao." Virgil raised one of his bladed arms and shuffled around some of the hair on Silver's head, making his ears flick.

Sorun hummed in contemplation. "You can have some of the popcorn if you manage to steal it without Silver catching you," he decided, and then turned around and began moving away. Silver'd made a noise of protest as Sorun left, and then yelped out in indignation when Virgil jabbed forwards and impaled some of the pieces of popcorn on his bladed arm.

A breathy chuckle left Sorun from the noises he heard behind him. He saw the empty seat next to Nicole and sat down in it, though he noticed she was staring off at Silver and Virgil, who were still fighting over the popcorn. Sorun placed both hands on the top of his cane and leaned forwards in his seat as he watched alongside her.

"You might have avoided an altercation between them altogether if you'd just bought them both popcorn," Nicole pointed out. The popcorn bucket was enveloped in a teal energy as it was floated away from the pair, with Silver smiling triumphantly. And them Virgil had flew forwards in a blackish-blue blur, impaling more popcorn on his arms as Silver yelled and out waved his arms in the Chao's direction.

"We would've missed a show," Sorun told her.

The lynx looked back at him with a flat expression. "You needed more entertainment than the concert?"

"It's a pre-show for the main show," Sorun argued. Now Silver was holding the bucket tight against his chest as Virgil sat on his head, nibbling on the popcorn pieces impaled on his arms. The white hedgehog had a guarded expression as he grabbed a handful of popcorn and shoved it his mouth, though then he'd blinked in surprise and perked up after eating it. "And besides, there wasn't a better opportunity to introduce him to popcorn. It's a special food for special events."

"So special you didn't buy any?"

"I don't like popcorn." He glanced down at his hands, still resting atop the cane. "... And I've only so many hands."

"..." Nicole didn't respond. She did, however, reach over and grasp at one of his hands, which made Sorun visually relax in his seat. "It's nice to see you care so much about him."

He felt himself grow a bit flustered, making him unconsciously shake his head a bit. "I-I'm not, I just feel he needs- I-" He cut himself off with a sigh, slumping back slightly as he stared down towards the center of the stadium. "There's a concert, Nicole, the whole reason we're all here. Pay attention to that."

Yeah, he could see her now. The yellow-furred mongoose was stepping out onto a stage that was set up in the middle of the stadium grounds, with her band members situated around her as they fiddled with their various instruments. She was speaking something into a microphone, but the crowds roaring all around them was drowning out most of what she was saying.

Thunder rumbled in the dark skies above.

Nicole made an amused chuckle. "Yes, of course. How silly of me to try and ignore it."

"Yes. Very. Completely. Let's focus on that and nothing else," Sorun quickly said. "Between missing the concert the first time and hearing about Mina's ability to sing the whole time I've been here I'll be disappointed if she doesn't sound like a miracle."

He wouldn't really. Mina could end up sounding absolutely terrible and Sorun wouldn't mind too terribly. This was... enough. Just being here with everyone and enjoying something together. Everything being peaceful. Not having to worry about everything. She could make his ears bleed with her singing and Sorun wouldn't care because he was content with just this alone.

Lightning crackled overhead through the clouds.

Nicole's fingers stroked over the top of Sorun's hand. "I'm sure you won't be disappointed!" Nicole laughed out. "She's-"

A bolt of lightning struck down from the sky and behind Mina on the stage. The resulting silence was deafening - everyone in the stadium had grown silent. Thankfully nobody on stage seemed to be harmed by the lightning strike, not even Mina, who'd been closest to where the lightning hit. She was just standing back in shock because there was... someone standing there. Standing there and appeared to be, from what Sorun saw, raving. Screaming and raving at the top of his lungs. Some monkey Mobian he had never seen before.

"..." Sorun's hand tightened on the head of his cane. Blue, electrical sparks traveled up the length of the cane. As he stared down at the stage he saw a blue blur slam into the monkey who'd just appeared - "Was it the lightning? He... came through that...?" - out of nowhere and slammed into him. It was Sonic. He was fighting the strange monkey Mobian now.

Sorun breathed out. More electrical sparks traveled up the cane, and its tip began glowing an intense blue.

"Sorun?"

He snapped his head to the side. Nicole had flinched back in surprise from the movement and the intense expression he held. Silver and Virgil were looking towards him, too, each looking as concerned as Nicole did at the moment. He tried breathing out again, the intense expression fading as he calmed down. Energy stopped collecting around the cane.

The face was a lie. Sorun certainly didn't feel calm. He hadn't felt this furious in a good bit.

"I want to go get something to drink. I'll return shortly," Sorun said to them in a clipped tone. He rose up out of his seat, face completely impassive and expressionless as he slammed the tip of his cane down. It made a loud CLACK! as he did so, and he couldn't bear to look at the others as he crossed their seats.

He couldn't bear to look at anyone right now.

"It's always fucking something. Never fails."

Earlier before Sorun had entered the stadium he'd noticed there were barrels of water set up on a table near the entrance with cups stacked next to them. Nobody was here, of course. They were all in the stadium, watching Sonic fight a monkey person who'd rode in on a goddamn lightning bolt. It was just him standing out here alone, filling a cup with water as he frowned down at it.

Of course something would happen that would ruin the concert. Of course Sorun couldn't just enjoy some time with his friends. Of course the war ending didn't mean they all got to live a peaceful life where nothing extraordinary happened anymore. He almost laughed at such an idiotic thought. Why would they? This was Mobius. That concept didn't fucking exist on this planet. Normal life? On Mobius? Laughable.

"Hey, Sorun?"

The Voidborn made a sigh. He turned around, leaning his back against the water barrel. His cane was in his left hand while the right held the cup of water, which he brought to his lips as he looked towards the speaker. It was Silver. He didn't see either Virgil or the popcorn with him. He was just standing there with a concerned look in his yellow eyes.

"By now Virgil will have eaten your popcorn," Sorun warned him after drinking the water. He glanced towards the empty food vendor nearby. "Though there's nobody looking if you wanna go raid some more. I won't tell."

"What? I don't care abou- forget the popcorn!" Silver blinked at his own outburst and muttered a quick apology before asking, "What happened? You just walked out."

"I said where I was going, didn't I?" Sorun shook the small cup of water. "I just wanted to go cool my frustrations off." He paused, eyes glancing towards the stadium. He could see the occasional bolt of lightning arc up over the top. "Is Nicole worried?"

"Yeah, but... I think she had to go deal with that, so she asked me to check on you," Silver explained. "Who was that guy?"

"I don't know and I don't care," Sorun truthfully replied. He took another drink of water. "He's ruined everyone's day so he's not my most favorite person at the moment, but otherwise I can't be bothered to care to know. Let Sonic and the rest deal with him." He lowered his eyes to the ground, shuffling a bit in place. "But... thank you for coming to check on me." If nothing else, he could be a bit grateful for having people that cared enough to check on him. It didn't fix any of this, but it was comforting solace nonetheless.

Silver sounded much less worried when he next spoke. "It's fine, but... you just looked so angry," he said, causing Sorun to look back up at him. "I don't know, you just had this look on your face."

"I was upset. I think that's understandable given what just happened."

"Yeah, but..." Silver cut himself off with a sigh. His shoulder slumped forwards as he said, "I guess the concert's off, huh?" He sounded disappointed. Sorun knew the feeling.

"Likely." Sorun's eyes wandered away, towards the opposite end of where the stadium was. He saw a purple form sprinting between the houses towards the exit to the city. Him and someone else. "Huh. That's where Espio went off to. He's in a hurry, looks like. Who's he with?" Sorun didn't recognize the other Mobian running with him. A male lynx one dressed... weirdly. Sandals, pants, and a vest that had an almost... eastern aesthetic to it, but it was hard to see from this distance. "Ah, whatever, none of my business," Sorun thought with a shrug as the two disappeared beyond some trees.

"So what happens now?" Silver asked, causing Sorun's eyes to flick back to him. "Does everyone just go home now?"

Sorun shrugged. "Wait for an official announcement, I suppose, but I wouldn't be surprised if that's the final outcome." Which was...

extremely vexing. Sorun'd been genuinely excited over all this and had been looking forwards to having a normal day. "They'll hopefully reschedule the event," Sorun added, though it was said in a mumble as he swirled his cup around.

"Maybe. Hey, all the fighting sounds died down a bit ago, did you notice?"

"Don't care enough to."

"Ah. Alright." Silver turned around towards the stadium entrance. He blinked, and leaned forwards while flattening his hand and holding it over his eyes. "Hey, is... that Sonic over there? That guy's with him."

The wooden cup cracked in Sorun's grasp, much to his chagrin. He looked up - they were indeed there. In fact Sonic was waving over at Sorun to come over there. He refused to move from this spot, taking another drink out of the cup while folding his other arm across his chest, cane still in hand.

"I think he wants you to go over there," Silver pointed out.

"So it would seem," Sorun replied.

"... Are you gonna go?" Silver looked back at Sorun.

"No."

One of Silver's ears flicked and he gave Sorun and odd look. "Why not?"

"I haven't finished my drink. He has legs. If he wants something he can come over here."

A few seconds passed with Sonic still waving over at Sorun. He got the hint eventually, because he slumped his shoulders and began walking over to their direction. The other - the lightning monkey Mobian that interrupted everything and Sorun was struggling not to attack - was in tow with Sonic. They both stopped in front of the other pair, with Silver stepping off to the side.

"Hey, Sorun, your ears busted or somethin'?" The question was asked with a light tone by Sonic, and with a small grin. "Mina didn't even get to start the concert."

Sorun didn't respond. Instead he tipped his head as far back as possible while drinking from the cup, keeping his eyes on Sonic. Looking down at him.

"Uh... okay." Sonic blinked and shook his head. "Could I ask a favor and have you open up a portal for us real quick? We have somewhere to be."

Sorun lowered the cup from his lips. He glanced behind Sonic and at the monkey Mobian. He found it interesting this one had eastern-looking clothing, too: vestments that had yin-yang symbols on them. He was also looking at Sorun questioningly, looking back and forth between him and Sonic. Otherwise he seemed calm. Almost anxious.

"I see." Sorun lost all interest in the monkey and looked back at Sonic. "If I recall you're the fasted thing on the planet. And it appears your legs still work."

"Okay, sure, but he isn't as fast," Sonic said, pointing his thumb over at the monkey who frowned in response. "We just need a quick ride to New Megaopolis."

"Subtext is evidently lost on you, so allow me to clarify." Sorun's eyes narrowed at Sonic. "Buzz off and walk yourself. I'm not opening you a portal."

Now Sonic looked confused. More than that he stepped back and gave Sorun a look as if he'd just been struck. The monkey was passively looking on, though Silver over on the side had blinked at Sorun in surprise. "Huh?" Sonic squinted and tilted his head back in confusion. "Wha- huh?" He looked back at the monkey and then back at Sorun. "If it's 'cause you're mad at that guy then-"

"I couldn't care less about whoever that is and what he just did," Sorun interrupted, not being entirely truthful. "I'm not opening you a portal."

Sonic's mouth dropped open in surprise. There was confusion clearly written on his face. "Okay, um... Sorun, it's really important," he tried, pressing his palms together and pointing the fingers at Sorun. "There's something serious going on in New Megaopolis and we need to go check, so can you please help us out here?"

Anger began broiling inside of Sorun. No, more than that. Sheer disbelief at the audacity of this hedgehog and sheer rage at what was being asked of him. "As you seem to have forgotten , I am no longer a Freedom Fighter," Sorun seethed out, "so you have no right to ask such a thing from me."

"What's going on with you?" Sonic asked, his confusion only growing. "Sorun, I-I'm not asking you to fight or anything, I- it's a single portal, what's the big deal?"

"The big deal is I carry packages now, not living people," Sorun tersely replied through barely-repressed anger. "Go yourself."

Sonic's arms limply fell to his sides. Confusion was giving away to annoyance on the blue Mobian's face. "Okay, Sorun, I know you've been to New Megaopolis once before. I know for a fact you can open a portal there," he said, words growing more clipped as he talked. "It doesn't even take you ten seconds, man, come on."

"Pay me."

"You gotta be- for real?" Sonic palmed his own forehead and turned around, walking back a few steps. "You're actually being serious right now?" he asked, turning back around to face Sorun.

"My entire profession is making portals, Sonic. The days of lending my power to your cause are far behind me," Sorun said to him in a flat tone. He took another drink from his cup. "More than that it's my power and I'll do whatever I want with it, and what I don't want to do is open you a portal. So if you want a ride that badly then you'll have to pay for the service."

"... Okay just to be clear you're not joking? You're actually doing this right now?" The disbelief on Sonic's face was slowly giving way to frustration. Seeing the expression begin to form served to somewhat elevate Sorun's mood. "Sorun. It's just a small favor."

The Voidborn didn't respond. He just tilted his head back and drank from his cup again while never taking his eyes off Sonic.

"You actually are doing this, I can't believe it." Sonic made an angry-sounding sigh and pinched at his nose. "I can't... fine, whatever, how much you want?"

"Hm..." Sorun tapped his cane in thought. He almost considered actually humoring Sonic... but the idea of enraging him even more was a prospect Sorun couldn't resist. "You're asking me to assist in matters I've long since done away with while also violating my personal ethics as a package courier. I couldn't ask for any less than a million mobiums." He glanced at the monkey. "A head."

Sonic froze. He blinked once, and then his eyes narrowed over at Sorun. "Okay, Sorun, the joke's starting to get a bit old now," he said, tone growing lower.

"There is no joke," Sorun responded. "I'm quite serious. Two million or you can get out of my face and stop wasting my time."

"You can't just make up some bogus price on-"

"I can monetize my power however I wish, Sonic ." Sorun hissed the name out. "You of all people have no right to ask anything of me. You will NEVER have the right to ask me for anything." He pointed his cane at the stands. "Go beg Sally or Elias for the money or go along your own way to New Megaopolis."

"What is wrong with you!?" The dam finally broke, and Sonic yelled out in anger at Sorun. "This is an actual, serious emergency! Ten seconds! I'm asking for ten seconds of your time here to help everyone out! It's not even that hard for you to do! You do it all the time!"

"U-um... Sorun?" Both Sorun and Sonic snapped their heads over at Silver. He flinched at the looks, taking a step back with his hands nervously curled towards his center. "This, um, this sounds kind of serious. Are you sure you can't help out a bit? Just this once?" He looked away at the piercing glare Sorun was giving him. "I-I don't know wh-what the problem is," he stuttered out, "but wouldn't... wouldn't it be nice to help?"

"Silver..." All the anger he felt, and all the joy he felt at making Sonic feel even the least bit frustrated, all completely flooded out of Sorun when he saw the nervous demeanor Silver was currently holding. He didn't want him to see this. He didn't want Silver to be anywhere near this. "It would... mean a lot to me if you left right now," Sorun told him. "Please. Just go back and wait for me."

"Soru-?"

"Please."

"You... alright." Silver cast one more look at Sonic, who seemed to be a mixture of confusion and anger currently, and then back at Sorun, who was staring at him. "I-I'll go wait at our seats. Just, er, no fighting? Please?"

"... It won't got that far. I promise." Sorun felt a small bit of relief when that was enough to convince Silver, as he turned around and began walking away. As soon as he was out of earshot Sorun turned back to Sonic. The seething fury and glee returned. "So, what else can I deny for you today?"

He didn't even make it to the entrance of the stadium before he heard the two yelling behind him.

Silver had flinched when he heard it. Sonic's growingly frustrated voice and the cold, callous tone that Sorun was speaking in. It made his footsteps speed up as he made it to the entrance of the stadium, just wanting to be away from all the negativity those two were generating just by yelling at each other. His heart went out to the poor monkey person that had to stand there and just watch all that.

"I wonder what's gotten into Sorun...?" Silver wondered as he walked down the corridor under the stadium. It was a long, dark hallway. The only source of light was the large, open entrance at the far end of the corridor. "He seemed so calm and happy after the whole surgery thing and I thought everything was fine. What happened?"

Admittedly Sorun had always been kind of tense, for as long as Silver knew him. Maybe a bit irritable, but knowing everything Silver did about him he couldn't be all that surprised. But in his experience even on his worst days he tried to be polite and was never that... well, mean with anyone! But back there when he was talking with Sonic it was like all of that vanished. That searing look he kept giving Sonic, that tone so full of derision, the way he seemed to get more animated the angrier Sonic got, as if he was liking the conflict he was creating. Or maybe just liking Sonic getting mad. Silver didn't get it either way. It didn't make sense for someone to get happier because they were making things worse.

"It just... doesn't make sense. Sorun doesn't act that way-"

There was a sound of static and a small whooshing sound from besides Silver. Somebody dressed completely in red stepped next to him and placed a black-gloved hand on his shoulder before he could react.

"Hey," Rubrum greeted. "Let's go for a walk."

"Who-!?" Silver yelped out in surprise and reflexively swung his arm to try and dislodge the foreign hand from his shoulder. And then he made a startled gasp and stepped back in shock; he wasn't in the stadium corridor anymore. He was... he wasn't even in the city anymore! This was a forest! Short, panicked breaths left Silver as he spun around, but everywhere he looked there were just more trees. It was even a bright afternoon sky - it'd been overcast a second ago!

Silver's mind began spinning as fast as he was as he looked around. He was just in the city. Just there, and now he was here out in the middle of the forest! "Where is- how- what just happened!?" his mind screamed out as he looked around. And then he froze, because there he was. Someone dressed completely in red, and their face obscured with a red hood, leaning against a nearby tree as they looked towards Silver. They waved at him.

"Wh-what the... who are you, what did you just do!?" Silver yelled out. He was too confused to articulate his feelings. The confusion from what was happening and the wariness he felt from the person in front of him were all too conflicting, too much happening for him to make sense of it. It was making him feel terribly confused.

"I took us... about a hundred miles from New Mobotroplis," the red-dressed person - male from the voice - said. "And a week into the future."

"What!?" Oh no, that was just more confusing. It made Silver's face squint harder from the narrowed look he was already giving the man. "Why would- who even are you!?"

"I'm... some guy," he introduced, pointing his thumb at himself.

"I-I-I meant a name!" Silver stuttered out.

"In this rotten world names are an immaterial thing that don't matter all that much," the red guy said as he pushed himself off the tree. "You'll just have to work with that."

That didn't help him at all. "Alright..." Silver muttered out, even though this wasn't alright at all. "You... said you took me into the future? You're a time-traveler like me?"

The red guy froze for a second. And then he laughed. "Ahahaha! N-no, not at all," he chuckled out, shaking his hooded head. "Time travel implies I can go backwards and forwards in time. I can't go backwards. Forwards I can do - forwards is easy. Backwards is... a whole 'nother ballgame." He tilted his head at Silver. "Then again you don't have your precious Time Stone so I guess that doesn't apply to you, either."

Silver's fists clenched at his side. "How do you know about that?"

The red guy sighed and slumped his torso forwards, arms hanging limp. "I just abducted you and stole you into the future without your consent, these really the questions you wanna ask?"

"Yes! I mean no! I mean- agh!" Silver shook his head and ran his hands through his quills. Now he was just trying to confuse him. "Why did you take me here!?" he yelled out, pointing a finger at him.

"Ah, that..." A remorseful sigh left the red guy. He crouched down onto the ground, arms extended outwards and resting on his knees. "You're just a bit too strong to have been there when the Iron Dominion invaded New Mobotropolis. Had to balance the board a bit."

Silver's eyes widened as panic lanced through him. "What!?"

"Well yeah, I mean, you coulda soloed that whole invasion. Normally you wouldn't even be here yet but-"

"N-no, what invasion!?" he screamed out. "Somebody invaded the city!? What are you talking about!?"

"Oh, the Iron Dominion," whoever this guy is said, as if that explained it all. "They're this army from Yurashia lead by a madwoman that invaded New Mobotropolis with the intention of subjugating the land, lobotomizing all the citizens and turning them all into cyborg slaves. Real bad bunch."

Every single word Silver heard made his heart race more and more. "Wh... no, slow down, what...?" He stumbled back, breath catching as he held his head in shock. "B-but everyone and Sorun is- but- no that-" he looked up at the man in shock. "You teleported me a week after all that!?" he screamed out. "What did you do!? What happened to my friends, wha- WHY!?"

The red-dressed man held his arms up. "Relax. Everyone's fine," he said, setting his arms back on top of his knees as he continued to crouch.

"Huh...?" Silver's breath hitched. Everything going on, everything he was saying, it was all causing too many thoughts to race through his head, but that one sentence was dangling out the barest shred of hope he couldn't help but latch on to. "They're... everyone's okay...?" he whispered out.

"Yeah. The Iron Dominion got completely crushed," he confirmed.

"Th-then... you didn't help?" Silver breathed out. He should feel relieved, maybe a small part of him did feel relieved, but this was all just so bizarre and he didn't know what to think. "Didn't you take me away from that just to help them? You're not with them...?"

"No. I did it because... eh, don't worry about it." The red-dressed guy stood up and pointed to the side. "The only thing I wanted to do was stagger your presence in time with the invasion, and stagger it I did. So you can leave." He made a shooing motion with his black-gloved hand. "Go on, fly free! I won't stop you. Head on back to New Mobotropolis and pretend none of this happened."

"B-but..." Silver trailed off, eyes going wide. Something in his mind clicked when he realized the man dressed in red was wearing red clothes. "It's... it's you!"

"Meh?"

"Y-you, you're that... you're that guy Sorun was talking about, aren't you!" Silver accused. "He said there was some weird guy dressed in red with impossible information running around! Th-that you did weird stuff like set Sorun up to get that last Chaos Emerald that killed him way back! He said that was you!"

"Ah... yeah, that's me." The red-dressed guy started to rub the back of his head with his hand, as if he were embarrassed. "Yeah, I did that. And a bunch of other stuff. The guy at the beginning of this mess that killed all those royal guardsmen back at Castle Acorn and stole the Chaos Emerald that was there? A hundred percent that was me. You did it. You solved the mystery. Congrats."

"You... I heard about that! That was you!?" The confusion was beginning to lessen now as more coherent feelings began to settle in Silver. Namely anger and horror. Mostly anger. "You killed people ! For what!? Why!?"

"Reasons." He didn't sound wholly concerned with the whole affair. "Did they give you the whole story? Tell you how that Hershey girl was so mutilated they could barely tell it was her?"

Silver gasped and grit his teeth. "You-!"

"She didn't deserve it, didn't even plan on killing her, she just happened to be there, but her husband Geoffrey is the absolute worst," he continued. "So after I killed her I thought, 'eh, might as well go the extra mild,' so I just kept going to town on the corpse. Just over and over, for like, ten minutes straight. Didn't even let it touch the ground I was attacking so much. I was styling on that corpse, Silver."

Silver gagged out, repressing the urge to vomit from the description he heard. It put a pained sensation in his chest and made tears prick at the edge of his eyes. "How... how could you...!?"

"Are you serious? Imagine the look on that Geoffrey guy's face when they told him some maniac cut his wife up into sashimi," the red-dressed guy laughed out. "I bet it was hilarious. Probably still depressed about it actually-"

"ENOUGH!"

No more. He couldn't hear any more - he didn't want to hear anymore! Teal-colored energies began to roil around Silver's hands as he flexed his powers outwards. In the next instant the red-dressed man completely froze as his body was enveloped in his psychokinetic energies.

"... Huh." The red-dressed guy sounded surprised, frozen in place like that. "Well this is-"

"Stop talking. Just stop talking," Silver bit out. All those words he'd said, laughing about killing and brutalizing someone's wife, it... it set his blood boiling with rage. Anger Silver had never felt before, so much he felt himself shaking as he glared at the man. "I don't know who you are or what you want, why you did these things and what else you've been doing, but it stops now!" he yelled out. "I'm taking you back to the Republic of Acorn so you can answer for everything you've done! And then you're gonna tell me who you are and why you've been messing around with Sorun!"

It wouldn't fix anything he'd done, but... Silver didn't know why, but he wanted something done about all this. Justice for people that'd been harmed or killed because of this man, or even answers for Sorun! Something! Just anything he could do to make it at least a little better!

"Ah, that's a no-go," the man flippantly responded. "Hey, listen, just let me go and we can both go our separate ways."

"I'm not letting you go!" Silver screamed out. "You just admitted to murder! And you've probably done a bunch of other bad stuff! YOU KIDNAPPED ME!"

"And now I'm letting you go," he replied, as if that fixed it all. "What does taking me back to get locked up solve?"

"It means a murderer isn't running around free!" The teal power around Silver's hands flared brighter. "It means a horrible person like you can't hurt anyone else! A-and if I can bring you back, then... then I will!" He shook his head. "I'd never forgive myself if I let such an awful person like you go free!"

"... Well, good for you for having such strong moral fiber," the red-dressed guy sighed out. "You seem pretty dead-set on this. Have it your way."

"I said stop talking you-"

"You know, I hold your psychokinetic abilities rather highly," the red-dressed guy interrupted. "Really, I mean that. Your powers are good. They're so simple that there isn't really a good hard-counter for them, and for most people that's troublesome. It's too bad-"

Something impossible happened. Red energy began crackling along the man's body, and then he... flexed his arm and broke out of Silver's hold. Completely.

"-that if you're stupid strong like me you can just muscle your way through it."

/ / WARNING ! ! ! / /

Rubrum

?-?-? ?-?-?-?-?-?-? ?-? ?-?-?-?-?-?-?-?-?

"Ah!" Silver cried out as he stepped back, the power flowing around his hands fluctuating. He'd felt it, how that man had just... shrugged his power right off. Like it was a piece of clothing he'd casually tossed off. "That's... never happened to me before..."

"Silver, buddy, I ain't gonna lie." He wasn't in front of him anymore. Silver whirled to the side, yelling in surprise and jumping back. Rubrum was right next to him now, leaning towards him almost mockingly. "This is a real bad match-up for you."

"Shut up!" Silver waved his hand, once again enveloping Rubrum in teal energy as he telekinetically flung him backwards. But he only traveled a few meters. That red energy crackled over his body again and he broke out of Silver's hold, stopping a short distance away. "Agh...!"

He felt feedback in his body every time he extended his powers to something. It's how Silver maintained such a fine control over what his powers were holding. Having it... forced off like how Rubrum was doing was causing a kind of feedback that physically hurt him every time it happened. "I can't grab him with my power, so...!" He looked to the side. There was a fallen log sitting there. Thinking quick he grabbed onto it with his powers. The log was enveloped in a teal energy and rose up into the air. With a single gesture he flung the log towards Rubrum.

"Huh?" Rubrum almost sounded... confused. He casually leaned to the side to avoid the log. "No, no, that's..." he mumbled to himself, almost sounding troubled as he dodged a second log, and then a third. Silver began pulling a fourth log up-

Rubrum was standing in front of him now. Silver frightfully yelped, almost dropping the log floating up in the air from the sudden closeness. Rubrum leaned forwards, close enough that his obscured face was nearly touching the hedgehog's nose. "Put more power behind the throws. I shouldn't have time to see them coming and dodge," he whispered out to Silver. "Crush them up, too. Splinter them. It's too easy dodging one object."

"How did he- huh!?" Silver blinked and shook his head. He picked himself up with his own power and flew back, putting more distance between him and Rubrum, who just calmly stood there and waited for him. He picked up another log with his powers, though... hesitated a moment. His words echoed in Silver's mind, making him blanch. "I can't believe... well, you wanted it!" His powers crushed the tree, splintering in half and then fragmenting those halves into further splinters. It seemed... cruel in Silver's eyes, to do something like this, but... he was getting genuinely worried for how this fight way going, for how this man was just shrugging Silver's power off him. He needed to do something more here.

He flung the wooden splinters. Rubrum made a frustrated noise, and... moved. He still had his hands in his pockets, though he was making quick, minute movements, seemingly flowing around all the wooden shards tossed at him. "No, no, no!" he yelled out. "Not dozens, hundreds! Thousands ! Don't give me room to dodge!"

"Stop giving me advice, you murderer!" Silver yelled out, though he tripped over his own words because of the content of what he'd just said. Was he being this confusing on purpose just to throw him off? "You-!"

He was in front of Silver again, making his voice die in his throat. "Is it teleporting!?" Silver though as he attempted to fly back again. "It has to be if he brought me here, but when does he-!?"

Rubrum's hand snapped out and grabbed Silver's wrist. "You're really not getting it," he said, pulling a startled Silver close enough that their bodies became flush. "You have all this open space, all this ammunition lying around. USE IT!" He reared back and kicked Silver straight in the chest, letting go of his at the same time.

He'd managed to protect himself. Just barely. In the instant before that kick connected with Silver's chest he managed to form a thin barrier of psychokinetic energy around his form. Even then the kick still knocked the wind out of him. After that he couldn't see much, because there'd been so much energy behind the kick Silver was sent flying back. Further and further, body crashing through dozens of trees and making him elicit a high-pitched grunt every time. The barrier was mitigating most of the damage but even then he was feeling every tree he crashed through.

There was red in the corner of his vision. Silver managed to crack his eye open as he flew back, and in that singular moment he saw sparks of red electricity to his immediate left. The eye widened he saw it was all around Rubrum - "How!? When!?" - who was sitting down on one of the fallen logs Silver was flying past. He hand snapped out and he grabbed at Silver's wrist, stopping all his momentum. The sudden stop rattled Silver and made him let out a cry of pain from the sudden whiplash he felt his body endure from it. Then Rubrum threw him, making Silver crash through two more trees before he finally stopped on the third one.

"I need you to put more effort into this," Rubrum called out as a groaning Silver slid down the tree he'd been thrown into. "You're getting nowhere at this rate."

Silver coughed out as he slid down to the ground, sitting against the tree as the barrier around him flickered out. His yellow eyes cracked open. The anger and frustration he felt for the person in front of him was increasing more and more as he felt himself become more heated. "What do you even want!?"

"Me? I wanna leave. You're the one trying to capture me here," Rubrum said. He made an exaggerated groan and stood up to his feet. "You could turn around and fly off right now and I wouldn't do a thing."

"Then leave," Silver huffed out as he shakily stood to his feet. "I can see you teleporting. Noth... nothing's stopping you," he said with a wince.

"Teleporting? Oh, sweet baby Silver..." Rubrum almost sounded amused with his response, chuckling a bit. "That isn't teleporting. That's just me moving really fast."

"Same difference," Silver coughed out. "Why are you doing this? Why are you doing any of this!?"

"Would you believe me if I said I have no clue?" Rubrum shrugged his shoulders, hands still pocketed.

"No! I wouldn't!"

"Ah, well..." Rubrum's hooded head glanced to the side. "All I really needed to do was get you to miss the invasion from the Iron Dominion. This fight... isn't at all necessary." His obscured face looked at Silver. "I guess I wanted a break."

"A break !?" Silver felt outraged just hearing that. What did that even mean, a break !?

Rubrum took a few moments to respond. "... It's just really heavy, all this stuff I've been doing the last week." he said. "I just wanted to do something else. Just for a few minutes." He made an unsatisfied noise. "But... you're really bad at fighting, you know? This isn't very fun."

There was too much going on in Silver's heart to even be hurt by that comment. From all the anger he felt from standing in front of a murderer to the physical pain Silver felt across his body to the frustration he felt at not being able to do anything. It was almost too much. "Fun? That's what you're worried about?" he hissed out in an angered breath. "Those royal guardsmen you killed all had families! You think they're having fun over the fact you killed those people!?"

"I genuinely don't care," Rubrum informed him. He stuck his hand into the hood obscuring his face and was making a motion as if he were cleaning his ear out with his finger "All I'm hearing from you is 'wah wah wah, you murdered people.' It's like you care more about a bunch of faceless mooks you've never even met than me." He huffed out in frustration and threw his hands to the side. "Do I gotten threaten to murder people you actually know to motivate you? Is that it?"

Thump-thump . The moment he heard that Silver felt a ringing in his ears. He could barely pay attention to anything else other than the words being replayed in his head. He was... threatening people. People Silver knew, like everyone in New Mobotropolis. Like Sorun. The anger in his heart exploded outward; he felt his power surge as teal energy coalesced around the hedgehog's body. "That's IT...!"

Rubrum perked up. "Yes...?"

Silver snapped his hands out to his side. Logs - dozens of them - became enveloped in his power. They were crushed, over and over, splintered and shredded by the psychokinetic power running through them.

"Yes!"

The wooden shards soon numbered in the thousands. They gathered around, surrounded by a veritable cloud of teal energy as it all settled in front of Silver, who glared at Rubrum with hatred. Thousands upon thousands of wooden shards, all aimed at that single man.

"YES!"

"I SAID SHUT UP!" Silver screamed. He waved his hand. Every single wooden shard shot forwards with so much force they left behind visible, conical reverberations in the air. Some of the smallest shards even became alit in flame from the air friction as they all flew towards Rubrum. Despite even that, it was still a wall of sharpened debris. An absolute cluster of deadly wood spikes that was guaranteed to hit, regardless of one's size or speed. He would be completely skewered. That was an absolute fact.

Rubrum disappeared in a cloud of black and red vapors right before the shards hit. They all slammed into the ground with enough force to leave a field of small craters in the ground where he stood. He reappeared behind a shocked Silver in another cloud of black and red vaporous energy.

"That was me teleporting," Rubrum muttered out after leaning towards Silver's ear from behind.

Silver's reaction was near-instant. He spun around, swinging his teal-glowing fist out to no avail. Rubrum simply teleported away again right before he hit, making Silver breath out heavily as his eyes wildly darted around.

"What trash spatial awareness." He was behind Silver again. The white-furred Mobian turned, freezing when he saw Rubrum leering over him. "Poor reaction." The red-dressed man flicked his hand out; Silver just barely managed to erect a teal shield to protect his face. It didn't work. Rubrum's hand smashed right through and grabbed at Silver's face, whose scream became muffled by the palm grabbing at him. "Let's take this up."

They were up in the air now. High up in the sky, amidst the clouds. Silver looked around in a panic, hands gripping Rubrum's wrist as he attempted to free himself and figure out what happened at the same time. They hadn't moved - Silver hadn't felt wind rush past him. They'd just appeared here. Teleporting. "But I didn't see that effect that happened when I saw him teleporting! How does he keep moving us!?"

There wasn't enough time to think. Rubrum flung Silver away, the hedgehog making staggered grunts as he flew through the sky. His heart was threatening to pound through his chest, and most of Silver's effort was being put towards attempting to control his breathing as he tumbled end-over-end through the clouds. He couldn't even make anything out. He was spinning around so hard that it was just blurs of whites and blues.

Red. There was suddenly red - flickers of red energy licking the corners of his vision. Activating another psychokinetic protective barrier was instinctual at this point. Nothing more than an animalistic reflex to avoid getting hurt as his mind raced to catch up to what was happening. His body made the right choice; Rubrum, somehow, had appeared underneath Silver as he tumbled through the air and kicked him right in the stomach to send him shooting straight up. The Mobian gagged out, the wind being knocked out of him and his body going numb from the strike despite the barrier around him. He didn't even make it to the apex of his ascent before Rubrum appeared once again in midair, hands pocketed. All Silver could do was weakly look towards him as he kicked Silver in the face with the bottom of his boot, sending him flying backwards.

Thinking was... starting to get too hard to do. Too much pain wracking his body, too exhausted from his mind trying to cope with everything happening. He'd appear again, had to do something, what, do what, he couldn't grab him and there was nothing up here to grab, there was NOTHING TO DO-!

Rubrum appeared above Silver and kicked him in the back. He shot down - straight down, directly towards the ground. "Slow, need slow can't hit!" Teal energy flared out from Silver's body as he tried to slow himself down. It was working, if barely. The friction he felt burning away at his psychokinetic barrier was tapering off and he felt himself slowly more and more as he approached the ground. He'd sighed out when, finally, he did stop - just a few meters right above the ground.

The relief ended when Rubrum, who was now standing next to Silver, reached out and grabbed at his ankle. He'd made a startled scream that was instantly cut off when Rubrum slammed his body into the ground hard enough he'd bounced once before falling face-first into the dirt.

"It really ain't lookin' good." Rubrum's voice sounded amused as his hooded head looked down at Silver. "I mean, I'm holding back ninety percent of my kit here and you're still losing hard, Silver."

"..." Silver pushed himself up off the ground, teeth grit in pain and eyes half-lidded from exhaustion. Every part of his body was hurting and aching now, and darkness was starting to infringe at the edge of his vision. "Need to... get away..." He held a shaky hand up, coughing as teal energy coalesced between his fingers. "Just... need to... stall him..."

A sphere of teal energy instantly appeared around Rubrum, completely encapsulating him. A strong barrier. Strong enough to hold him back and give Silver time to run away, maybe hide somewhere to recuperate some of his strength and-

Red cracks appeared and spiderwebbed across the entire surface of the teal bubble holding Rubrum. Red, electrical energy crackled angrily from the cracks, which only damaged the barrier more and more. Silver grunted, eyes narrowing and hand shaking even harder as he attempted to hold the barrier together. It was no good. He screamed out from the feedback when the barrier completely shattered, revealing Rubrum standing there calmly with a hand rose up as he stared on. Silver's hand flopped uselessly to his side, teal energy racing along the numb appendage.

"How sad. This really is all you got." Rubrum's hand lowered to his side. He didn't sound so amused anymore. More disappointed than anything else. "Better'n most, but that in of itself ain't that high a bar." He walked right in front of Silver, crouching down in front of him. "You're supposed to save the future? You can't even save yourself."

"Stop... talking..." It was taking Silver all the strength he had to lift his left arm up. The only arm that was still listening to him.

"Aw, that's the spirit, Silver, keep trying," Rubrum said. His voice sounded mocking. Patronizing with the slightest bit of pity. "That's it, pal, keep going. Get that arm up."

"Eh... ergh..." He felt sweat dampening his fur as he lifted the arm up halfway, with half his face still lying in the dirt. He could only lift his head up partway to have at least one eye balefully glare at Rubrum.

"Great job. Almost there!" Rubrum laughed. The hand was almost fully pointed at him. "You can do it. You have to do it. Think about it: said so yourself I'm a dangerous murder that needs to be locked up."

His tone was suddenly filled with mock worry. "What if I go to New Mobotropolis and just start tearing all the Freedom Fighters apart with my bare hands? Who'd gonna stop me from killing all the kids then?" The mocking tone left as the crouched Rubrum leaned down lower to Silver. "Who'd stop me from wiping the entire Republic off the map? Who'd stop me from grinding all of Nicole's servers to dust and wiping her from existence?"

Suddenly Silver didn't feel so tired. All the pain and exhaustion was rapidly fading as renewed anger began filling his very being. Wisps of teal energy began flowing off his body like steam, and teal arcs of electricity raced over his form as his breathing became louder, more frantic. Particles of light began gathering in the center of Silver's palm.

Rubrum leaned down even lower. His voice became a quiet, neutral drone. "Who would stop me from tearing Sorun's heart out right in front of you?"

That did it. Something in Silver snapped - his ears were filled with the roaring sound of energy as it crackled along his entire form. That and the sound of his own roaring as his hand went from glowing teal to practically glowing white. "RRRRAAAGH!"

Rubrum disappeared. So did a large swath of forest behind him.

So... Silver had screamed. Rubrum had expected that, it was the reaction he was going for. Then he unleashed that attack. Understandable. He'd been ready for it.

... Well, he thought he'd been ready for it.

What actually happened was that Silver screamed. And then Rubrum blinked. Then he saw he was over the ocean. He blinked again - now he was over land rushing by so fast he was having a hard time visualizing it. There'd... been a mountain at some point. The momentum he was carrying smashed him right through that.

Honestly there may have been more than one mountain - Rubrum wasn't entirely sure.

He'd hit ground. It didn't stop Rubrum's momentum at all. His body carved a trench all the way from one end of Yurashia to another, right through the whole continent. That took about two seconds. He hit the ocean again, water tearing at his body and even steaming from the friction he was putting out. He only finally ran out of momentum when he reached Downunda, coming to a stop about halfway through.

Overall Silver's attack had flung Rubrum across most of the planet in the span of about six seconds.

He was flat on his back, staring straight up at the sky. Rubrum's left arm was missing - somewhere on another continent, probably, or in the ocean somewhere waiting to be eaten by a sea creature. His bones were literal dust, it felt like. Organs were pulverized into jelly. About half his blood got spread all over the planet during that.

"Okay. I might have overdone it."

Aside from the arm all of the damage was regenerated as Rubrum slowly sat up. "Sheesh... I just wanted to rile him up a bit. He didn't have to take it so seriously..." He looked towards his missing arm. Red energy spread out from the stump and formed into the shape of his arm. The red energy then receded, leaving behind a regenerated left arm. "Still, good on him for getting one hit in," he continued in earnest as red cubes of energy swarmed around his left arm. The sleeve and glove he'd lost reappeared to conceal the pale skin underneath.

"Alright, let's... get back at it..." Rubrum slowly stood to his feet... and then promptly sat back down. "Nope, not happening. Ugh... fuck, Silver..." Rubrum mumbled, holding a hand to his hooded head. He had to sit down for a few more moments to catch his breath, and then tried standing again. This time Rubrum managed to successfully stay on his feet. "Th-there we go, that's it..."

Silver panted, staring forwards at the missing patch of forest he'd... he'd done that? He blew all of that away? It was at least a good mile or two of forest just gone. Completely erased when he'd blown it all away.

"I-I... I didn't... mean to d-destroy all that..." He barely even had the energy to think. To breath , even. Forget about his psychokinetic power. It was spent in its entirety. Even moving was completely out as an option. He was done. Set to pass out at any moment here.

But... but it was worth it. He was gone. The person dressed in red. Silver didn't have a clue where he blew him away to but he was gone. He couldn't hurt anyone. At least he could pass out feeling content, knowing everyone else was safe.

Those thoughts were dashed when he saw tongues of red electricity out in the corner of his vision. With all his remaining strength he moved his head just a few inches. He felt his heart sink and all hope drain out of him when he saw Rubrum sitting down on a nearby rock, red electricity crackling around him. He didn't have even a single scratch on him. "N...no..."

"More of that ," Rubrum said, voice unusually calm.

"..." Silver didn't have the energy to retort. He tried raising his arm, but it was no good. No part of his body was listening to him. He couldn't even feel it at this point.

"Nah, you're done," Rubrum said with a shake of his head. "It's a shame, too. The sad fact is that you could be one of the strongest guys in this whole universe... but you'll never be more than mid at best. Wanna know why?" Rubrum tapped at his own chest, near his heart. "A killer instinct. You don't got it. I teased it out of you back there, sure, but it's not a thing you could consistently use. You're too nice."

Silver coughed. His vision was rapidly darkening as his eyes began to close on their own.

"Ah, but... what do I know? I'm just the strongest guy in the whole multiverse." Still sitting down, Rubrum placed his palms flat on the rock and leaned back, hooded head looking up at the sky. "... It's not so bad though, Silver. Not having a killer instinct. Don't beat yourself up over it." He pushed himself off the rock. "Truth is I'd love nothing more than to live in a world where nobody had a killer instinct. I lost my taste for blood a while ago."

It was no good. Silver wasn't listening to him. He couldn't - right as Rubrum said the last word there he passed out right on the spot. Rubrum didn't show any outwards reaction. He just stood completely still as he stared down at the hedgehog's body.

"... I guess I had a bit of fun after all. Thanks for that," Rubrum finally said after ten minutes of staring. "I need to go stop Eggman from hitting the button now. Bye."

He turned around and left Silver to his rest.

Chapter 105

A/N- Yeah, I know, I was gone for a bit. Life slapped me across the face; I'm back now.

Recursion Error

Episode 105- The day the dream died

Present

"..."

Where did it go wrong?

Exactly how much strife and anguish did Sorun have to suffer through from the moment he'd landed on Mobius all in order to earn some semblance of a normal life? To claw something back resembling the life he once had, even if it was just on the surface, to live normally again? So many fights, so many battles, stress, death, dying . Sorun hated every single moment of it all and suffered through it because the dream was supposed to be at the other end of the tunnel.

A place to live. Stable job, stable income. Not having to worry for necessities. Group of supportive friends, pet, girlfriend. A sense of community. Safety. Home. Things... Sorun didn't think should have been so hard to obtain. Things he had obtained. The moment he went through with that surgery to get that new skeleton it should have been the end of it. He'd done it. It was finished. Everyone else could do all the fighting if there was more to be had. He was done .

He was supposed to be done.

"..."

This wasn't home, where Sorun was. This was a dingy prison cell they'd thrown Sorun into, shackling his one working arm to the wall.

"..."

Things were supposed to be safe. He'd been promised that. He'd been surrounded by some of the strongest people in the world in one of the safest cities in the world. It should have been fine. He should have been safe. The dream wasn't supposed to just... crumble apart like that. Like it was nothing.

"..."

Where did it go wrong?

---

1 day ago

Silver never came back last night.

It was a bit odd to Sorun, considering Silver flat-out lived in this house at the moment and didn't have anywhere else to go. And that... while nobody in New Mobotropolis disliked him (he was only somewhat sure of this) at the same time he wasn't exactly on amicable terms with anyone but Sorun. And to an extent Nicole. And the pet Chao. So it was odd to Sorun that he never came back to the house on the night of the disastrous concert incident, and even now, the next day, Sorun still couldn't find him.

"Where is he?" Sorun opened a random cabinet in the kitchen. No Silver, as if he'd been expecting Silver to just be huddled in there for whatever reason. "Hm..." He closed the cabinet. He didn't outright recall anything happening that would cause Silver to disappear. It'd been Sonic Sorun had been arguing with, not Silver. To make matter weirder Nicole said she hadn't even seen him return to his seat in the stadium after Sorun last saw him. So... he disappeared around then.

He didn't really know what that meant.

"Maybe he just had some weird epiphany about this whole traitor thing and found somewhere quiet to think," Sorun rationalized to himself, convinced that made complete and total sense. That was it. He was just... out somewhere. Thinking. Somewhere more quiet than the inside of this home. Surely that was it.

He sighed out. Wasn't much more to do on that front, he supposed, especially with him being alone at the moment. Nicole was off doing something important with the Freedom Fighters. Virgil was off in the park with Cream since her pet was the only other Chao in town and he liked to flaunt superiority over him. Which just left Sorun here.

Some yelling from outside drew Sorun's attention to the window. There was a gaggle of three Mobian children jeering at someone on the walkway right in front of his lawn... actually, wait, were those... they were. Those were the three kids that yelled at Sorun and threw rocks at him on his first day of Mobius. And now they were yelling and throwing rocks at someone else. A monkey Mobian - it was the same guy that crashed the concert yesterday, Sorun realized. They were throwing rocks at him.

"Egh..." Sorun made a disgruntled sound. For as little patience as he held for the monkey after everything that happened yesterday, he... supposed it wouldn't be responsible to stand by and let children enforce a behavior of stoning people. He looked down at his cane. It shifted from a metal implement into a Chaos Emerald. A wave radiated outward from his position and briefly turned the world grayscale as time stopped.

He had to hurry a bit. Ever since getting the artificial blood and skeleton these kinds of abilities were way more strenuous on him and he couldn't maintain them as long. He'd ran - not that he'd admit he ran - out from his home and moved as fast as he could towards the group at the front of his house, noting he'd caught them mid-throw of a rock. He stopped just in front of the monkey, doing his best to regain his composure and control his breathing to make sure he wouldn't look winded and lose his image. And after he did that he conceived of the plan - he'd turn the Chaos Emerald back into V's cane and bat the rock out of the air. He'd say some cool stuff to discipline the children and have them abandon their rock-throwing ways. And then the monkey Mobian would be so impressed with Sorun he'd have no choice but to talk to him and explain what he thought he was doing standing in front of his lawn. It was perfect.

It fell apart almost immediately. Time resumed at the exact same moment Sorun turned the Emerald back into the cane. He swung it upwards with the intent on intercepting the rock sailing towards the monkey. He missed. He missed hard, didn't even come close. The rock whistled past Sorun's ear and hit the monkey right on the face. He heard him make a quiet grunt. The three children at least did freeze when they saw Sorun just appear there from out of nowhere, faces shocked and eyes a tad bit fearful.

... Alright, hard fumble in the beginning there but maybe he could salvage it.

"Children, children, children..." Sorun's cane made audible tap! sounds as he slowly approached the three, who now all seemed very interested in the ground. "What did we learn about throwing rocks at other people?" Sorun's voice came out even, a slight bit chastising as he looked down at the three children with a vaguely amused look.

The three immediately began stammering excuses. "W-we didn't mean- we were only messing around-"

"We're sorry, Mr. Sorun-"

"He ruined miss Mina's concert!" The more rambunctious one, a cat child with purple fur so dark it was nearly black, shouted and pointed at the monkey. The other three hesitantly nodded in response.

"... Yes, I'm aware. I was there," Sorun calmly responded. "Regardless... you shouldn't throw rocks at people, terrible first impression or otherwise. Do you not regret what you did the first time around?" He knew for a fact they did. They sent him apology and get-well cards after he'd saved the whole town after Eggman teleported everyone to New Megaopolis.

The three children instantly stiffened, guilty expressions on all their faces. "Yes, Mr. Sorun," they all intoned.

"Good. Now run along and don't let me catch you doing this again, or I'll have to inform your parents and I'm sure they would be thrilled in giving you remission lessons on why throwing rocks at people is a bad thing to do." That seemed to do the ticket. The kids rapidly nodded and scampered off out of sight. It made Sorun a bit relieved that what he said worked. He didn't feel like dealing with children any more than he had to.

"And now to you," Sorun thought, turning to the monkey Mobian. He was looking over at Sorun, one hand rubbing the spot the rock impacted while the other held a red staff of sorts. His fur was a normal brown - one of the most normal-colored Mobians he'd ever seen outside Sally and her family - and his hair was... Sorun wasn't sure. Some weird fusion between a pompadour and a mullet.

Hairstyle aside, Sorun decided to make the first approach. "My sincerest apologies for how the children acted towards you," Sorun said, cane impacting the ground as he stood in front of the monkey. "I received much the same same treatment my first day here. They're quite vicious."

"Yes, I... noticed." The monkey sighed, a bit downcast but otherwise not looking all that concerned as he lowered his hand from his head. Sorun noticed the rock hadn't left a visible wound on him. "For your Overlander heritage, I imagine?" he asked.

A few blue, electrical sparks traveled up the length of Sorun's cane. The monkey didn't react at all. "Let's keep such comments to ourselves," Sorun suggested, the smallest possible smile on his face. "And set the record straight while we're at it. I'm a human. Not an Overlander."

"Is there a difference?" It wasn't a mocking question. From his tone to his facial expression the monkey seemed genuine in asking, which served to calm Sorun somewhat.

"Humans aren't Overlanders. And technically speaking my humanity is... of a different sorts than the ones from this zone," Sorun told the monkey. "I'm not from this zone."

The monkey blinked a few times. "Is there a... tangible difference?"

"There's a vast ocean's worth of black separating us, yes," Sorun vaguely confirmed. "That's irrelevant, though," he continued. "Where are you from?" He gazed at the monkey's long vest with the yin-yangs on it. "Somewhere... eastern, I imagine."

The monkey's eyes widened a bit, as if surprised Sorun managed to devise that much from his clothes alone. "You'd be right." He made a soft sigh. A... cloud of all things appeared beneath him. The monkey collapsed into a sitting position on the cloud, face a morose expression as he loosely clutched his staff. "I'm from Yurashia," he mumbled out.

"Yurashia," Sorun flatly replied. The land that used to be China thousands of years ago. And Russia and India and... really every country east of what used to be the European continent. "And you're a monkey. With a staff who can seemingly conjure clouds," he continued, eyes narrowing a bit at the sight.

"... Yes?" The Mobian looked up at Sorun with a slightly confused expression. "What's your point?"

Sorun heaved a sigh. Might as well get it out of the way. "So what's your name? Goku? Wukong? One of those?"

Those names only seemed to serve to make the monkey more confused. He didn't seem to recognize the names. "No...? My name is Khan," he introduced.

"... Of course it is ." Sorun turned his head to the side, expression bitter. "You couldn't even give me that one, huh, world...?" he whispered to himself. Was the blatant 'Journey to the West' reference just a massive coincidence? Maybe, if the names were different. He'd seen weirder on this planet, but it still frustrated him.

"Um... I'm sorry if I did something. I didn't mean to offend," Khan said, tilting his head at Sorun's reaction.

"You did nothing." Sorun made a huff, turning back to the monkey. He didn't feel like explaining and getting sidetracked. "... Well, you did do something. At the concert yesterday," Sorun amended. "I took you for a raving madman with that entrance but you seem rather calm at the moment."

Khan flinched back from the words, guilt momentarily flashing over his face. "Right, well... you, too, seem rather calm compared to how I saw you yesterday," he pointed out. "Sonic spent the entire trip to New Megaopolis ranting and complaining about you. I'd... been under the impression from what little I heard of you that you were a more nobler sorts," he admitted. "Sonic assured me you'd help us."

Him. Noble. Sorun supposed his actions may have... inadvertently created that image. "It was nothing against you." That was only partially true. "It's... that Sonic asked me. You would have been much better off having someone else ask me."

"..." A small hum left Khan. He shifted around a bit on his cloud, placing one leg over the other as he looked away. "I see Sonic's comments weren't baseless."

"Meaning?" Sorun asked, looking right at Khan with narrowed eyes.

"Meaning," Khan continued, slowly looking back at Sorun, "if you're a shallow enough person to deny help to those in need of it purely because you don't like the one asking for said help, you seem to be about as shallow an individual as Sonic complained about. But that's just my observation."

"That so?" Sorun's eyes snapped down. He noted that the edge of the cloud Khan was sitting on was floating just above where the sidewalk terminated and his lawn began, with about an inch of cloud extending into his lawn. "You know, where I come from it's seen as poor form to step onto one's home and insult them."

There wasn't any visible reaction on Khan's part. The morose expression he'd worn earlier had shifted to an impassive expression as he regarded Sorun. "You find truth to be an insult?"

"More a lack of tact to be so," Sorun corrected. His eyes stayed on the spot where Khan's cloud floating above his lawn. It was irritating him. "In any event... whatever business you have here, it has precisely nothing to do with me. So kindly vacate yourself from my home."

Khan didn't respond verbally. What he did do was lazily look down where Sorun was looking, seeing the part of the cloud floating above the grass. And instead of leaving Khan just casually pressed the end of his staff onto the ground, pushing the cloud a few inches back so that it was entirely situated above the sidewalk. And then he calmly looked back up at Sorun.

"... Thank you." The words Sorun said didn't sound grateful. His voice was strained, expression brittle as he just barely managed to maintain a friendly expression. Even then a few more bolts of blue energy raced down his cane as his temper lost control.

And then Sorun heard it . The sound of footfalls so rapid it sounded like a singular, rapt tapping sound. The brief sound of crackling power and the wind rushing past Sorun as something moving extremely fast came to a stop right behind him. Sorun had made a slow, barely-steady breath as he turned around, not at all surprised to see Sonic standing there behind him. And not at all pleased, either.

Evidently Sonic himself wasn't overly pleased to see Sorun, either. He was scowling, which was already a rare-enough sight to see.

Arms crossed, mouth set in an intense frown as the hedgehog looked at Sorun. Eyes flicked back and forth between Sorun himself and the silver cane crackling with blue energy.

"Can you maybe go one day without antagonizing someone?" Sonic asked, no amusement to be found in his voice.

"I'm making an effort," Sorun retorted. "Apologies for it going poorly. What do you want?"

"Oh, well, nothing much, I was just minding my own business before I felt you halfway across town," Sonic stated, eyes fully looking down at the cane. "You said that didn't do anything. That it was just an ordinary, run-of-the-mill cane that was probably the most normal thing in your whole arsenal of weirdness you never talk about."

"I'm not obliged to tell you what I can do," Sorun said. He didn't even tell Nicole the secrets regarding his abilities; as if he'd tell Sonic of all people. "And anyway, it was nothing. I'm not one to start a fight out in public over mere words unlike some people," he added, giving Sonic a pointed look.

Sonic took a sharp inhale. The scowl he was wearing deepened. "That supposed to mean me?"

" One of us devolved to shouting during yesterday's... disagreement," Sorun pointed out. "It was assuredly not me."

"..." Sonic just stared at Sorun in disbelief. He held the stare for a few moments before breathing out, shaking his head. "Okay, Sorun, I don't... I'm not gonna pretend to understand what's going on with you, 'cause right now I'm a little too busy trying to head off a while invasion here, so if I could just scooch by you and get to Khan there-
"

"A what?" Sorun interrupted. The blue sparks trailing up and down his silver cane disappeared entirely; any irritation and anger he felt as Sonic's presence disappeared in a flash the moment "invasion" entered his ears.

" Yeah , Sorun, remember that thing we needed help with yesterday?" Sonic began, a fake smile creeping on his face as he spoke in a sarcastic tone. "You know, that whole, 'hey, can you take literally two seconds out of your life two give us a ride to New Megaopolis?' thing? That you said no to because I guess you just felt like giving us a hard time? Well, it turns out we really needed it 'cause Snively came back with a bunch of weirdos from Yurashia-!"

"Wait-wait-wait, slow down." Sorun interrupted as a heavy frown began settling over his face. Some of this was starting to sound familiar , what with the repeated mentioning of Yurashia and a part of that one conversation he'd had with Dimitri shortly before his surgery. "Does this have anything to do with some technology-controlling woman?"

Neither of them even needed to answer. Sorun saw the instant he'd mentioned her Khan's face inflame in genuine anger. As if even just mentioning her set him off. Suddenly he looked a lot more like the raging monkey Sorun had seen in the stadium just yesterday.

"That would be Regina ," Khan practically spat out with vitriol dripping from his tone. "Or as everyone underneath calls her the Iron Queen. Though I can't help but wonder how you know about her, Sorun."

"I was... briefly appraised of her. Briefly." Sorun said to him, and then looked back at Sonic. "Dimitri mentioned some technology-controlling woman was taking over Yurashia, but I never got a name before now."

"'Take over' is putting it mildly," Khan scoffed out. "She took over the four major clans that preside over Yurashia after killing one of their clan heads and forcing the others to fall in line behind her, not that they seemed to complain all that much. Her and the Iron Dominion stomped out any resistance that tried to oppose her; the entire Yurashia branch of Freedom Fighters was completely wiped out and I couldn't stop-!"

Khan cut himself off, voice beginning to grow heated. Guilt and regret intermingled with absolute rage was clearly present on his face, something both Sorun and Sonic recognized as they quietly stared at him. In Sorun's case he couldn't help but feel how Khan's expression was reminiscent of how he'd looked at the concert, and now he was getting the barest sense of why he'd been bent so out of shape. He was making it sound like a lot of things were lost in Yurashia's conquest.

"... She's a conceited madwoman bent on world domination and she isn't stopping with Yurashia," Khan breathed out, taking a moment to compose himself before looking back at the two. "I'd explained all this to the Freedom Fighters and Republic government already," he continued, looking at Sorun directly, "though I suppose you're filled in now as well."

"So it seems," Sorun mumbled out, glancing down. He felt troubled, and it was visible on his face. If it were just some crazy lady taking over Yurashia he wouldn't think too hardly about it, but now it sounded like she was coming here directly.

"And how do you even know about her anyway?" Sonic interjected, giving Sorun a puzzled look. "You said someone told you about Regina. Who?"

"Oh. The floating head guy, Dimitri," Sorun casually informed him. "It was while we were discussing my... health options. He made mention of the going-ons in Yurashia and what this... Regina lady was up to." Sorun paused, glancing down at the ground. "That said, he... said she was restricting her actions to Yurashia. He said he and the rest of the echidna were following Snively over to that continent to just stay there. He never said anything about Regina and the rest in Yurashia from coming here . Didn't mention a word about conquering other lands outside the continent or world domination. I'd have said something otherwise."

Sonic made a scoff, rolling his eyes while crossing his arms. "Yeah, well, they're here. The whole Iron Dominion. Looks like Snively sweet-talked them into trying for world conquest since Eggy's out of the picture, and I guess New Mobotropolis is first on their list of places to squash outside of Yurashia. They already set up shop in New Megaopolis and everything, in Eggman's old digs."

"... I suppose Dimitri must have been mistaken," Sorun murmured out, looking down in thought. A whole invading force from a different continent. That was... bad. Wrong . There wasn't supposed to be more of that. The fighting was supposed to be done with Eggman out of the picture. That was the point, the whole reason for... things were supposed to be fine now! "Or maybe they just... didn't tell him..."

"Yeah, or he lied," Sonic said, shaking his head. "You're really gonna trust a floating head in a bubble to tell you the truth of what Snively was plannin' the whole time?"

Sorun looked towards the blue hedgehog, giving him a dry look. "Well, yes. Considering he's done infinitely more to help me than you ever have."

"Would you knock it off?" Sonic snapped, seemingly finally having had enough with the passive-aggressive nature Sorun had been displaying this entire time. "Look, I don't know what your deal right now is, okay? Why you're acting like this or... or just what your problem with me is, but I don't have time for it, okay!? You know, I-I got a whole invasion to worry about here, I gotta work out all this with everyone else because it's so last-second, Espio flipped sides and we had to go through the trouble of stopping Knuckles and the rest of the gang from storming off to try and go get him-"

"He did what?" Sorun asked, blinking in surprise. There were a lot of words that Sonic said that flat-out just didn't register with Sorun. "Espio" and "flipping sides" made absolutely no sense to him. Because as little as they interacted, Espio was still a friend the last time Sorun checked. The words Sonic said didn't make sense.

"Yeah. Espio. He was in New Megaopolis - on their side with all those other Yurashia people," Sonic clarified, eyes narrowing at Sorun as he crossed his arms. "I don't know why , guy didn't say a word and Khan and I were a little busy dealing with the literal army bearing down on us, but he's with them-"

"I saw him yesterday, at that concert," Sorun mumbled. He felt confused, speaking in a puzzled voice as he spoke to Sonic. "He was running away with some... other guy, never saw him before. Was dressed like him-"

"Yeah, and maybe if you'd given us a ride to New Megaopolis like we asked we could've gotten there before he did! Maybe we could have actually done something-!"

"A difference of a few hours," Sorun cut in, "was not going to have any effect on the preparedness of a whole invasion force already dug into a city-"

"Well you don't know that!" Sonic exclaimed, throwing his arms up. "We're never gonna know 'cause you decided to be stubborn for stupid reasons and-!"

And that's when Sorun heard the alarms and tuned everything else out.

Present

Where did it go wrong?

"..."

Was it his fault? No. Sorun hadn't done any wrong- he had done no wrong . Nothing. Never. He'd done everything he was supposed to, and what ended up happening at the end of it? What ?

No. No, no no no... no, he didn't do a damn thing wrong. He didn't kill his dream. Others did that he could point the finger at and blame, but Sorun? No. He refused to acknowledge it as anything different. What was he supposed to have done, if not what he did for so long? It'd all been perfect by the end of it. No. It wasn't on him. None of it was.

"..."

He didn't react to the jeering from some of the Mobians who would often hang outside his cell. His guards - the ones from Yurashia dressed like ninjas. Whatever jeering and mocking they said to Sorun, he didn't hear them. Too lost in his own thoughts, staring perpetually down at the floor of his cell. He hadn't said a single word since he'd been thrown in here, hadn't so much as moved. And they kept shuffling positions around so much he didn't bother to remember any of them.

Except that one. Another one of the Yurashia Mobians, some... white-furred badger-looking one with a black stripe in the middle of her face. She'd often just stand there and stare at Sorun with an unreadable expression, only recognizable because she was there so much. He didn't know what her deal was.

"Hey, Jian," one of the other ninja-looking Mobians called out. He'd walked up next to her, looking at Sorun in the cell. "This is the one? The one that tore out the Iron Queen's eye?"

"... So it would seem. Yes," she answered in a calm tone, her voice completely even as her blue eyes stared at Sorun. "He has not moved a muscle since being brought here. Nor has anyone treated him." She looked down at his right hand. "He's more than likely to lose that arm as a result. In these conditions..."

"He'd be lucky to die to infection," the other Mobian scoffed out, throwing his hand up over his shoulder as he turned away. "It's not a happy fate that awaits him back home in Yurashia once the Iron Queen has finished things here. Anyway, stop staring at him; there's things to go over with everyone else."

"... Right," Jian mumbled out, watching him walk off before looking back at Sorun. She'd kept up her stare for a number of seconds before walking off with him, leaving Sorun alone once again.

He barely noticed anything.

"..."

Where did it go wrong?

---

1 day ago

Sorun remembered hearing the alarm. He remembered Nicole announcing some warning over the city-wide PA system Sorun didn't even know existed until now. He didn't know what she said; he heard words, but hadn't listened, hadn't stopped to process them to understand beyond faintly recognizing some warning addressed to the citizens.

All Sorun knew was that something bad was happening and his very first thought was his pet Chao was in the park with no one but a little rabbit girl and her unevolved Chao to protect him. Or more accurately for Virgil to protect them .

So his gut instinct had been automatic, done without thought or consideration to himself. His silver cane had automatically transmuted to the Yamato. He'd swung the blade under his feet, creating a portal and falling through. He recalled Sonic shouted something at him, too startled to react in time before Sorun fell through and cut the portal closed behind him.

His feet had hit the artificial grass in the park. Instantly Sorun's eyes had started scanning around, searching. And... he'd seen them. His Chao, Virgil, in the distance. Too distinctive to miss. Protectively hovering in front of Cream and her pet, who were cowering behind him.

And then there were them . There, in two white, oval egg-like chairs that seemed to be floating off the ground. Snively, the absolute creature and cretin he was, was sitting in one of them, and from this angle Sorun could see him leering at the three. The woman in the second chair he didn't recognize. An Overlander woman, based on the fact she had least looked human, barring the dark green hair and yellow eyes. He could take a guess from the regal, Chinese-looking garb and crown she wore hat it was the Regina person Khan had been talking about. That Iron Queen.

And her height seemed to be on par with the average human's. Perhaps higher. It would be, just to spite Sorun further.

"All you had to do was stay the fuck home."

Behind the cold face staring towards them was utter, unbridled rage that started roiling inside of Sorun as he stared at them. No. No . It was supposed to be over, done with. How dare they. How dare they come to this place when everything was supposed to be fine? How dare the world do this to Sorun after everything he'd done to finally have peace?

The katana in Sorun's had transmuted into the blue Chaos Emerald, grasped in his hand. He Tricked, teleporting from that spot to right on top of the rim of the floating egg chair Snively was in. Crouching down, looking down at the man who was somehow even shorter than Sorun himself was.

Snively had felt it; the floating chair had wobbled a bit when Sorun appeared on top of it. "What in blazes-?" he'd began, turning around in his seat to look up. And then he'd froze , face going white as a sheet when he looked up and saw Sorun balefully staring down at him. Eyes practically bugging out of his head and breathing steadily picking up. He'd just stared for the first few moments, as if his brain was struggling to comprehend what he was seeing. Or perhaps he was having a flashback to their previous encounters.

Finally, he spoke. "You're supposed to be dead," he whispered.

"You'll wish."

With that succinct reply said, Sorun Tricked again right besides the group of three they were in front of. He wasted absolutely no time, the Chaos Emerald transmuting back into Yamato as he cut a portal behind them to the other end of the city. "Leave," Sorun ordered, staring straight down at Cream as he pointed at he portal. "Now."

The rage bubbling inside him increased when the rabbit Mobian shook her head. "But Mr. Sorun-!"

A frustrated growl left Sorun as he sheathed Yamato with a loud clack! He pressed the blunted end of the scabbard against her stomach and shoved Cream right through the portal, ignoring her protests entirely as she was sent tumbling through. He looked at Virgil, who nodded and just kicked Cream through the portal after her, the Chao screaming out in surprise as he flew through. And then Sorun unsheathed the katana and cut forwards to close the portal.

There. Done. It was just them here now, with Sorun's own brain feverishly working on ideas of what to do now. There was already one he was rapidly settling on as the sword transmuted back into his cane, the tip hitting the soft ground as he turned towards the small Chao floating next to him. He took a second to consider his words before speaking. "What I plan on doing here... wouldn't be something any of the others would approve of. You don't have to stay for this next part."

"Chao-chao." Virgil shook his head. For a moment Sorun felt a bit conflicted, but it eased off soon after. He would understand, whatever happened here. Sorun didn't know if it was the bond between him and Virgil or whatever else, but whatever happened, he'd stand by him. It's how it had always been. He gave a grateful nod to him before both he and Virgil turned back towards Snively and Regina.

"..." Sorun took a deep breath, trying his best to keep his anger in check so he could at least speak. It was becoming a worse and worse struggle as time went on. "Been a while," he greeted Snively in an even tone. "Gonna be the last, too."

For his part Snively had just been staring at first, in equal parts fear, bewilderment, and confusion. Sorun could see why - as he said, he was supposed to be dead. But he shook it off soon after when he saw the cane Sorun was supporting himself on, confidence slowly seeping back into his smug leer as he looked down at Sorun from his floating chair. "Well, perhaps reports of your death weren't entirely exaggerated by the sight of things. Not feeling as mobile as you used to, Sorun?"

"It's not good to make fun of the disabled, Snively. Karma won't like it." Sorun's eyes slowly drifted to the other egg chair floating next to Snively, at the woman sitting in it. "You, I've little interest in, but since you've thrown your lot in with Snively and your mere existence has caused me irritation as of late I suppose you can share in this up and coming part." He sighed out, hand tightening around the handle of his cane. "Just what do you think you're doing?"

"Why, isn't it obvious?" Sorun resisted the urge to blanch upon hearing the woman, Regina, speak. Her voice sounded haughty , so high and mighty and full of herself just from her tone alone. And she had a face to match. "To purview my soon-to-be new domain in-"

Nope. Couldn't do it. Her voice was like glass in his ears. "I no longer have any interest in the words coming out of your mouth. Shut up," Sorun interrupted, giving Regina a hard glare. She's snapped her mouth shut, giving Sorun an incensed, borderline-angry look. He ignored her completely and looked back at Snively. "You had a chance to back out of all this when your dear old Ivo hit the loony bin. What happened with that?"

"And what would you know about me, Sorun? What little interaction we've ever shared hasn't been the definition of cordial. In fact, I recall upon our first meeting by which I came to you with nothing but the best of intentions you threatened to murder me ," Snively hissed out, clear anger in his tone.

Sorun didn't react at all, continuing to stare at Snively with an even expression. "... You're still mad about that? It's been eleven months, man. Get over it," he said.

"It's not just that!" Snively screamed. "The humiliations you set upon me after in future battles, the beating , how my very own uncle seemed to think you bore more worth to pay attention to than myself despite being nothing but a juvenile delinquent carried by abilities!" he exclaimed.

Sorun resisted the urge to scoff out. It almost sounded like he was he was jealous of the attention Eggman gave Sorun. Not that he himself understood why; the man tried to kill Sorun multiple times over and he was half-certain all that attention was just to get under Sorun's skin and mock him. But Snively was treating it like it was something more significant.

"He's probably just a moron," Sorun reasoned with himself.

"But..." Snively took a deep inhale to calm himself down. "This isn't about you and me... though that's rapidly being added to the repertoire I've planned. No, Sorun, this is about asserting our place as the figureheads of this world and taking our rightful place as its rulers," he said.

Regina decided to use that moment to chime in, looking more concerned with examining her nails as she spoke out. "And New Mobotropolis represents the seat of power of the controlling party of this region of the world. the Acorn Republic or whatever it is you lot decided to name yourselves. It will serve as a suitable-enough staging area for when we expand beyond Northamer's borders to lands beyond. It really is quite simple.

"..." Sorun tilted his head up to look at the sky. World domination for the sake of... he didn't even know. Because they felt like it , all their words seemed to imply. Snively was nearly as demented as Eggman was and it seemed this Regina lady wasn't too far behind him. He didn't know why he thought for a minute there was something deeper to it. Maybe there was, if he actually got to know the two of them better... but at the end of the day he just did not care in the slightest amount. He wasn't even sure why he was trying to debate with crazy people, especially since they'd obviously made up their minds.

"... What lofty ambitions," Sorun sighed out. He glanced down at his feet, pausing to consider. Maybe he was the fool thinking any better could come of this. But by the point they finished speaking Sorun had already made up his own mind about what he was going to do about this. "Well... Snively. Regina. As much as I'd love to wax philosophy, we're on a bit of time crunch here." He looked off to the side over at the other end of the park. "If Sonic isn't here yet, I can only assume that means he's gathering the other Freedom Fighters so they can all come here at the same time. Which means I've only got that long to do this next part."

Snively paused. "... Next part?" he repeated in a hesitant tone.

"Of course. They'd never let me eviscerate you two, and they'd never look at me the same way. If I claimed to use an aspect of my abilities I never tried before, though, and it went out of control and tore you two to shreds since I had no control... well, then, that's just an unfortunate accident, not malicious intent on my part." He looked back at Snively and Regina, making the smallest of smiles as the silver cane he held transmuted into the glowing, blue gem it truly was. "I never did like playing as a summoner in games, but I'm willing to give it a shot since needs must. So... woof , woof ."

Anybody even remotely sensitive to Chaos energies would have felt the massive surge in energy that flared up in the center of the New Mobotropolis park before it rapidly turned into something far more sinister in nature. Rancid. Cold . From the perspective of Snively and Regina, one moment Sorun had been standing there holding the blue Chaos Emerald. And then there'd been an explosion of blue vapors crackling with blue electricity, concealing him entirely.

The cloud grew, towering over them. The first thing they'd heard was the snarl. Deep and guttural, something that would have rattled the bones of anyone who was present to listen. Next was the frost that was slowly starting to expand outwards from beyond the cloud that was beginning to rapidly dissipate, revealing the large, imposing silhouette inside of it.

"W-what...!?" Snively had stammered out when it was finally revealed just what it was standing before them. A dog. A dog that so large it towered over Snively and Regina; so large it looked like their bodies could easily fit into the mouths of one of the three identical heads protruding from its three necks that were currently snarling at them. Bound in so much muscle bulging from its skin it looked like just one of its muscle groups were larger than the floating chairs Snively and Regina sat in.

It didn't even have fur. It had ice in place of fur, growing across its body in jagged, serrated pieces, a constant cloud of frost hovering around it as three sets of eyes stared right down at Snively and Regina. The latter looked repulsed at the sight. Alarmed and confused, unsure of what she was looking at. In Snively's case he just looked fearful at the sight, shaking where he sat in the egg chair as he looked up at the thing in barely-subdued panic.

And then there was Sorun. He was riding atop the three-headed dog, sitting at the base of its necks with one of his hands around the chain acting as a collar for it. He looked down at them smugly, a small smile playing at the edges of his mouth as he looked at them.

"It's such a shame this thing mauled you two to death before I could get a handle on it. The dangers of trying out untested abilities in an uncontrolled environment. I'm sure the others'll understand," he said, tone almost mocking as he stared down at the two. "I'd wanted King Cerberus, but I'm sure the normal, trashy variant of Cerberus will be more than enough for you two-"

"You dare ?"

It spoke . In a deep, dual-tone voice that seemed to reverberate the air around it. It was a voice that sounded wrong in every sense of the word. A voice that made anyone who heard it feel like there were ants crawling in their ears, a voice that sent chills right down to the bone more effectively than the air Cerberus was chilling around its body. And then the centermost head turned around, its red-glowing eyes staring straight at Sorun and not Snively or Regina.

"You dare to besmirch our name? You dare to insult us and label us inferior to our kin? And you, a mere human, have the utter audacity to ride us like a common, mortal mutt !?"

Sorun blinked in surprise. It sounded angry, furious at him, even. At him . It confused him greatly because it was supposed to be his . He'd completely expected it to be obedient and follow his commands like the weapons and powers he'd use the Chaos Emeralds to make. Like that Empusa he'd made that hadn't struggled at all against Sorun, even when he'd gutted the thing. But this... this was different. Cerberus was talking back to Sorun.

He frowned. Heavily, hand tightening on the chain collar it wore. That wouldn't do, not at all. "Listen to me, you miserable demon. I made you. You're mine. You don't get to disobey me-"

Cerberus bucked its body. The most Sorun had made was a surprised breath as he felt his body flip over, his hand still clamped around the chain collar as he fell towards he center head's mouth.

It bit him. Sorun couldn't even make a sound. It was going by so quickly and he was so confused he couldn't make a sound when its giant teeth pierced down through his torso. And then it tore him away from the collar and whipped its head towards the ground, letting go of and slamming Sorun right into the dirt.

And then it'd disappeared. The moment it threw Sorun at the ground no part of his body had been making contact with it, and it'd instantly disappeared and reformed back into the blue Chaos Emerald, which fell down on the ground behind him. Sorun couldn't find it in himself to care about that.

"Wh-why did...?" Sorun made a staggered, gasping noise on the grass where he lied, body trembling a bit from the sharp pain he felt radiating out through his body. Artificial blood had begun seeping through the large punctures in his torso, slowly straining the grass around him white. There were even a few electrical sparks that flew out from his wounds due to the artificial skeleton he had being damaged from the bite. "Was it... t-too sapient to listen...?"

Snively paused. He looked shocked and confused for the most part, having absolutely no comprehension of what he'd just witness. Even after Cerberus disappeared and Sorun was left bleeding on the ground he still didn't know what to make of it. And then he continued looking at Sorun, at the way he was lying on the ground and bleeding out. And then slowly all that shock and confusion began to give way to cautious smugness as he looked down at him.

"O-oh... oh ho ho . Well now... what was it you were saying earlier about the dangers of using 'untested abilities', Sorun? I'm not even going to pretend to understand what just happened but whatever it was seems to have blown back on you, hasn't it?" Snively asked, leaning over a bit in his floating chair. Resting his chin against his hand as he watched Sorun lie on the ground, bleeding out white as he struggled to regain his breath. "And my my my, that color and those sparks... I see that cane was far from show, was it? Dipped into the world of cybernetics for yourself, did you?"

"Oh, I can feel them in him," Regina sneered from besides Snively, looking down at Sorun's body. "Wires and electrodes, all crossing and surging across his body. I think he went and replaced his whole skeleton with metal!"

"You don't say..."

Most of the words Sorun were hearing went in one ear and out the other, none being processed and registered. He was mostly trying and failing to get up to his feet, repeatedly falling back down in the puddle of white blood. He was in enough pain that his body was shuddering. Worse than that it was slowly dulling and fading, coinciding with the cold that was slowly seeping into his body.

"Ch-chao!" He saw movement in front of his vision. Virgil, hovering above Sorun's face. He didn't think he'd ever seen such a look of concern on the Chao's face. He was usually more stoic than this, more reserved. Now he looked like he was in full panic, focusing completely on Sorun and all his wounds. "Chao-chao! Chao-chao chao! Chao!"

"Virgil..." Sorun's right hand snapped upwards, grabbing at the Chao, making Virgil shout in surprise. Sorun blinked once - he hadn't done that. He hadn't made the conscious decision to move his arm, to grab at Virgil like that. And yet his arm was doing just that.

And then his already-cooling blood grew chilled when he looked over at Regina, seeing a small, green glow around her hand as she gestured towards Sorun. And he instantly knew, remembered what Dimitri had said about her being a technomancer who could control technology. And realized his damn skeleton was technology. Every single bone below his head an artificial piece of cybernetic technology he could nearly feel her get a grip on.

"H-hey..." He made a weak breath as he tried pulling against her control, but it was no good. The motors in all the joints of his cybernetic skeleton, the things that were supposed to help with his mobility, were fighting against him. A fight he was losing, because his muscles were just too weak and he felt too exhausted from the blood loss. He couldn't do anything as his body slowly began to stand up on its own, still gripping Virgil tightly.

"Oh, I remember this pet of yours fondly ," Snively continued in a mocking tone, face lighting up further and further in delight as he watched. "Station Square, I believe it was? You'll be happy to know, dear, that this little terror had been the one to tear apart the battle machine I had been in before Sorun practically beat my face black and blue."

"I'm not happy at all to hear that," Regina responded. She started waggling her fingers, her smile beginning to turn crueler. That green glow around her hand intensified and she'd began making more forceful gestures with her fingers. And, coinciding with that, Sorun's hand began squeezing down.

Sorun could feel it. Could feel Virgil's small bones began cracking underneath his grip, could feel the pain in his own hand from the pressure he was being forced to exert. He kept trying, trying as hard as he could to stop, but the damn motors in his hand's artificial skeleton were that much stronger than his muscles. He couldn't do anything.

"..." Sorun's breathing had begun picking up. Panic and dread, actual, true dread he hadn't felt in so long and had thought was behind him, began to sink into him as he saw his Chao getting crushed between his own fingers. He saw the pain spreading across his face and heard the small pained noises he made. "Just... just cut through my hand. Vi-Virgil, I can fix it, just... do something..."

He didn't. Virgil wasn't doing anything except staying there in Sorun's hand to be crushed. He couldn't even tell if it was because Virgil couldn't do anything due to not being able to move his limbs, or because he simply didn't want to hurt Sorun. Both were equally frustrating to him. Equally terrifying. He was hurting Virgil and the sight of it was getting Sorun's heart racing in a way that was making him break out in a cold sweat and making his skin itch.

"Hey... hey, you two, stop it," Sorun said, looking back towards Snively and Regina. It felt like a sword going through his chest, hearing his own voice sound so pleading to them of all people. People he hated more than anyone else in the world at this moment. Felt blazing anger at the sick, sadistic smiles they were wearing from watching the sight before them. Felt hopelessness at Sorun's ability to do absolutely nothing about this. A whirlwind of emotions that nearly made him lightheaded, and all the while he own hand was crushing his companion to death . "He doesn't have anything to do with this, just stop, don't-!"

"Don't...?" Regina echoed, sounding wholly amused as her fingers closed tighter. "For someone who should be begging at my dear Snively's feet for all the grief you've put my lovely man through you have quite the gall to be making demands here. Beg harder."

Sorun's hand tightened further in line with Regina's. It wasn't cracking anymore - he felt the bones beneath Virgil's flesh outright beginning to break now. "C-chao..."

His eyes widened further. Dying. He was dying. They were making him kill him. "I'll do anything, just... stop it..." he pleaded out, ignoring his pride screaming at him to keep his mouth shut, ignoring all he burning shame and humiliation it made him feel because he felt like Virgil was going to die if he didn't push these feelings down and do what they said.

But his fingers kept pressing down. Regina just laughed, continuing to close her hand and make Sorun's do the same, make him watch as Virgil's body was squeezed more and more.

"Mree-hee-hee!" Regina's cackling laughter practically sounded like glass scraping against his eardrums. It didn't even look like his begging was helping any. She never even so much as paused to consider the worth of his pleas. "Yes, yes that's right... keep going."

"Hey. Hey, I said I'd do anything!" Sorun shouted out, voice panicked and desperate as he looked up at Regina. She wasn't stopping, and that smile wasn't going away. She just kept closing her hand more and more. "I'm begging you, what do you want!? I'll do anything, just- PLEASE STOP-!"

CRACK!

He'd felt it before he'd seen it. Before he'd heard it, even, the subtle vibrations passing through Sorun's muscles and nerves before the sound registered with his brain. Felt it as Virgil's bones caved in completely and he felt the tiny Chao body in his hand go squish! right there in his grasp. Felt his tiny heartbeat rapidly slow into a complete stop. Felt blood from Virgil's mouth and the puncture marks on his body where bone was poking through splash onto his hand.

Sorun just stared. Stared at the broken, lifeless body being held in his hand. So limp and inanimate, like some... broken marionette.

"Virgil...?" Sorun murmured out, looking at the broken thing in his hand. That couldn't be Virgil, could it? It... looked like him. The silver, cylindrical horns, the blades on the arms, the blue coloring and wings. It was all there but Virgil wasn't supposed to look like a crushed corpse. He was supposed to be a living and healthy Chao, because... because things were supposed to be fine now. Sorun did all those things and went through so much because life was supposed to be normal now. Normal life didn't have crushed-up bodies like this.

He'd noticed movement, somewhere in the back of his mind. Saw from the corner of his eyes all the other the other Freedom Fighters arrive and stop just short of them, all of them seemingly frozen in shock. Sorun couldn't find himself acknowledging them. He heard muffled sounds of Snively and Regina saying something in some gloating tone, but it was all drowned out by the sound of Sorun's own heartbeat he felt thrumming in his ears.

All of it ignored. All of it. All he could focus on was the corpse of the Chao that slipped from his fingers and fell onto the grass beneath him. And the blood left on his hand. It was... sparkling. Tiny, miniscule motes of green light scattered across the blood.

There'd been so much Chaos energy inside of Virgil's blood, Sorun realized. Was so much. Energy that was suffusing into his body through the contact of blood on his skin.

"You really... were special... weren't you, Virgil...?" Sorun thought. Staring down at his hand with a detached, vacant stare as he felt the hand heal in all the wrong ways. Saw the skin split apart as true, organic bone began growing alongside the artificial, metal carpal bones already in his hand. And there simply wasn't any room - both the organic and artificial bones were tearing through the skin, ruining his hand from everything trying to fit in place. Turning the appendage into a mangled, unrecognizable mess of flesh and metal. He could see his own muscles squirming around it all like some mass of writhing tendrils as his body tried and failed to heal around all the metal in his hand. White blood flowing from the wound and slowly being replaced by red blood, mixing together into a pink substance dripping down and staining the grass.

The thought that this didn't hurt all that much didn't cross Sorun's mind, even though deep down he knew it should have been agonizing. But Virgil was right there, dead, with his blood on his hand, and it was all Sorun could think about. His body should be throbbing in pain from having been bitten by Cerberus, but Virgil was dead at his feet and his blood was all over Sorun. All his friends were screaming at Sorun and Snively and Regina were giving Sorun confused, disturbed looks because of his hand. But Virgil was dead and they made him kill him.

What did register with Sorun was that he could move a bit. For how much his hand was being ruined from the accidental regeneration that small boost of strength Virgil's blood gave him was letting him muscle through the servos in his skeleton.

"..." Sorun knelt down with more effort than he'd ever had to put into moving. Regina had pushed past the disgusted look on her face and made an intense frown, the glow around her hand intensifying. And he could hear the servos in his body straining, attempting to force him to move. And they were slowly gaining ground; whatever temporary strength that bit of blood afforded Sorun was rapidly fading. A few seconds more, at best.

He wanted to try and make it worth it. To get something out of the needless death. So Sorun reached down, placing his left hand on the gathering pool of blood growing around Virgil's corpse. Could feel all that power radiating out from the blood, all that Chaos energy that had been flowing inside of Virgil.

"... One more hit, buddy. I'll get one in for you," Sorun whispered out. For as much was there it wasn't nearly as much as what a Chaos Emerald provided. Surely not enough to make Yamato. Not one of his powers, likely. He needed something... weaker. Not as strong, not as powerful. Something that would last a couple seconds so he could get at least one single hit against the person who made him do this. He'd never felt a greater need to do anything in his entire life.

He made a decision. All that green light in Virgil's blood gathered around to a single point where Sorun's hand was resting above it. Forming a shape and solidifying into hard, cold steel. And Sorun pulled, tearing a claymore sword right out from that tiny puddle of blood, the screaming skull making up the hilt of the sword seemingly staring right at Regina who'd frozen in shock.

There hadn't been much thought put into Sorun's next action. It was less a thing he had to think about and more something he'd just done, almost automatically, on instinct. He'd used the last bit of strength his body had and reared his arm back, flipping the sword around in a reverse grip. And then he threw it - straight at Regina's face, with zero hesitation, with zero regard for the fact all his friends were watching.

The claymore sword sailed right past Regina's face. It hadn't been much power that constituted it, and it'd faded away before it even touched down on the ground, dissipating into motes of green light that quickly disappeared in the span of a second. But it'd done its job. Regina had screamed out, holding the left side of her face as blood poured between her fingers and down her hand. The edge of the sword had sliced right through her left eye and destroyed it completely.

"... Damn it..." It was the last thought Sorun managed to formulate as consciousness began to slip from him. He'd intended to take Regina's head off with that sword throw, maybe just skewer her face, but he'd only ended up taking an eye. The last thing he felt was nothing but bitter regret as he finally faded into unconsciousness.

Sorun didn't end up falling down. Regina still had a hold on his artificial skeleton; he passed out while standing up, upper torso limp and slumped over. It was a credit to her tenacity more than anything else, the woman pushing through the pain on sheer willpower to keep Sorun in her grasp.

"Regina!" This had been shouted out by Snively, who'd reached over to Regina in worry as she clutched her head in anguish. This had only caused Regina to lash out and hit Snively across the face, causing him to fall out of his chair and sprawl onto the grass.

"Don't touch me!" she screeched out, her hand going back to clutching at her face while the other one reached out towards Sorun. "That miserable vermin, he...! GAH !" Her one remaining eye looked at the Freedom Fighters all standing off to the side, some giving Sorun worried looks while others gave Regina and Snively furious looks. "And you all! Not one step or I'll have this wretch end himself!"

She flipped her hand around, causing Sorun's intact hand to fling up and grip around his own neck, threatening to snap it. It caused all the observing Mobians to flinch back, a few of which who'd been moving to step forwards freezing with hesitation and panic when they saw Sorun gripping his own throat. And then his unconscious body slowly started stumbling forwards, towards Regina and her floating chair.

"What the- stop it!" It was Sonic who'd been the first one to speak up in the group. He'd saw as Snively scrambled over to pick up the blue Emerald Sorun had dropped earlier. He'd wanted to move and stop him, but then he saw Sorun and how he was completely at Regina's mercy and stopped. The same reason nobody was stepping forward to help. "H-he's bleeding, look at him! He needs help! You can't just take him!" he shouted, pointing at the large gouge wounds on Sorun's torso.

"I most certainly can! And if you even think as to follow us you can guess what happens!" Regina shrieked at him, not even seeming to acknowledge Snively as he scampered back over to his own egg chair. "You, you all... this isn't over, not even nearly! When I come back I'll... I'll...!"

She didn't even get to finish, so wracked in pain she'd trailed off into an anguished sort of growl. At a snap of Regina's hand Sorun's body jumped up to the back of her chair, standing on the rim of the egg-like pod while his intact hand held onto the upper portion of the rim. His head, meanwhile, was still dipped down. Still unconscious to what his body was doing as the two chairs floated up and flew away, with everyone watching helpless to do anything.

Present

Where did it go wrong?

"..."

He was here. Snively. The person who'd done the most unforgiveable thing anyone had ever done to Sorun. It was the very first sign that Sorun had even displayed since being locked in this cell: he looked up. Looked up and just blankly stared at Snively.

"Ah, you're actually awake? From what the guards in this place have been saying I'd have figured you for a comatose vegetable, but then again who can rely on the observations of good-for-nothing animals, hmm...?" Snively hummed out, leaning close to the bars of the cell. He looked pleased with himself, overly smug. Like somebody who knew they'd just won everything and were on top of the world.

"..." Sorun blinked once, tilting his head at Snively as he stared back. The hate he felt for him was seconded only by the hate he felt for that woman. Or perhaps it was a reversed order, since she had been the one to force him to do the deed. He wasn't too sure.

He was sure of what he remembered, though. He'd made him beg. Him . Sorun losing hadn't been enough, he'd had to grind his pride into the ground along with it. Sorun hated it so much. Hated being in this position, hated his Chao was dead, hated everything Snively had done.

Was Snively where it went wrong? Was he just a product of the world outright refusing to finally give Sorun his peace? Was there even a distinction at this point? Or was it just because Sorun had pulled the stunt with the damn-

No. It wasn't his fault. Sorun had done nothing wrong. The world was wrong. Snively was wrong. Sorun wasn't.

"Er..." The smug look on Snively's face lowered somewhat when he saw Sorun just blankly staring at him in such a matter. Like he was being studied more than anything else. "In... any event, I'm sure you'll be pleased to know that my dear Regina and I have finished occupying New Mobotropolis and... have been..." He trailed off, slowly growing more and more perturbed by the staring.

He'd taken everything Sorun had fought for and earned. Him - solely him. Snively. Because Snively was just another piece of this world that seemed to despise Sorun so much that he couldn't have something as simple and basic as a life. But Snively... he'd chosen to do what he'd done to Sorun. He'd chosen to take his dream away from him.

He made him lose.

"I'm starting to wonder if the others' reports about your state wasn't overblown after all," Snively mumbled out under his breath as he stepped back from the cell. Sorun's eyes followed him. "Well, whatever the case, as soon as we've polished things up here we'll be moving back to Yurashia. I'm sure my beloved Regina is all but eager to repay you for the grievous wound you inflicted on her. Ah, so many tools... the people in Yurashia are nothing if not creative."

"..."

Any smugness on Snively's face dropped off entirely at Sorun's blank staring. Now he just looked uncomfortable. "... Oh, forget it. You're taking all of the fun out of it," he grumbled out as he turned around and began walking off. "Maybe after we've subjected all your friends and turned them into drooling slaves you'll begin singing a different tune. Farewell for now, Sorun. I'll be sure we catch up more later in Yurashia."

"..." Sorun silently stared at Snively as he left. Even as he left the small prison and closed the door behind him, leaving Sorun completely alone, he continued to stare after him.

A/N- In a weird way the story was in a really good spot when I took that large break, since this chapter was the turning point where the tone for the rest of the story completely shifts. So there's that much, at least.

Chapter 106

Recursion Error

Episode 106- We die a little every day

Something was thrown into Sorun's cell.

Sorun's eyes slowly flickered open. He wasn't sure how long he'd been chained up in here - a day, two at most, he wagered. In this dingy, dark cell in this holding area. Such were the conditions that the object that had been thrown into the cell at his feet was glaringly obvious to see: a large, blue gem that glowed with an intense, blue light. A Chaos Emerald. His Chaos Emerald.

"..." Sorun slowly tilted his head up. Beyond the bars of the cell there was only one single figure. A cybernetic echidna head, suspended in a clear, floating ball with multiple mechanical tentacles jutting from it. Dimitri was unmistakenly recognizable, but at the moment Sorun just felt so mind-numbingly empty at the moment that he didn't even know what to feel or how to react.

"... Well, I see the auto-coagulating effects of the artificial blood have proven to be effective, at the very least," Dimitri remarked, his gaze going down to the large puncture marks at Sorun's sides that still dully throbbed - they'd ceased bleeding long ago. His tone was clear and even, that mechanical twang still behind his voice as he spoke. "I was quite worried about that. The effects had never been tested on non-echidna bodies-"

"What is this?" Sorun interrupted. His voice sounded hollow, quiet and scratchy. Nearly broken from how quiet he spoke.

"The... Chaos Emerald that was brought along with you," Dimitri carefully answered, seemingly thinking Sorun had been referring to that. "They had it under tight lock and key, but with my credentials-"

"I know what it is, you moron," Sorun breathed out, tired eyes still looking up at Dimitri. "Why are you giving it to me?" Because as far as he knew the Dark Legion echidna fell in with Snively and his Yurashia lot. And Dimitri was included in that.

"Ah." The expression on Dimitri's features lowered slightly. A slow, rattling sigh left him, his head bubble lowering a bit in elevation so he could look Sorun in the eyes. "Before I explain, let me speak plainly and inform you that I was not informed of the Iron Queen's ambitions of world domination before the Dark Legion was folded into the Iron Dominion's forces. It was my understanding operations would strictly be kept to Yurashia territory and no further outside of its boundaries. It was my assumption that the woman and Snively would be satisfied ruling over an entire continent." He made another sigh. "It seems... I was mistaken. On all accounts."

"..." Sorun paused to consider Dimitri's words. Due to the complete and utter lack of any other thoughts going through his head, Sorun managed to reach his conclusion to Dimitri's words after only a few short seconds. "I'd have believed that... if you hadn't said all that before I even mentioned anything on the matter."

Dimitri didn't visibly react. His expression, however, did fall further. "... I was directly in the center of the Republic of Acorn's capital city when we spoke of this, Sorun. I needed to say what I said for the sake of my people. For your sake, too, lest you forget."

"Your 'help' is the reason someone dear to me is dead and I'm in here," Sorun blankly replied, not even hesitating in speaking his mind as he looked down at his right hand. Still mangled and torn from the mix of real and artificial bone bursting out from the skin and muscles. All the exposed bits of meat were dark and cold, the edges of torn skin beginning to turn black. He was fairly certain it turned gangrene a while ago.

Dimitri looked down at Sorun's hand along with him, a pang of sympathy spreading over his face. "... I'm sorry," he stated simply, looking back at Sorun's face. And Sorun himself reacted by blinking once, because he could tell Dimitri was actually telling the truth. There was more emotion in that phrase than he'd ever heard from him every time he spoke. "The motors I installed within your skeleton were to assist with locomotive efforts, both in recovery and when you... began to deteriorate. I never imagined it would be used against you, Sorun, I... sincerely was trying to help."

"..." Sorun found himself believing him this time. And begrudgingly he would admit the cybernetics had been helping him immensely, right up until the end there. He could accept Dimitri genuinely did mean well.

There was still the matter of the Chaos Emerald sitting in his cell, though. Why Dimitri was giving it to him.

"Answer the question of why this is in here with me," Sorun said, patience rapidly wearing thin. "Is this really you flipping against Regina and the rest?"

"That would imply our interests were ever aligned to begin with," Dimitri muttered, expression morphing into a bitter one. "I'd told you the only reason I allowed the Dark Legion to be absorbed into the Iron Dominion was on the contingent that Regina use her abilities to remove the bombs that had been implanted in our cybernetics. But she didn't ." Some of the metallic tendrils extending from Dimitri's head ball flailed around a bit, as if especially aggravated. "She told me right to my face that the devices' construction was 'far too advanced' to be safely removed without detonation, as if she couldn't just deactivate them entirely with a wave of her hand. She and Snively offered us inhibitor chips to be implanted that would block an activation signal of the bombs' trigger, as if they just expected me to trust such things weren't sabotaged in some way. Or used as leverage against us."

"You're surprised?" It's the only thing Sorun could think to say in order to react to what he heard. There wasn't any surprise on his face, no shock, not so much as a single twitch of a micro expression on his face. After what Snively had done to Sorun, to him, such a thing sounded completely in line with him. Deep down he was almost even irritated at Dimitri for not having expected such a betrayal.

"... I shouldn't be," Dimitri sighed out, the tentacles growing limp and hanging down. "It was my ultimate desire above all else to help my people and they reneged on their promise. I don't feel obligated to display any more loyalty to them when they've shown me none in return."

He paused, red, mechanical eyes looking down at the blue Chaos Emerald sitting in Sorun's cage. "You never reneged when I asked for your aid," he mumbled out. "I realize neither of us is the other's most favorite person. I realize you had your own reasons and didn't do it out of the kindness of your heart. The fact remains after a lifetime of having to second guess every single ally and acquaintance of mine, having to have weathered betrayal after betrayal... well. To say it plain I just appreciated you 'playing it straight' with me, as it were."

"..." Sorun's eyes went down to the Chaos Emerald sitting at his feet. "So this is what? Gratitude? Revenge against Regina and Snively?"

"Perhaps both of those. Perhaps more. Truthfully, this is just something I felt like doing," Dimitri confessed to Sorun. "I heard what happened besides. I won't... pretend to understand you well enough to know what's going on through your head, what you might be thinking of doing. But if that second meeting of ours had any indication..." Dimitri paused, head swiveling off to a random direction. "... I'd rather not have my echidna brothers and sister be trapped under the yolk of the Iron Dominion."

"You are making a lot of assumptions," Sorun quietly said. He made a short breath. It was whatever in the end. Dimitri's motivations and reasons didn't matter much to Sorun when the key to his liberation, to everything , was literally right there at his feet. And he'd rather take it while he could before something came along to rip this chance away.

He lifted his boot up and rested it on top of the Emerald, instantly feeling its connection. A blue, spectral blade appeared hovering in the air, shooting forwards and directly impacting the shackle holding Sorun's intact arm up. It flopped down to his side, feeling completely numb after having been forced to be held up for so long.

"E-egh..." Sorun did his best to ignore the numb, tingling sensation crawling up his left limb as he pulled the Emerald towards him with his leg. It skittered forward across the floor, landing in his hand where it shortly transmuted into the Yamato there after. And afterwards Sorun just stared at it.

There it was. Freedom. Freedom and... everything else, right there in his hand. So many possibilities all of a sudden that it was dizzying to Sorun. What did he even do now? Now that he had this? What were his options, the best course of action?

"... One thing at a time," Sorun thought to himself. He lifted the katana up, letting the blade rest in his lap as he stared down at it consideringly. "... Leave," he told Dimitri, not bothering to look up at him.

A surprised sound left Dimitri. "Pardon me?"

"The doorway. To the holding area," Sorun elaborated, still staring down at the blade. "Do me the favor of keeping a lookout, would you? I need some time for this next part." He paused, looking towards his defunct right hand. "And it won't be a pretty sight besides."

"I... see." Dimitri seemed like he wanted to argue, but upon hearing Sorun's tone - that eerily calm, commanding tone - he thought differently and hovered off. Sorun watched him until he'd disappeared beyond the doorway, and then sighed out once he left.

"Right... right." Sorun maintained a firmer grip on the sword's handle with his left hand as he looked down at his right arm. So many things were supposed to go right once he'd gotten this thing. An end to his sickness, a doorway to his new life. Now he couldn't help but think of this metal thing inside him with thoughts full of nothing but contempt and disdain. He couldn't stand it being inside of him. It was just a constant reminder of everything that had happened and he wanted it gone .

He couldn't heal his arm like this with it in the way besides. Or anything else that was wrong with him.

"..." No thoughts ran through Sorun's mind as he sluggishly removed all of the clothing on his torso, tossing it all haphazardly to the floor. There wasn't anything to think about the fact that everything was going so terribly wrong. That everything was ruined and he didn't even know what to think about it, let alone do. What does he do with the fact his entire world came crashing down? Again ?

He didn't even so much as flinch when he rose Yamato up to his right shoulder and used it to cleanly cut his entire arm off, eyes still staring blankly ahead with a thousand-yard stare.

It'd been about ten minutes that Dimitri had been standing behind the entrance to the holding area before he'd heard two distinct sounds behind him: slow, uneven footsteps, and the metallic scraping sound of something being dragged along the metal floor.

"Sorun?" Dimitri had turned around towards the source of the noise, floating back a bit further in. He'd only made it a few feet before something was tossed down onto the ground in front of Dimitri: a metallic skeleton, missing a few pieces and a limb as if it'd been removed in pieces at a time. Sparking at various points from where it was damaged and leaking white, artificial blood as it laid there on the ground.

Dimitri had just floated there, staring in shock at the sight. The unexpected nature of it and how he was just confused at just seeing it there. And then his eyes traveled up to Sorun, standing in front of him. He was lightly panting, as if just having gone through some tremendous effort. Mouth hanging open as he breathed heavily and looked at Dimitri, physically looking no worse for wear. Even his beyond-damaged right hand from earlier looked completely healed over.

"I tore out your garbage skeleton and grew my own back," Sorun panted out, shoulders moving up and down slightly as he stared at Dimitri. There was a massive pool of white blood and a severed arm behind him from the cell he'd come out from - the artificial blood he'd used Yamato to separate from his body so he could use the Chaos Emerald to regenerate his real blood.

It hadn't been an easy task to use Yamato to remove his whole skeleton. It'd been painful. Arduous. Somehow throughout it all Sorun couldn't bring himself to overly care all that much. His brain felt like it was in a constant flux now that he was moving around and doing things. If he wasn't thinking about anything he was just flashing back to prior events in New Mobotropolis, of how he'd felt that tiny body in his hand just die so suddenly, how his own demon had bitten down on him and crippled him, that damn mocking laughter he'd been forced to endure.

No. He hadn't been able to really think about the pain as he removed his skeleton and grew the real thing back.

"..." Dimitri seemed shocked by what Sorun said. There even seemed to be a few moments where he just floated there in place as if trying to figure out how Sorun had accomplished what he said. And yet, the proof was right there on the floor: the artificial skeleton. And Sorun standing there just fine as if possessing a skeleton already.

Eventually he just sighed in acceptance, looking back up at Sorun. "You're not long for life without that," he reminded him.

"I don't care anymore," Sorun mumbled out. There was a small part in the back of his mind that stirred in panic at hearing that, but he ignored it. He just couldn't bring himself to care about about something as inconsequential as his life expectancy of all things given everything that was immediately happening. "Besides," he murmured out, "can't have the crazy lady controlling me again," he added, as if an afterthought to quell the distressed parts of his mind.

"Be that as it may, you... agh. As you will," Dimitri mumbled out as he saw Sorun's breathing slowly come more and more under control. He paused at seeing the expression on Sorun's face. He looked thoroughly beaten, lost . Eyes vacant as if there were barely even any thoughts running through his head.

"... What are your intentions now?" Dimitri hesitantly asked.

"I don't know," he admitted. What even did he do now? What was there to do? He glanced down at his hand holding the Yamato - if he really wanted to there was nothing stopping him from just opening a portal and going back home right now. But what did he even say to anyone that saw him? And what-

Sorun blinked once. Invasion. He'd almost forgotten. "What's going in in New Mobotropolis?" he asked, looking back towards Dimitri.

"It isn't ideal, I'll tell you that upfront," Dimitri began. There was a grave sort of undertone to his voice that had Sorun on edge for some reason; the feeling made him uneasy. "The Iron Queen brought over significant numbers from each of the conquered Yurashia clans over here to Northamer. Half remain here in the Egg Dome, which they commandeered following Eggman's... psychotic break." Dimitri hummed, head bubble turning a bit to the side. "Speaking of which, from what I hear the addled fiend escaped his own confinement from here some time ago, directly underneath Snively's nose. I'm unsure of what came of him."

"..." Sorun inhaled a deep breath. "There's too much happening for me to think about that," he decided, expression growing even more withered as he shook his head. "Just... tell me where everyone is."

"That, I couldn't give you a concise answer of," Dimitri confessed. "Half of the Iron Dominion's forces remained here in the Egg Dome to be held in reserve while the other half were moved to New Mobotropolis to aid in the invasion. Which by itself has been going... well for the Iron Dominion. Last I heard."

"... Well, huh?" Sorun murmured out, eyes drifting down towards the floor. The news should have been more impactful to Sorun. It should have, should have felt like a spike going through his chest, he knew it was supposed to feel terrible. But after everything that had happened hearing that his new home was being successfully subjugated just felt like a dull thud he could barely register.

"I believe I heard word of the Iron Queen and Snively planning on subjecting the populace to forced cybernetic augmentation. Mentions neural reconfiguration and lobotomies... it's echidna technology that Lien-Da and the other Dark Legion echidna stationed over in New Mobotropolis are assisting them with."

There was another dull throb that Sorun felt in his chest. It was worse than mere subjugation. It was a worse, more crude version of the roboticization that Eggman had subjected people to this world in the past. It sounded like a bad parody of things he'd seen in video games he'd played in the past. It didn't even sound real.

And yet he wasn't even surprised. Sorun wished he was surprised. Wished that hearing all these horrible things created more of a reaction out of him, that the images of all the friends of acquaintances he knew in New Mobotropolis flashing through his head, the images his brain was conjuring to make them half-metal cyborgs with vacant, thoughtless expressions, elicited more reaction out of him than the dull throbs he felt to his heart that he barely even felt. Like a body going numb from suffering so many punches to the point that he didn't even feel the punches anymore.

Numb. That's how Sorun felt hearing all these things, he realized. No horror, revulsion, outrage and fury, sadness and grief or worry over everyone he'd grown so close with. Just numb acceptance to it all, like it was routine, to be expected . Was the world really so bad he just expected things like this now? Was he just used to all the horror?

He didn't know what to do with that.

"The others doing anything about it?" Sorun mumbled out, eyes still on the floor. He couldn't believe nothing was being done about it. For all the bad constants of this world there was at least a few good constants as well.

Dimitri paused. "I... have no knowledge whatsoever of whatever it is the Freedom Fighters may or may not be planning," he admitted. He was speaking carefully now. Overly carefully, as if he were afraid of saying something that would upset Sorun. "Any attempts by the local populace of wresting back control of the city has proven to be unsuccessful due to Regina using her abilities to... leverage the city's security measures against the people," he said, sounding uncomfortable as he turned his head away from Sorun's gaze. "The AI system was unable to resist-"

"Just say her name. I got the meaning," Sorun interrupted, blinking once as he looked down at the floor. He meant Nicole. He meant to imply that Regina used the same tech-controlling powers she'd used on him on Nicole. And at her basest level Nicole was technology. The entire city that was made of nanites was technology. Like it should even be any wonder Regina managed to take it over so fast.

Sorun picked his head up. Hearing from Dimitri that Nicole had just been taken over by Regina felt different than all the other news he'd heard so far. It wasn't just another dull ache - that voice in his head that had been steering him on had suddenly gone eerily silent. He didn't like it. He didn't like this unfamiliar silence. He didn't like any of this news, of any of this happening, he didn't...

He hated all this so much...

"I've heard enough. Stop it." Sorun made a short breath, expression still set in an exhausted, morose appearance. "Regina and Snively. Would they be here... or New Mobotropolis?"

"They go back and forth between here and there to coordinate efforts between split forces, I can't say for certain their current... if it were here I would assume they'd be in the throne room they converted the Egg Dome's command center into, but I-" Dimitri cut himself off, continuing to look up at Sorun and the way he just looked do slumped forward and tired. "What are your intentions, Sorun?" he repeated.

"Who knows. I'm not sure myself." Sorun sighed out, looking down at the sword in his hand. Simply going home and waiting for the Freedom Fighters to do something so it all blew over... it didn't really seem like an option now with the city under siege. With everything just... going so wrong. What could he do?

The dim lights in the holding cell glimmered off the sheen of Yamato's blade. Were certainly options. A few, at least. Sorun just... didn't know what to do with them. But he had to do something . With what Dimitri just said it gave Sorun the impression he didn't have forever to deliberate, and somewhere deep in his heart there was a small sense of urgency to make a decision quickly before more people were irrevocably lost.

Before all that, though, Sorun realized he needed to decide what he'd do with Dimitri right over here.

"... I should kill you." The words came out as matter-of-fact as Sorun looked towards Dimitri, staring at him dispassionately. "But... twice now you've saved my life. So where do you want to go?"

"Eh...?" There'd been a brief moment where panic writ itself on Dimitri's mechanical features, the head bubble he was in floating back. And then he paused at Sorun's words, seeming more confused than anything else as he heard his words. "Go... wh-what do you-?"

"Yamato. I can make portals with it," he reminded Dimitri, holding the sword up halfway. "You can't exactly stay here, having just busted me out and all. I don't imagine a lot of people had access to where they were storing the Chaos Emerald they took from me." He made a small sigh, looking towards the doorway to the holding area. "Then again... who knows if it matters. If I..."

He cut himself off, shaking his head. "Just pick somewhere. You can't stay here."

"I-I don't..." Dimitri stammered out, almost seeming like he was cut off by the question. As if he hadn't even stopped to consider what he'd do after he freed Sorun. "I'm not... entirely sure," he confessed. "I don't exactly have refuges set up in the event of something like this. I've nowhere to go."

"... Then go to my place. Hide under the bed or something, I don't know." Sorun made a single slice in the air, a small portal forming in front of the both of them. "Just don't touch any of my stuff." He paused. "... Take one of the books if you want. But put it back after."

"That's... generous." Dimitri seemed taken aback by the offer, genuine surprise showing on his face. He looked back and forth between the portal and Sorun, some of his mechanical tentacles twitching in an uncertain manner. "Sorun, regarding... whatever you decide doing, regarding the echidna who allied-"

"Do not. Just don't, Dimitri," Sorun said, shaking his head. "I'm not putting any thought towards them whatsoever, as far as I'm concerned they're all the same to me. Just leave already before I change my mind."

"... I understand." Dimitri made a resigned sound and turned around, floating through the portal. Sorun barely even waited a second after he disappeared before he slashed the sword again, closing the portal and leaving Sorun alone. Completely alone in this holding area.

The first thing Sorun did was walk over towards the nearest wall. He pressed his back against it, slowly sliding down into a sitting position as a long, weary sigh left him.

"I feel like I'm falling apart," he whispered under his breath, holding his free hand up to his head. It all seemed too cruel to be real, as if it were just some fever-driven nightmare he was experiencing. How every facet of his life just seemed to be... unraveling right before his eyes. All so soon, all so suddenly. Without any warning whatsoever. It made Sorun's head spin, how unreasonably fast it all crumbled away.

What was he even supposed to do about all of it? Could he even do something? Should he? Sorun's own thoughts felt like such a mess of a whirlwind he could barely think, let alone reason with himself over what he was supposed to do.

He heard a small sniffle from besides him. Laconically, Sorun's head listed off to the side, where he saw himself sitting besides him against the wall. Legs pulled up to his chest with his face pressed up against his knees. Sorun didn't know what to make of the sight. It was unfamiliar, strange-looking. He wasn't used to seeing such a sight.

Eventually, the other Sorun rose his head up from his knees to look at Sorun. He was a miserable sight, both in the state he was in and how he was conveying himself with his expression. Sad and anguished beyond all belief, and past all that just tired . "I'm sorry," he whispered out to Sorun.

"..." Sorun blinked once. "What...?"

"I just... I tried so hard, you know?" he murmured out, shuffling a bit in place as he stared ahead. "I tried so hard to steer us onto what I thought was the right path. A normal life - just living in peace. I thought it would be the perfect fix-all for everything. And so many times ..." He thumped his head back against the wall, making an invisible sound only Sorun could ever hear. "So many times I held you back from doing things because I thought it was the right thing to do. That this place, these people we'd come to befriend and ingratiate ourselves with... they all had a way of doing things. And if we followed those ways everything would be fine . Everyone was strong, they could take care of things, and until now it'd been working..."

He sounded so frustrated. Defeated. Like all the hope and belief had been ripped right out of him and all that was left was confusion and despair. It's exactly how Sorun felt.

"... But no. This world just... evidently fucking sucks . We could do every single little thing completely right and make no mistakes, but because this place is filled with megalomaniacs with god complexes or powers or whatever the hell else, it just... it doesn't stop !" A few tears ran down the other Sorun's face as he ran a hand through his hair. "How many times!? It's insanity! Over and over, one after another, no matter how many times we keep fighting and things keep settling down, it's just... it just keeps happening."

A slow, long-suffering sigh left him as his hand limply flopped down to his side. "Now people are dying," he murmured, visibly deflating from where he sat against the wall. "Virgil will never come back. He's just... gone forever. Other people, people we know , might be gone forever because of the borg bullshit Dimitri was talking about. I can't do it anymore."

"..." Sorun made a slow blink while looking at Sorun. "What are you-?"

"I was wrong. Alright? I was... I thought , that if we just kept to everyone else's standards and played along with the status quo that everything would work out again like it always did. That we could calm down and settle up all peacefully, so things would be fine and I wouldn't have to worry about everything falling apart, but it isn't working, none of it's working, none of it will work. So I'm done. I'm..."

Sorun trailed off, making a few choked breaths. And then he turned towards Sorun, shuffling towards him until he was right in front of him. Leaning forwards and placing his hands on Sorun's shoulders. Sorun made a confused sound, staring right at Sorun with an unsure expression.

"It's gotten to the point where things are happening that can't be undone and I just don't have it in me to steer you straight anymore and keep us from falling apart," Sorun admitted in a sad, anguished voice. "I've been trying to do both at once for so long and it's been running everything so ragged, I can't, and... and at this point I'm not even sure this world will let me steer us to some peaceful resolution while appeasing everyone around us at the same time. And it's what I want. I want so, so badly for you to just be... happy . All I've done is try everything in my power to give us a life that'll give you that. But this world just won't let it happen.

"So I'm not gonna try anymore. I'm not gonna... have your mind crumble away trying over and over again trying to appease everyone else's standards of what's right and wrong when it's not even gonna fucking matter in the end. It just doesn't work and we can't anymore. I'm sorry. That's just... how it is."

"..." Sorun continued to stare at the other Sorun. He didn't react at all when his hands slid over his shoulders so that his arms could wrap around his neck and tightly hug him against him. A choked sort of sob leaving the other Sorun before he spoke again.

"S-so I'm... I'm gonna go. Okay? I'm gonna go. I'm gonna leave you alone so I can just focus on making sure everything in this head doesn't fall to pieces, alright?" Sorun mumbled out, stroking a hand over the back of Sorun's head and through his hair. "I'm not gonna try and tell you what to do anymore. That's on you now."

"H-hey-" Sorun began to protest. He stopped when the other Sorun moved his hands back to his shoulders, leaning his head forwards so that both of their foreheads were touching.

"Forget what other people think, alright?" he said. "Forget what our friends think, what the Freedom Fighters think, what anyone else thinks. You should just do whatever it is you think is the right thing to do. Because their way just doesn't work. Because the world doesn't care about us, so we shouldn't care what it thinks." Sorun leaned his head back, looking Sorun right in the eyes as he squeezed down on his shoulders. "I'm gonna take care of everything in here, alright?" He poked his forehead. "So you take care of everything out here. However you think is best. And if that means you wanna go and start killing... go for it, man. Just go for it."

"..." A slow breath slowly left Sorun as he looked up at himself. "I don't want you to leave," he said, voice quiet and hollow. Everything was so hard already. Too hard for Sorun to take it without having another voice to help him through it all. "I-I don't want to be alone."

"You'll be fine," Sorun assured Sorun, voice cracked and broken. "Whatever happens... you'll be you. Alright? Whatever decision you make, however you choose to go forwards from here on out, it'll be the right thing to do because you said it was. Don't listen to anyone else. We can't do that anymore," he said, breathing shaking as he released Sorun's shoulders. "Make your own right. It's all this world's gonna allow. And you..." His eyes drifted down towards the sword Sorun held, laying in his lap. "... You got the power to make all that happen. So do whatever you want."

"..." Sorun looked down at Yamato, his own reflection gleaming off the flat end of the katana. He made it sound so easy. It... would be easy. Whether it was something Sorun actually wanted or not was...

... He never even thought about it. To have a peaceful life without worries with all his friends - that was all he had wanted. To just... live and not worry. That was the one, sole thing Sorun wanted above all else. And he was right. He didn't even know if the world would let him have something like that. At the very least, it was becoming more and more clear that his current way of doing things just wasn't cutting it. Something had to change.

Maybe it was just him that needed to change.

"..." Sorun looked back up. There was nobody there. Just him, alone. Sitting there with his back against the wall. Just him and his sword. Sorun tilted his head back to look at the ceiling, a slow breath leaving him. "It's quiet." A beat passed as he continued staring upwards. "... I don't like it."

He wasn't sure how long he sat there thinking. Maybe minutes, maybe an hour or two. Sorun just... sat there. Thinking, once in a while tapping at the sword resting in his lap. About what to do, and how to proceed forwards. Empty ideas bouncing around his completely empty head, because the more Sorun deliberated on it the more and more he realized there was really only one thing he wanted to do. He wanted to save his home so he could go back to living peacefully. And he didn't want to have to think about or worry about people hurting it anymore. He just wanted to fix things.

"Hey! Hey you!"

Sorun's eyes lazily drifted forwards. It was... one of them. One of those Yurashia Mobians who had been guarding him. A lynx-looking one dressed like a ninja. The bodysuit with bits of armor and weapons strapped to his body and everything. He saw Sorun was outside of his cell and was running towards him, drawing the single-edged straight sword that was strapped to his back.

"..." Sorun grasped Yamato and slashed it outwards. It cut through the lynx's legs with absolutely zero resistance, cleanly enough that the resulting blood spatter made a crescent shape in the floor behind him.

The lynx screamed out. Sword clattering onto the ground as he fell onto his back, face twisted in pain as his arms automatically grabbed at one of the stumps of his leg. The screaming was cut off when Sorun's sword stabbed into the ground right next to his head, causing his eyes to snap open and fear overtake his expression when he saw Sorun kneeling above him, hand on the handle of the sword.

"W-wait, wait!" he pleaded out. Sorun twisted the sword stabbing into the ground, the blade's edge pointing towards the Mobian's neck now. "No no no, wait, please-!"

Sorun pushed the sword down on an angle, right onto the Mobian's neck. Like a paper cutter slicing through a sheaf of papers. Or a guillotine. His head was instantly severed from the rest of his body, a single whispery gasp leaving the lynx before he went completely still and silent. Dead.

"..." Sorun tilted his head down at the corpse in a curious manner. It was so easy. Just like that, just... just gone. He could keep doing that, no problem. With Yamato he could...

Yamato.

"..." He looked down at the sword in his hand. With this , sure. He could solve all of this no problem. But the issue was this was all Sorun had, and he'd never absorbed this Chaos Emerald in consideration of his own health, never permanently bound it to himself. And if he dropped it or one of these people somehow wrenched it from his grasp, that would be it . He'd be captured again and there would be no Dimitri to bail him out a second time. He needed more than this. He needed...

Sorun's eyes glanced down at the lynx's body. The blood seeping out from where he'd severed his head from his shoulders. For a brief moment he'd recalled the last time he'd been captured. That coyote, that not-Antoine whose blood accidentally got into Sorun's mouth. One single tiny drop of blood chock-full of Chaos energy because, from what he could see, every single Mobian in existence was a walking reservoir of power. He hadn't wanted to indulge at the time because of how wrong it seemed. How inhuman.

Now he just didn't care anymore. He wanted to save his home. Forget everything else.

Sorun reached down and grasped the severed head sitting on the floor. He lifted it above his head, watching as the blood dripped from the severed part of his neck and towards the floor. There'd been zero hesitation on Sorun's part, not second-thoughts, nothing. Just utter silence in Sorun's own head as he opened his mouth and let the blood drip into Sorun's mouth-

His eyes widened, pupils blowing out slightly as the taste hit him.

He remembered one of his earliest birthdays where his mother gave him that one drink. He was... fairly certain it was just normal store-bought tea with an unreasonable amount of sugar put inside of it because he, as a picky child, hadn't liked how normal tea tasted. Maybe it wasn't the best parenting, what his mother had done with that tea just so Sorun could stomach it. Or maybe she'd just made an exception that one time due to it being his birthday. Maybe it was still an irresponsible choice due to how young he'd been at he time.

Sorun himself hadn't cared at the time. It was a time where he'd been absolutely immersed in love to the point that half of that celebration had just been his own mother holding him. The sheer warmth of that time was a feeling he was never able to really replicate. But now he was so keenly reminded of that time he couldn't help but feel those emotions wash over him again.

He remembered that diner he'd go to with his friends. That tiny, quaint, rinky-dink little diner with the shitty burgers that Dave just adored for whatever reason. But the fries had been the best in the city, at least as far as Sorun was concerned. And there was just something about that in-house cola they sold that made it better than any other soda Sorun had ever drunken. He didn't know what the owner put in that stuff. An unreasonable amount of sugar, maybe. Sorun just remembered tasting it reminded him of all the times he and his friends would go there. Celebrating something, maybe Sorun winning a game tournament or whatever. A holiday, someone else's accomplishment. Just... hanging out. Really, they used every single little excuse they could all find to go to that place as much as possible.

And that soda. That damn soda would be there every time, because Sorun was practically addicted to it. And he'd never cared. Those days drinking that soda that was likely stripping years off his life was just a reminder of all the good times he'd had in that place, with those he cared about more than anything else. It tasted like home.

That Mobian blood tasted exactly like all of that. Like over-sugared tea that tasted of warmth and love. Of sugary soft drinks that tasted like home. It tasted like all that and more.

Laughing.

Sorun didn't even know when it was he'd stood up, running his hand through his black hair streaked with strands of white. He was fairly certain he'd been so overwhelmed with how mind-numbingly good that blood tasted he'd blacked out for a moment or two, because the next time he became aware of his surroundings he was standing up above the fresh corpse he'd made. Laughing and giggling, staring down at the body as feelings of absolute bliss coursed through him.

"Everything feels so great," Sorun thought to himself, looking down at his hands. The fingers on his right hand were... blackened, with dark scales and hide appearing in place of the skin on his fingers, and the nails elongating into sharp claws. And more than that he felt good . Strong and light. Not quite to the extent Devil's Body made him feel, but it was a similar sensation nonetheless, if less so. All from just a few mouthfuls of that blood.

And he was laughing , he realized. Quiet, breathy giggling that he couldn't help let out because of how strong he felt and that blissful taste lingering in his mouth. His home was being invaded and people were being hurt and he was here laughing, he realized. The absolute absurdity of it caused Sorun to run his clawed hand down his face from the absurdity of it all, deep lines being cut into his flesh that sealed shut and completely healed moments later.

"... Man." Sorun's hands dropped down to his side, a final breathy laugh terminating into a sigh as his head tilted up to the ceiling. A small, near-delirious smile on his face. "I think... yeah. I'm just gonna kill everyone."

It could work. He could do it, with power like this coursing through him and a sword that could cut through anything.

Green-glowing eyes flickered to the ground. He'd ended up dropping the sword at one point and now the Chaos Emerald was lying down on the ground, he'd reached for it, but then stopped when he saw his right hand reaching out towards the gem. "Left one," he decided, grabbing the Emerald with his left hand and transmuting it into the sword while leaving that clawed right hand open.

"..." He looked towards the open entranceway to the holding cell that lead off to the rest of this place. A last single laugh left Sorun as he ran towards it, clawed fingers scraping grooves into the metal wall as he ran past.

A/N- In which I'm gonna have to turn this story's rating from a T to an M after I upload the next chapter. Which honestly with some stuff that's happened earlier in story I probably should have already, but eh.

Chapter 107

Recursion Error

Episode 107- Taste the blood

"So, uh... from the Yagyu clan, huh?" Within the metal corridor were two Mobians, dressed in the traditional attire of their homeland in Yurashia. Tight-fitting outfits with light armoring, with the one being addressed by the other, a bat Mobian, wearing a face mask over his mouth. The other, a lynx, awkwardly rocked back and forth on his feet while speaking and looking towards the doorway they were guarding.

It was their assignment, after all. Stand in this corridor and guard this open doorway.

The bat Mobian made a slow blink and slowly looked towards the weasel speaking to him. "... Ah-huh," he answered.

"Ah. Er. Excellent." The lynx cleared his throat, still rocking back and forth on his feet as he tried his best to strike up conversation. "It, uh... it any good? In that clan? I hear it can be kind of rough there."

"Ah-huh."

"... Neat." The lynx clapped his hands together, breathing out awkwardly as he looked back at the doorway they were guarding. It lead to another corridor, currently enshrouded by darkness due to the lights in that section of the Egg Dome being out of commission "Any clue how long it is they're going to be having us guarding this spot?" he asked.

The bat made a small grunt. "No," he answered.

"Oh. Okay." The lynx clicked his tongue in acknowledgement. "I'm only asking because it's been a few hours and I really don't think this is the best use of our time-"

There was a scream in the darkened corridor they stood in front of. Both Mobians looked towards the source of the scream, and both stilled at the sound of it. It'd been blood-curdling, terror filled. And it'd cut off abruptly, so suddenly and without warning. Whatever it was, though, neither of the two were able to see. That corridor was still pitch-black.

"Uhm..." The lynx blinked nervously, looking back and forth between the bat and the black corridor. "So we should... that's something we should check, right?" he asked, as if attempting to confirm.

"We're to guard this entranceway to the joining corridor," the bat succinctly answered, tone calm and stoic. Though there was the slightest bit of hesitation to his tone, his eyes still locked onto the darkness ahead of them. "That section is currently being tended to by others. It is not our responsibility."

"Okay, but that scream sounded bad," the lynx pointed out. "And I feel like us guarding this specific spot entails investigating potential danger of said spot, which, by virtue of how bad that scream sounded, means we should go check out that sound."

"... Hm." The fabric of the bat's face mask rippled slightly as he pursed his lips, dipping his head down slightly in thought. He didn't actually voice whatever potential thoughts going through his head - only continued to hum and think.

"... Alright, well, how about you just stay while I go check it out," the lynx suggested as he leaned his head towards the darkened corridor. "That counts, right? As long as we stay in-"

There was a pair of eyes looking at them from within the darkness of that corridor, he realized. Irises glowing green and stretched to vertical slits, boring right at the two Mobians.

"E-er... Li?" A startled sort of gasp left the lynx as he stepped back a bit, nervously glancing between the eyes and the Mobian bat standing next to him. "That's... that's you, right, Li? Could you try saying something if-"

A clawed had reached out from the darkness, just a bit too fast for the lynx to properly register. There's been a quiet squelch! sound he'd heard besides him, making him momentarily freeze in fright from the sound before slowly turning towards the sound.

He'd seen what had made that sound the moment he turned and looked. A human hand with blackened fingers and claws reaching out from the darkness, grabbing his bat companion's head, claws digging into his face's flesh. There'd been no time to react before the hand pulled , a louder squelching, cracking sound following.

The frontal plate of the bat's skull hand been torn off entirely and pulled back into the darkness. He'd heard such sounds . Muscles and tendons snapping as the face was pulled away, bone cracking, blood splashing to the ground as the bat stumbled a bit. A choked sort of wheeze left his exposed throat, the innards of his head having been exposed from the removal of his face, eyes absent due to being pulled along with it. His heart had pumped, causing blood to spurt out from he exposed arteries and veins in his head before his brain slowly began to slide out from the massive hole in front of his skull cap. It'd ended up sliding out completely, hanging on by the brain steam as the bat's body fell over entirely, twitching on the ground as blood pooled around him.

For the lynx's part he'd been stunned at the sight, small, fearful whimpers leaving him as he looked down at the body. From the corner of his eyes there'd been movement. Green trails of light following the eyes as they moved out from the darkness, the owner's head staring right at the lynx as the eyes' owner moved in blurring speeds.

The Mobian had screamed out from the sight. He'd reached behind his back, attempting to grab at the sword strapped between his shoulder blades. His fingers had only managed to barely brush against the sword handle before Sorun's own sword flashed out, disconnecting his head from his shoulders.

"Truly worthless." It's the only thing Sorun could think to say as he looked down at the two corpses. He ran the flat end of his sword along his tongue, licking up the blood sticking to the blade and briefly shuddering from the blissful taste that settled on his tongue. He took a fraction of a moment to get used to the burst of energy that spread throughout his body before he continued sprinting forwards.

Get to the throne room.

It was about the one, solitary goal Sorun had in mind. Get to the throne room because there was a good chance Snively and Regina were in there. Concerning the general layout of the Egg Dome, Sorun flat-out didn't know it. He'd only been once, when the entirety of Knothole had been kidnapped by Eggman and he had to be the one to go save everyone.

That'd been one room. The one with all the pods. This was a series of corridors and connecting rooms, nearly maze-like. Armories and bunk rooms and such. Random background Sorun didn't care enough to pay attention to.

Oh, but the Mobians, though. So many of those ninjas and such brought over from Yurashia, practically infesting the place. At some point Sorun assumed some general alert went out across the facility, because they stopped being surprised at seeing them. There were certainly a lot of emotions he saw flitting over all their faces before he cut them down, but surprise wasn't among them.

Fairly sure, at least. He wasn't stopping to pay attention. He wasn't stopping at all. Keep moving forwards - it was the one single, solitary goal Sorun had in mind.

"So many of you!" He'd rounded another hallway, sprinting all the while, digging his clawed hand into the metal floor to act as a pivot to turn his body so he could keep up momentum. More Mobians down that hallway, holding swords, spears. Some even had bows . He almost felt amused at how hard they were sticking to the ninja aesthetic. Bows . For him .

He swung his sword out, completely carving a Mobian in half, blood spraying out against the walls, Sorun's face, his clothes. He didn't skip a beat, didn't even stop to acknowledge it as he moved forwards to the next ones. Two Mobians.

Sorun's left hand holding the sword thrust outward, piercing the throat of one of the Mobians and dragging the sword through his neck to completely cut it open. His right, clawed hand shot out and grabbed the other one by the face. He'd slammed his head into the wall, enough for his head to become complete pulp as it smashed against the surface. He kept moving, ducking his head to the side slightly to duck under an arrow heading for one of his eyes.

Slow. It'd been... so slow to his own vision. He cut the leg off the Mobian who'd shot at him, making him scream out as he collapsed to a single knee. In the same motion Sorun reversed the motion of his sword and slashed up, right through the head of the Mobian to chop it in half.

He breathed out, looking further down the hall. Even more Mobians, dressed in that ridiculous ninja getup. He almost wondered how loyal it was they were to whatever these clans they belonged to they were. That they would all stand there, trembling slightly as they held their weapons and stared him down. Stand there they did, though. Some even ran at Sorun. Either out of blind loyalty or because they genuinely did believe there was some chance against him-

One of the ones who'd run at him made some... strange twisting maneuver with their sword against his when they approached. He'd felt a strange torque as a result, the force wrenching the handle from his grip and disarming him completely, causing his own sword to drop down on the ground, reverting back into the Emerald the second he lost contact with it.

"Ah...?" He glanced up at the bat Mobian who disarmed him. They didn't have nothing going for them, it seemed. It wasn't wholly blind confidence - there was skill there. More sword skill than his, even. He'd still reached out and grabbed at his arm, pulling it right off. The bat had screamed as blood sprayed out against Sorun, some catching his mouth and causing his eyes to widen further when the taste hit him.

He grabbed the Mobian by the throat and beat him over the face with the severed arm. Did it until his saw his facial bones cave in, and then flipped the severed arm around. Stabbing the sharpened bones sticking out through the end of the arm through they eye of the Mobian, who made little more than a wheezing gasp as Sorun tossed his body against the floor hard enough for blood to splash over the metal.

"Blood was the right idea I guess." Sorun looked back ahead towards the Emerald right at the moment he caught the sight of steel slashing towards his face. He'd blinked out once when he felt a long groove be cut into his face by yet another Mobian's sword, another lynx, the sting lasting for barely a moment as the wound rapidly healed shut and disappeared. "This feels so much better with a body that doesn't break down from a few hits..."

Better . That word Sorun thought stuck with him for some reason. It was a thought that made him ponder as his clawed hand swiped at the Mobian's jaw and tore it off entirely. There'd been a wet, garbled scream of pain by him as the lynx stumbled back, blood flowing down from his mouth as his eyes bugged out in panic. Sorun's clawed hand swiped upwards this time, fingers piercing through the roof of his mouth and tearing through flesh and bone, exiting through the Mobian's eyes. He yanked , pulling the frontal plate of his skull right out of his head and causing him to collapse dead on the floor.

Nothing about this was supposed to be better . That was Sorun's one chief thought as he stepped over the body, licking at the blood on his hands and feeling another burst of that invigorating power flow through him. He'd kicked the Emerald back up to his hand to reform his katana, the other Mobians in front of him stepping back fearfully. It was supposed to be grisly, morbid work. A visceral loss of life that wasn't to be celebrated in any regard.

And yet...

His body surged forwards again, moving with unnatural speed. Sword flicked out, cutting another Mobian in half. That feeling again, what... what was that? He was feeling something . Relief that this was one less person that could hurt him and his? Vindication? Retribution for everything done to him? Everything done back home? None of that seemed right.

Satisfaction?

"..." Another Mobian swung towards Sorun. He met the blade with his own, power coursing through the Yamato's blade. It simply cut through the sword with zero resistance whatsoever and sliced the Mobian's head right off his shoulders. And Sorun's brows furrowed, just the tiniest bit. The feeling wasn't there that time.

He turned towards another Mobian taking a swing at him. He cut the power coursing through the sword off, and then swung up to meet it. There was a satisfying clang! that echoed in the hall, a few metal sparks flying from the contact, and there it was. That tiny, near-imperceptible feeling of excitement that shot through Sorun when he heard that sound. Blocking the sword, sidestepping the Mobian and piercing his chest with Yamato, dragging the sword through his body and out his side, barely even sticking around to watch his body drop as he continued sprinting down the hall.

Satisfaction.

Oh, it wasn't optimal in any stretch of the word. Sorun knew that. Optimal play would be to just... instantly cut through everything with Yamato. That would practically be child's play, it would. There was a point where he did do that, coming across a bridge across a wide, seemingly bottomless gap between two sections of the facility. A wide bridge with nearly a dozen more of those Yurashia Mobians at the end, more bats and lynxes, all holding bows. Archers. Aiming at Sorun. That arrows were easy enough to dodge, body weaving back and forth between the dreadfully slow projectiles. Power crackled along the Yamato's edge again as he slashed it forwards.

Dozens upon dozens of slashes assaulted the bodies of the Mobians despite the meters of distance between them and Sorun. Cut apart to pieces immediately before they had any notion of what was even happening, Sorun sprinting right by the parts and pieces of their corpses falling to the ground. That was something, but it didn't elicit those earlier feelings of satisfaction Sorun had felt.

He had to go fast. He knew that, knew that delaying possibly put others back in New Mobotropolis at risk. Dimitri's words were still ringing faintly in the back of his head. It was part of why he'd sprinted past all the minced corpses at such a rapid pace, blazed on down through the hallways while cutting down everything in his-

When Sorun had rounded a corner the edge of a sword had been swinging right towards him, as if somebody had been waiting behind the corner. His body dropped to the ground as he slid across the floor and under the blade. His clawed right hand tore at the ground to stop his momentum, metallic sparks getting kicked up from the action as he stopped, whirled around onto his feet, and stabbed his sword through the brain of the Mobian who'd attempted to blindside him.

Another ran up to him, some shrill cry leaving his mouth. Of determination or terror, Sorun couldn't tell which. Nor did he waste time attempting to discern it as he took a single step back to dodge the blade, eyes rapidly flicking back and forth between the Mobian and the blade that narrowly missed Sorun. He tried gripping his katana with both hands and slashed upwards, right through the torso of the Mobian. And there was the feeling again. Dodging, countering, feeling the weight and resistance of a body being cut through without any powers making the cuts effortless.

... It couldn't be that much a difference. A matter of a couple minutes - that's all it was. It couldn't amount to much, Sorun reasoned. What was burning through a couple more minutes if Sorun chose to not do this as efficiently and optimally as possible? It wasn't a significant difference. Not one that mattered in any important capacity. He could afford to slow down just a little bit.

A new room he'd entered. A more circular with multiple doorways around that lead off into adjacent hallways. Sorun was less focused on that and more at the Mobians surrounding him, slowly circling in. They were clutching their weapons tightly enough he saw them shaking in their grasps. Some wearing fear-laden expressions in their eyes, others' faces set in grim determination, though it was hard to make out precisely due to the facemasks some wore. But all in his way regardless, which was as far as Sorun cared to see.

He gripped both hands around the handle of Yamato, curiously eyeing all the surrounding Mobians. To cut them all to pieces instantly with Yamato - that would be easy. But he found himself not... wanting to do that. He wanted to recapture that feeling. But they weren't advancing. They were just slowly circling, surrounding, getting into positions but not actually doing anything. Going so slow when he just wanted them to move and swing already!

Eventually Sorun got too impatient and burst forwards, sword whistling through the air as he decapitated one of the Mobians. The others surged forwards towards Sorun once he made that first move, and he found himself feeling gleeful of all things for the fact. Dodging a sword left, stepping right to avoid a stab. Batting blades away with the flat end of his own, watching the sparks fly through the air. Blood splashing onto his skin and clothing every time he saw an opening and slashed at one of them, cleaving their bodies apart.

He'd hated fighting all those times in the past. Sorun remembered it vividly : back when he was fighting with the Freedom Fighters, how every single time he went with the others to go fight those robots of Eggman's there'd been that underlying fear and panic of that being it, that there was a chance he'd die there. He hated all that conflict so much every time. Wanted it to just end. And when it came to the bigger fights, the Enerjak and King Shadow fights, there had been so much going on in Sorun's head that he hadn't had an opportunity to even think of his own feelings at those times.

Things felt much clearer here. These were wholly different feelings he was having right now. There was no fear; why would there be? With a body that healed wounds so rapidly, was so much stronger and faster than all these Mobians to the point that not a single one was landing a single blow on Sorun? And this was so much more engaging than fighting those robots! Gone were the predictable patterns, the familiar moves he'd memorized from those models, that inherent instinct of just knowing how they'd attack from the smallest movements.

No, this was different, fighting these Mobians. Different levels of strength and skill. Different moves, different reactions, some managed to even dodge and block some of Sorun's swings, even if blocking resulted in the bones in their arms shattering from the sheer strength Sorun's own swings brought. It was as if every single different Mobian Sorun fought forced him to intuit their intentions and attacks differently each time, making him adapt over and over and change things up, even if it was ever so slightly.

It was thrilling . Fun in a way that Sorun had never expected, not from this of all things. But it was. The simple fact of the matter was that he was having fun cutting and slicing through all these Mobians. The intensity of it, the satisfaction of solving every little bout by way of seeing a cut-apart body fall to his feet as he moved onto the next one, that sweet-tasting blood splashing around everywhere. Oh, how easy it was to get lost in it all. No, why would he ever use Yamato's power of separation to end things so quickly when this felt so much better?

"I love this." As Sorun sliced upwards, having sliced a Mobian from groin to head in such a way their body was completely split down the middle, both halves falling to the sides and drenching him with blood, an absolutely euphoric expression had settled on his face. He licked some of the stray blood off his face, a few more of his strands of hair turning from black to white as he turned to the rest of the Yurashia Mobians with bliss clear in his eyes. "It's so much fun...!"

Oh. The two left were... running. He'd heard their swords clatter to the ground as the remaining two Mobians turned around and just began running away. Sorun had blinked once, a feeling of irritation flashing through him as he felt his mood suddenly spoiled.

"Gah, quit it ." Sorun had run up being one of the retreating Mobians. One hand grabbed at his head, wrenching it to the side and exposing his neck for Sorun to plunge his sword down into. It'd been a quick thrust - his sword plunging in and out too quickly for the Mobian to get so much as a garbled scream of pain out before he'd swung the sword forward, a large gash appearing on the metal floor in front of the other fleeing Mobian.

He'd stopped when he saw that gash, skidding to a halt as he whirled back around towards Sorun. The lower half of his face wasn't visible due to the black cloth mask over his mouth, but his eyes were wide. Fearful and shaking, heavy breaths leaving him as he watched Sorun toss the dead body over his shoulder.

"..." Soru blinked once at the Mobian, and then looked to the side. At one of the swords that had been dropped by them. He walked over towards them and kicked one of the swords out towards the lynx, the blade skittering across the ground before coming to rest at the Mobian's feet. He just breathed out heavier, looking up and down between Sorun and the sword without even motioning to get it.

"... Don't wanna try?" Sorun asked. There was a hopeful edge to his tone as he cocked his head at him, though it was mainly filled with disappointment. He didn't want victims who just ran away and left themselves wide open. He wanted fights . He just wanted him to take a swing and actually try.

But he wasn't picking the sword up. He wasn't doing anything, actually. Wasn't running, wasn't fighting, wasn't dropping to his knees and begging Sorun. Just... standing there, shaking. Making small, unintelligible and high-pitched, frightened whimpers that were intermingled with his breath as he just stood there shaking and looking at Sorun. Completely frozen with terror to the spot without moving.

And then the frightened whimpers turned to choked gags when Sorun strolled past him, dragging Yamato across his throat without ever breaking stride. Not even bothering to glance behind him as blood sprayed out from his wound to splatter against the wall as the body fell behind him. The only thing that did serve to improve his mood even the smallest bit was when he licked the blood off his sword, feeling rejuvenated by another burst of energy surging through him.

"No, no, no. None of that."

Oh, they were locking the doors now. Large, metal bulkhead doors that would slid down from the corridor walls that were multiple inches thick with steel.

It didn't actually matter . He just kept cutting through the doors with Yamato and running through them. And there were always just more of those Mobians from Yurashia on the other side waiting for him, dressed in all that ridiculous ninja garb. Bats and lynxes of all colors that all just started to... blur together the further Sorun went and the more of them he fought. He wasn't really even paying attention to what they were specifically nor did he care enough to try and realize it. Yurashia Mobians. Ninjas. That's all he was focusing on. Killing anything that looked like that.

Furry blood bags standing between him and his goal that he was having fun cutting through. That was all they were, as far as Sorun was concerned. None of them were even lasting longer than a couple of seconds - much too short to commit any to memory. Which was primarily the reason he couldn't recall how many he'd killed by this point.

Hell, he didn't even know how long he'd been doing this. He didn't even feel tired. All the Chaos energy he kept consuming along with all this blood was likely ravaging his body, but hell if it wasn't boosting him so much in the short term. He just felt more and more and more awake the further he went along with this.

It was actually starting to become a problem.

"No no no no..." Everything was going too slow for Sorun. Like that sword currently being swung at his face. With how cranked up Sorun's reflexes were it was just... so laughably easy to sidestep it, slice to the side with Yamato and sever the Mobian's arms. Pull his elbows back to aim the sword at Sorun's side as the armless Mobian stumbled back screaming, pierce forwards and stab completely through his side. Dodge left to avoid another attack, swing his arm back to cut the other Mobian's head cleanly in half without looking back.

The damn arrows some at the other end of the hallway he was in were firing at him. Even those weren't cutting it. He... saw them flying towards him in midair, was child's play to either bat them away with Yamato or just sidestep them.

"Too easy." He'd vaulted over a Mobian who swung at him in a wide, horizontal swing. Arcing right over his body, clawed hand scraping against the ceiling and sending metal sparks raining down as he landed behind him. Spinning around to literally cut his legs off from beneath him, with Sorun catching him by the head before he dropped to the ground. "Everything's too slow. Or I'm too fast. Is it me?" Sorun wondered as he tossed the legless Mobian into the arms of another. In a pure gut-reaction move the Mobian had dropped his sword and caught the legless one, only for Sorun to then skewer both of them at the end of his sword. "I need... I need..."

He looked down at Yamato as he tore it from from Mobians' bodies. The problem was this , he realized. The sword. Even without using its actual power it was too light, too nimble. He was too experience in using it and was too comfortable with it. It was making things too easy.

"I need a worse sword. I need that sword."

In a flash of blue sparks and whirling blue particles the sword changed. Where once Sorun had been holding a long, slender katana, now it was a claymore sword with a longer, straighter, and much wider blade. And so much heavier , too. Sorun had actually felt himself tip over a bit and nearly dropped Rebellion all together when the sheer weight of this sword he wasn't used to holding threatened to slip from his grip.

"Oh, huh." Sorun blinked once in surprise. It certainly was a different feeling. He decided to try it out a bit, swinging the large blade at the Mobian nearest to him and- Oh! He'd actually dodged it! The blade was moving so much slower than when Sorun was swinging Yamato due to its weight and his inexperience that the Mobian actually managed to duck under it!

A wide, gleeful grin spread across Sorun's face as the excitement began rushing back. As he made a second swing and managed to chop Rebellion down onto the Mobian's shoulder he realized even that felt different than using Yamato. That sword sliced cleanly through things, but this, this cleaved and tore. Completely rent flesh apart through sheer force rather than precision, and he could feel all that running up the blade and through his arms.

He lifted Rebellion up out of the Mobian's shoulder. Brought it down, cleaving through half his torso, and then pushed upwards at a diagonal angle. The sword tore right through his torso once more, passing through an arm and right up through his other shoulder. The sheer force that went behind the swing practically made the body parts fly apart, a crescent trail of blood briefly being traced up through the air behind the blade as more blood splashed against Sorun.

When Sorun ran forwards right through all the viscera and towards the next nearest Mobian he'd actually panicked and tried to block with his weapon. Sorun had aimed Rebellion forwards and pierced through, watching as the tip of the sword smashed through the Mobian's sword and sent shards spilling everywhere as he impaled the Mobian's torso. And the weight behind the sword had carried him forward, actually making Sorun stumble a few couple of steps from the unexpected tug.

"This thing is so unwieldly. So heavy and awkward to swing around." He lifted the Mobian's body up while it was impaled by the sword, opening his mouth to catch the blood dripping down from his wound and onto Sorun's face. He'd only kept the act up for a few seconds before swinging his arm to the side, the body flying off and impacting the wall with a wet crunch! noise. When the next Mobian tried swinging his own blade at Sorun and he'd responded in kind by meeting it with Rebellion, he'd ended up knocking the sword out of the Mobian's hand entirely. And evidently broke his hands in the process if his fingers bending in wrong directions said anything. And when he'd tried swinging down the last Mobian in the room besides him, the one that had been using the bow, dove to push him out of the way and actually managed it, Sorun swinging so slowly he'd missed both of them. "Gah, this thing sucks to use. I love it."

He'd still ended up readjusting his aim and stabbing downwards. Impaling them both through their abdomens, the both of them screaming as Sorun walked forwards while dragging them along, bodies skewered onto Rebellion's blade. He'd lazily swung forwards, dislodging their bodies and watching them roll across the bloodied flooring before coming to a halt.

Sorun stepped between the two of them. One of them, the one with the broken fingers, was already dead. Bled out right there. The other one was still clinging to life, small whimpering gasps leaving leaving him as he weakly tried to crawl forwards, leaving a trail of blood underneath him from all the blood leaking from his pierced stomach.

"How many of you are there?" Sorun wondered aloud to him, using his foot to push him over onto his back. The Mobian wasn't even looking at Sorun. There were quick, rapid gasps leaving his body as he looked up at the ceiling, the rest of his body unmoving as he just... laid there. Breathing. "I mean, I've gone through I don't even know how many of you. It's actually impressive you guys went so far to bat for Regina, that's... hell. You people are built different over in Yurashia, loyalty like that."

Sorun wasn't even joking around with that; he couldn't believe they kept trying no matter how many he'd cut through. He barely even understood why, but maybe that was just ignorance on his part for how all these... "clans" that monkey guy in New Mobotropolis mentioned worked. He knew next to nothing on Yurashia culture, so he couldn't understand what kept driving them on. If it was some sense of loyalty or blind honor or something along those lines.

"Ah, well, doesn't matter too much... eh?" Sorun stopped when he noticed the panting Mobian beneath him had suddenly gone still, not moving as glassy eyes vacantly stared up at the ceiling. He'd knelt down on a single knee, grabbing one of his arms and lifting it up. "Ah. You done?" Sorun asked, letting go and watching the arm limply fall down on the corpse's chest. "Yeah, you're done. Hm?"

His right arm certainly didn't look like how it was supposed to. Didn't look human, not like the rest of his body. Where once there was pale skin on the palm of his hand and underside of his arm there were shimmering, dark blue scales. Where there was skin on he upper portion of his hand and arm there was now thick, blackened hide. The arm as a whole looked... different. Inhuman. Familiar .

The sight made Sorun pause as he stared, an almost forlorn expression crossing his features. He knew instantly what it was, what it meant. And to think it'd progressed this quickly from him consuming all that blood... it made him wonder just how many months of his life he'd burned through doing everything he'd just done. Or years, even.

"Can't have something for nothing, I guess..."

And then he heard the whistling sound rapidly approaching from behind him. Sorun whirled around, blinking once in surprise when he saw the sharpened piece of metal flying directly towards his face. Looking closer it was some... circular piece of metal with four sharpened points, spinning through the air and heading straight for his eyes. And then he blinked again when he realized it was a shuriken. A shuriken of all things.

It's been too slow, of course. Sorun simple rose his index finger up to catch the shuriken by threading his finger through the hole in the center of the shuriken, spinning it around as his looked at the weapon in something bordering on disbelief. "... You all really take this ninja thing seriously, huh?" he asked, almost sounding surprised. "Well, if nothing else I can respect a bunch of powerless Mobians choosing the blade in an age of guns. 'Cause hey . If that's how you wanna roll..."

He stood up to his feet fully while tossing the shuriken aside with such force it'd shattered to pieces when it impacted with the wall. He tiled his head when he saw a strange sight down the hallway: shimmering shapes. And then a small "ahh" noise left his mouth when he saw those shimmering shapes gain colors, definition. The sight of Mobians just appearing from thin air, standing in the hall or clinging to the walls. Mobians that were all different from the ones previous. Chameleons with various colors of scales, blues, greens, some purples. Five in total. Wearing very different ninja garb from the rest. Shoes and gloves styled in a way that he recognized.

"There's a familiar sight," Sorun found himself murmuring out. As far as he could tell they were all just different-colored Espios. They even dressed the same as him. It made all sorts of questions pop up in-

Every single one of those questions instantly vanished when Sorun felt the kunai stab through the back of his neck and stab through the front. There'd been a sixth one, still invisible that had snuck up behind him to stab him in the neck. And for Sorun's part, he just... looked down at the blade piercing through his neck. And stared. Almost in disbelief at the audaciousness of it all.

And then he rolled his eyes, reaching behind him to grab the chameleon Mobian by the head and slam him into the wall hard enough that his head collapsed and splattered against it, and then reached up to tear the kunai out from his throat.

On little more than a fanciful whim, Sorun tried throwing it. It was... phenomenally harder throwing a kunai than he'd anticipated. Instead of going straight the weapon ended up just spinning through the air and curving into a wall without even coming close to hitting one of the other five chameleons. He rolled his eyes at the sight and darted forwards, Rebellion skittering across the ground as he dragged the claymore behind him.

With the closest chameleon Sorun had raised his sword up. And then was paused when he'd raised the sword too high, causing its edge and tip to catch along the wall besides him. The chameleon saw it as an opportunity to charge forwards with a small knife; Sorun had just torn the sword through the wall, leaving behind a massive gash as he cleaved the sword through the chameleon and cut him in half. The same for the others: swinging the sword in a wide arc, catching two across the chest to tear through their ribs and organs. The fourth was cut down in much the same way.

The fifth, he'd tried sneaking up behind Sorun. They seemed to do that a lot - sneaking. He straightened his left arm out behind him, piercing in his direction with Rebellion and feeling the blade stab right through the chameleon's torso. He'd made a wheezing, garbled sort of gasp, shakily looking down at the sword piercing him before Sorun tore it out and batted him over the face with the flat end of the sword. Hard enough the bones in the chameleon's face shattered and flattened on impact and sent him sprawling onto the ground, body unmoving.

"... Well, you look the part, at least. Not sure what your relationship to Espio is, if any, but you certainly didn't share his talent," Sorun murmured out under his breath as he looked between all the chameleons' corpses, taking in the sight of them all. For all he said, though, he couldn't deny that there were a startlingly large amount of similarities between these chameleons and Espio to be chalked up to coincidence. The clothing, the fighting styles. Sonic saying Espio had been seen here with the other Mobians from Yurashia.

"..." Sighing out, Sorun shook his head and continued moving back down the hallway. It was whatever. Espio and whatever was going on with him was about the last possible thing Sorun was concerned with at the moment. He was more focused on getting to the throne room than anything else.

Jian would easily go as far to say she genuinely hated all the clans in Yurashia.

Would be that life there was easy. It could have been easy, too, which hurt the most for her. She could clearly envision living a calm, easy life in her home village could be easy.

But then there were the gods-forsaken clans who just... seemed to make it their life's missions to make the lives of others in Yurashia and the Dragon Kingdom much, much more difficult than it needed to be. Between the Yagyu Clan who would ransack helpless villages for selfish gain, or the Raiju Clan who seemed to do whatever they please at their own whim. The other two clans who, as far as Jian was concerned, did little to nothing to actually help with matters.

There had been that one monkey. Khan. He'd... definitely tried to help things. Him and some others, and Jian could at least appreciate the effort. Even if all those efforts came up too short to matter.

But as it was, the entire world seemed to have it out for Jian, and she had a little sister to take care of above everything else. She wouldn't be ashamed of selling herself as a sellsword as a result. She was strong - stronger than most. At least, she liked to think so. She made sure that every clan knew so whenever one of them hired her for some such thing or another. Less to create chaos for all of them out of sheer spite and more to just support herself and her sister. And it got eyes off their village.

When that Regina Overlander person had overtaken all the clans to put them under a single banner of the Iron Dominion, Jian couldn't have cared less. If anything, she'd gotten a derisive chuckle out of it, knowing it must have hurt the clans' pride at least somewhat, being subordinate under her. And when she'd been offered to job to offer the Iron Dominion's assistance in the invasion of Northamer, she hadn't put too much thought into it. The money was good. Money her sister needed.

She was quickly realizing she never should have taken this job.

Jian genuinely didn't know what to think. At first she'd been confused as to why all these clansmen had been running past her towards the empty throne room she'd been guarding the outside of. Standing inside it and looking around, though, now she was just flummoxed. Bats from the Yagyu Can and lynxes from the Raiju Clan all huddling around, looking frightened and out of their minds and mumbling fearfully among themselves. All because of some "monster" they kept blabbering about. Some man-eating demon that was tearing through the entire complex.

She knew who they were talking of. That one that had been in the holding cells - she'd heard the name "Sorun" tossed around and assumed it'd been his name, the one with the ruined hand chained in that cell. The one who definitely looked like an Overlander, but nobody could seem to get a clear answer of what he truly was.

And now... now he had every single clan member in this place cowering and hiding in this throne room. She'd never seen a more pathetic sight - half of them had even dropped their weapons while fleeing to this place. At any other time Jian would have taken a personal note of gratification at seeing them all in such a state, but at this point in time, with this context, knowing she was in the same boat as them... she couldn't help but feel disconcerted.

And then there was an odd sight of the two chameleons over in the corner of the room. As far as Jian had been aware the Iron Queen hadn't even brought anyone from that clan over to this continent, though she might have been incorrect in that statement. It's not like anyone told her these things. She'd been relegated to guard duty before all this.

"I didn't realize anyone from the Shinobi Clan were here with all the others," Jian mumbled out to the pair of them after wandering over, glancing at them out of the corner of her eyes.

The pair of chameleons shared a glance with one another before looking at Jian. "You're the mercenary hired to help bolster the Iron Queen's forces?" the teal-colored chameleon asked, before making a derisive scoff. "The son of the Bride of Constant Vigil has been going around Yurashia petitioning the clans to abandon the Iron Queen."

Jian made a slow, uninterested blink. "On the grounds of...?"

"None of the clan heads are particularly fond of the idea of being under the yolk of the Iron Queen. And besides that, the blue one is with him. You know the one," said the other chameleon, a yellow one. "Him and an official of the Republic in Northamer being invaded, that princess. They're pledging to defeat the Iron Queen should the clansmen with her lay down their-"

"None of this is relevant to the current situation. I don't care ," Jian interrupted, a harsh scoff leaving her. Of all the thing on her mind, clan politics certainly were not among them. "Why are you here specifically?"

"... Part of the request laid out by the son of the Bride of Constant Vigil was for members of the Shinobi Clan to come liberate a friend of his being held here - one by the name of Sorun. From what little I know he's supposed to be coming here to aid in what was supposed to be an escape," the teal chameleon said. And then he breathed out, looking ahead. "That was before we discovered Sorun was a blood-drunk monster killing and eating his way through everything that breaths. He was smiling through it."

Jian found herself quirking an eye ridge. "He even attempted to kill his would-be liberators?" she asked, sounding a bit skeptical.

The yellow chameleon shook his head. "He didn't seem to particularly care who we were. And we couldn't get a word in edgewise regardless; one of ours... panicked. Or perhaps he was so disgusted with what he saw he decided to just ignore orders. Whatever the case..." He huffed out a loud sigh, voice going quieter. Subdued, as if the wind had been taken out of him. "Whatever the case behind his reasoning, he stabbed that monster through the throat and it did absolutely nothing to stop him. That monster slaughtered him and our fellow clan brothers. The two of us only survived by remaining hidden and running away."

"Not that it will do us much good," the teal one added. "He was standing in the only pathway out from this place. Still is - it's why everyone hiding here seem so on edge." He glanced out to the rest of the room, at all the lynxes and bats shuffling around nervously. Some sitting on the ground with hopeless, vacant looks in their eyes. A couple were even sobbing or rocking back and forth in place, clutching their weapons. Only a few seemed concerned with guarding the one doorway in here, as if no one else even saw the point.

Truly had Jian never seen a more pathetic display. Which was mainly what had her so nervous. There had to be more than enough valid reasons for so many people to be acting this way and it all bode ill for her.

"He's coming here?" Jian asked, looking out towards the doorway.

"There's nothing else in this direction," the yellow one responded, voice sounding resigned. "Perhaps he's coming here hoping to slay the Iron Queen, not knowing she's currently overseeing the invasion in New Mobotropolis. Or maybe the monster just wants to kill us all. Both, perhaps. What does it matter when we're all dead."

Jian's eyes widened the smallest fraction. They really had all given up. Completely consigned themselves to their fate, practically waiting to die. It made her wonder just what everyone here had seen to have them in this state.

"Tch. Speak for yourselves," she ended up saying, shaking her head as she turned fully towards the doors. If everyone here wanted to cower and die that was their business, but she didn't have that luxury. Not with a little sister depending on her. "I'm leaving this place. My contract can be voided for all I care. No money is worth this."

"..." The teal chameleon's eyes flicked towards her. "There is but one pathway out from here and that monster stands in the direct path," he said. "And to face that thing is certain death from all I've seen. There's no way out."

"But you're certainly welcome to go try," the yellow added. "For whatever good it'll do you, mercenary."

She ignored the words for the most part from the chameleons. The dismissive scoffs made by others she passed, the sympathetic or vapid looks cast her way from the others had passed. She never received respect to begin with given her position and profession, but somehow this felt even worse than the usual snide looks or passing insults. It felt like they already writ her off as a dead woman walking. Like everyone here was already dead and she was just walking ahead to the front of the line.

Her right hand reached up to pull the straight sword from her back, hearing her leather glove tighten as she gripped it. She wouldn't die. Couldn't die.

Nobody protested when she opened the throne room doors and walked through. Jian doubted anyone even cared, though they did close the doors behind her uncomfortably quick. She rolled her eyes; it didn't matter too much since she'd never be returning to that place. She'd just breathed out heavily, turning forwards to the wide, darkened metal corridor in front of her.

And then the body came flying in, some lynx who hadn't made it to the throne room fast enough. Gored and mutilated beyond recognition. It'd slammed into the wall behind Jian, splattering apart to pieces from the impact before collapsing down to the floor. She'd heard the gore splatter from behind her, felt a few drops land on her fur which made it stand up on end.

More deep breaths. In and out, doing her best to focus herself and remain calm as she heard the slow footsteps approaching. She'd live. She'd live and make it back home.

Jian saw the eyes before anything else. Green-glowing, reptilian eyes in the dark, trails of green light following after them. And then she'd heard the chewing noises. Clear to see what it was when the monster - Sorun - stepped close enough that the dim overhead lights illuminated him clearly. He was drenched in so much blood all of his clothes were practically dyed red. Large sword bouncing lazily on his shoulder as his other hand held... a severed hand. One he was taking bites out of with his head tilted back, eyes looking down his nose and at Jian.

He looked wrong . All the blood, that strange hand of his. The eyes, the half-white hair, that look in his eyes that didn't even seem to acknowledge all this horror and carnage he'd been wreaking. He only looked like he was curious, as if Jian was an interesting sight to see. And it was here Jian was finally beginning to understand why it was everyone had wrote Sorun off as a monster.

He was a monster. Through and through.

And he was in her way.

There weren't exactly any signs in this damn place that pointed out where everything was, much to Sorun's consternation. But he'd been running around all over looking for the throne room, and of course the correct way to go had been literally the last single pathway to go down. Never failed. Helped that everyone who hadn't stuck around to fight him fled to this spot, so all he'd had to do was follow the panicked yells and shouts.

The doors leading to the throne room weren't even that overly impressive. The same goddamn set of metal, pneumatic doors that were around everywhere else here, but Sorun would acknowledge the facility used to be Eggman's old digs, and that man's taste in decor seemed to oscillate between overly ostentatious to coldly pragmatic depending on his mood.

Still. If nothing else, he found the damn room. Idly munching on a hand to keep the power coursing in him topped off as he approached. To say he was shocked to actually see someone there would be an understatement; eventually it got to a point everyone just started running. And she wasn't a lynx or bat, either. Not even those chameleons he'd seen. Badger Mobian, maybe? The black and white fur pattern said enough.

He vaguely recalled someone of that description. Maybe when he was back in that cell - Sorun wasn't too sure. Those times were foggy for the most part.

The badger looked confident, though, that was the thing. Or at least motivated. There was a sort of grim determination set in those blue eyes staring Sorun down, a straight sword gripped firmly in her hands and held right in front of her. Not shaking, form and breathing steady. He hadn't seen that yet.

And that smell ... Sorun had to pause as he looked at her, nose deeply inhaling as he breathed in the air. She absolutely reeked of Chaos energy. Every other Mobian here he'd cut through he could detect hints of, but her, that sour, energetic smell was so prominent it was impossible to miss.

"Oh, you look like you got some chops on you." Sorun tossed the severed lynx hand he'd been munching on over his shoulder. Fur made the texture taste awful, anyway. "You the final bastion or whatever?"

The badger made a loud scoff. "Hardly," she said. "I couldn't care less about what happens to those behind me. I simply want out. You're in my way."

"That I am." Sorun looked over his shoulder at the empty corridor behind him. He looked back ahead at the badger. "It matter in any way?"

Her eyes narrowed a bit at Sorun. "All of this? Everything the Iron Dominion and the subservient clans have done in the name of the Iron Queen? It absolutely has nothing to do with me," she told Sorun. "I'm a simple sword arm for hire, that's all. I don't seek quarrel with you, so just let me pass and return home."

"Unfortunate. I don't care," Sorun instantly responded. He rose the Rebellion off his shoulder, slowly bringing it down to point its edge at Jian. "All this useless shit I've been cutting through was fun for a time, but now everything's too slow, too boring. You , though... you feel different." He made a small grin, cocking his head to the side as the claymore dissolved in a cloud of blue particles, only for those particles to instantly gather around and reform into a katana. "More than that I'm trying to maximize my chances of eviscerating every single person who woke up and decided this was the week to piss me off so severely, and I really want a taste of you."

There was a moment where Jian paused, an expression that was a mix of frustration and resignation on her face. She'd squared her hips, feet more securely planted to the ground as she tightened her grip on her sword. Expression morphing into one of grim determination as she stared right at Sorun. The only sound she offered by way of response was a slow, steady breath as she stared him down.

Sorun's grin widened. That's what he wanted to see so bad. No backing down, no running away like everyone else eventually did. "If you wanna pass, beat me. Not that hard, right?" Sorun asked, grabbing onto Yamato's handle with both hands as he brought the sword down to his side.

Not another word was said between the two of them. Just constant staring, Jian giving him that hardened glare while Sorun just looked on in amused anticipation. No sounds except for quiet breathing - not even a single creak of bone as they both faced each other motionlessly.

And then they'd moved . As if an invisible, soundless bell only they could hear had gone off. Their bodies blurred, crossing the length of the room in a blink and ending with them standing on complete opposite sides. Backs turned to each other with their swords held upwards.

Even as Sorun felt a giant gash be carved directly in the center of his face, he only grinned out more. Nearly as fast and strong as him. Absolutely nothing like everyone else here. Where the hell had she been this entire time? They were absolutely wasting her talents sticking her here.

"Ah, you do have a li'l somethin'-somethin' after all," Sorun said, sword dropping back to his side as he looked at Jian over his shoulder. Facial wound completely healed, only a bloody line left in place. "Ain't enough, though," he added, pointing over his shoulder and at her. "See?"

Jian had maintained that same pose after they'd moved and struck at each other in the blink of an eye. And then a thin, red line appeared where her arm met her shoulder. A sound that nearly sounded like a wet cracking noise was heard as the freshly-severed arm fell off from Jian's shoulder and collapsed onto the ground, blood spurting out from the shoulder wound.

To the badger's credit, she hadn't even cried out in pain, didn't even drop her sword to clutch at the wound. The most she offered was a single grunt of pain through clenched teeth as she whirled right back around to Sorun. Feet tapping against the floor as she ran right back towards him, readying her sword for another strike.

"Oh, right back into it!?" Sorun excitedly thought. Girl either had a high pain tolerance or really wanted to get out of here. A thought that kept lingering in the back of Sorun's mind as he swung Yamato, the two blades clashing off each other and causing sparks to fly between them. More strikes, over and over. Swing after swing, sometimes connecting, sometimes one or the other dodging. Pulling their body to the side to narrow avoid a swing only to retaliate with a hit of their own. Neither never really landing another blow.

And Sorun was thrilled by it all. The badger Mobian wasn't; she was looking more and more exhausted and fearful by the second, noticeably slowing down from the blood loss of a lost arm. It made Sorun deeply regret cutting her arm off with that first swing, because she was growing worn to the point that he didn't see this fight going further than a minute or two. Oh, but how good she was at this. For all her waning strength and how Sorun's physical prowess was steadily beginning to completely outclass her, she was keeping up. Blocking and deflecting all of Sorun's swings, deftly twirling around his stabs. He didn't dare use any of the Yamato's abilities for fear of making it too easy.

Not that she was making any headway against Sorun, either, who either sidestepped her swings or just completely batted her strikes away with his own sword. It was a fun back and forth, though, because he actually was trying to slash and stab at her throughout this whole exchange. Was putting in legitimate effort. But nothing landed, nothing connected, no matter how hard he tried. He liked it.

Even when it'd gotten to the point where Jian was forced down to a kneeling position, she didn't give up. Down and down again Sorun brought the katana blade down at different angles, and even with a dead-tired face that was heavily panting out Jian deflected it all with mad swings of her arm, all the way up until the blade on her sword broke . It'd cracked down half the length of the blade with one last block, the force behind it caused the severed end of the sword to be tossed up into the air behind her, spinning down and down until it'd impaled the metal floor behind her.

There was a small clatter heard as Jian, utterly exhausted, dropped her broken sword, last arm flopping down to her side. Even breathing out so heavily and defeated, she gave Sorun nothing but a defiant glare as he held Yamato up, pressing the tip of it right against her throat.

He pushed down, intent on piercing her throat entirely. To Sorun's surprise he'd missed - ended up just stabbing through the floor when she lurched her body away to the side right as he'd begun to make the movement to stab down. Her remaining arm scooping the broken blade up off the floor and holding it in a backwards grip as if the jagged thing were a knife.

"Still more!?" The corners of Sorun's mouth twitched upwards into a more delighted expression. She really was different from every other person in this place. Not just from looking different or wearing simple clothing when everyone else had armor or some sort of ridiculous-looking ninja getup. Oh, no, she was a special one. Just kept going and going.

Pulling the sword out from the ground, Sorun swung again. Jian had misjudged something - perhaps hadn't been able to adapt to the new length of her weapon fast enough due to her exhausted sake. Whatever the case she'd tried to block the swing, but ultimately failed, Yamato's blade cleaving right through her forearm, cutting through to the bone and making it so only a few strings of tendon and some skin connected her arm to the rest of her body.

And yet, despite all these grievous injuries, she'd growled out at Sorun. Using the last of the feeling she had in her hand to flick the half-sword up in the air, catching it in her teeth. Eyes wide and near-frantic, doing everything she could to power through all that pain and blood loss as she sprinted right at Sorun. Swinging her head around wildly in an vain, desperate attempt to just catch him even once with the blade being held in her mouth.

Schwing!

Sorun was having none of it. He'd sidestepped her entirely and swung out with Yamato, ending with his arm being fully extended to his side with the sword tightly gripped in his hand. Jian had stagged a bit before coming to a full stop. The half-sword slowly slipping from her mouth before clattering to the floor at her feet. A strangled, gasping sort of noise left her as her feet stumbled, slowly turning towards Sorun.

"Y-you..." She tried to say, voice coming out as labored with a slight gurgle to it. The black and white fur on her neck began to become stained in red from the blood flowing from the red line slowly becoming more and more prominent on her throat. "You... monster..."

She fell down to her knees, body growing still. Her head dropped down seconds later, bouncing off the ground a few times before rolling away, gouts of blood spurting up from the open neck sitting before Sorun.

"You were a real one. Right up to the end." The breathing coming out of Sorun was slightly heightened. Not from exhaustion; he barely felt the smallest-bit winded, at least so far with all this energy coursing through him. No, this had been brought on from excitement. Thrill. She'd been fun, more so than anyone else in this place. That feeling of blood rushing and his head being completely focused in on that fight had felt near-euphoric to him. "I regret never asking your name. I'll remember you for a long time yet."

Sighing out, he lowered his arm back to the side, expression dimming somewhat as he stared at the kneeling, headless, and armless corpse. He was almost sad to see her gone, if only because it meant he'd never fight her again. But he pushed those feelings away, wanting to focus on the task at hand. That throne room was still back there. He still had to check if Snively and Regina were in there and murder everything in there that was breathing.

"..." Sorun hummed out, tilting his head a bit downwards when he saw Jian's severed arm lying on the ground. He walked towards it, bending down to pick it up. Without hesitation he held it above his head, letting the blood inside drip into his open mouth. He nearly shuddered from the sharp jolt he felt go through his whole body - felt so much energy seeping into him that he felt more awake now than he ever had in his life. Feeling the dark hide and scales on his arm spread up, past his elbow and shoulder and halfway across his right pectoral.

Yeah. This was enough. He could win handedly with this, easy.

"That's it..." He tossed the arm over his shoulder, completely discarding it. Turning towards the doors leading to the throne room, expression falling flat. Still all this to go through, and he doubted any of the ones going forward would be like the one back there. Never seemed to end , any of this...

Zero time was wasted as Sorun swung the sword out in front of him. Dozens of slashes appearing on the doorway, cutting right through to the other side. Without further delay he walked up to it, kicking his foot out to break down that ruined doorway. Skulking into the throne room beyond, sword scraping along the ground behind him.

There were dozens of voices screaming and crying out seconds later. Followed by the sound of wet cutting noises and splashes of blood flying out from the entranceway Sorun had cut open.

A/N- So yeah, there's a lot of terms and concepts relating to things in Yurashia that'll probably be lost on people who never read the comics. To that I say that Sorun's in the exact same boat as you are and at this point he's never going to go out of his way to learn what any of this even means since he's beyond caring at this point, so I try to justify it saying it's just framing the story primarily through Sorun's point of view.

More than that all the Yurashia stuff is such an infinitesimally small part of this story that I don't really feely like going out of my way to spend a lot of time extrapolating those particular details. We'll get broad strokes and not much else because it just really doesn't matter all that much.

Chapter 108

A/N- Me reading the reviews for the last chapter and seeing someone mention Jian was a comic character.

"She was?" Pause. "OH SHE WAS."

Alright so listen, for those not in the know Jian was a post-Genesis Wave character (and if you have no clue what that means don't- don't worry about it) in the comics who was a white tiger. I completely forgot about her existence because as far as I recall she never really did anything memorable. But I guess somewhere in my subconscious I remembered her 'cause when I needed a throwaway OC I pretty much used her by accident. And made her a badger. Big whoops on my part.

I mean, it's whatever, she's dead anyways and never coming back. If you want just pretend she was a pre-Genesis Wave version. Go even further and think that she actually was a tiger and Sorun just mistook her as a badger since he has a history of not correctly identifying Mobian species.

Recursion Error

Episode 108- One's right of way

It was not supposed to be like this.

Nothing was supposed to be like this.

People weren't supposed to be dead .

It was thoughts like these that were rushing through Espio's head as he dashed through the metal halls of the occupied Egg Dome. Or maybe it was now known as the formerly-known Egg Dome. The correct wording over the subject truly was the last thing on his mind, however, as he was more focused on the fact it was full of bodies . Bodies he recognized as belonging to those of Yagyu and Raiju clans. Torn apart, cut apart, rent asunder, bludgeoned, stabbed, crushed, dismembered. Killed in seemingly every gruesome fashion imaginable.

It was a carnival of carnage and bloodshed the likes of which Espio had never bore witness to, nor could have ever conceivably even imagine. Nothing could have possible even prepared him. Not the years of training in his youth, nor the years spent building up his mental focus and faculties, nor the standard horrors he'd encountered fighting Dr. Eggman with the others. None of this came remotely close to preparing him for any of this, and though he'd never openly admit it to any of the others, he'd voided his stomach contents near the beginning of seeing all this.

What could have even happened? What caused all this? A question that kept plaguing his mind as he continued sprinting through these halls. He knew absolutely nothing that was capable of wreaking such carnage. Not in such a bloody fashion. Not even Eggman's machines had-

"O-oh..."

The new set of bodies he came across when rounding a hall's corner were infinitely more familiar to Espio. Chameleon corpses, in much the same state as all the others. Those of the Shinobi Clan. And some, he... had known by name. Some he'd trained with in their youth. Now they were nothing but dead pieces of vicsera staining the metal floor, the walls, even the ceiling . As if some rabid monster had its way with them all.

It took everything he had to keep going. Every ounce of discipline, every drop of focus he could summon, every iota of willpower. They were gone; he couldn't help them. He could still help the living. Sorun. He was considering it a small miracle he didn't find his corpse among all the carrion, but at the same time Espio was growing increasingly concerned because he hadn't found him in the detection center. He did , however, find the severed arm. The pools of white blood, that... metal skeleton lying there on the floor.

He was fearing the worst, and quite frankly, he didn't have much hope for the best. But he'd promised Sonic and Sally and all the others that he'd come here and rescue Sorun while they all dealt with the Iron Queen. Even if it meant finding his friend's corpse, rent and rived, rendered completely unrecognizable from whatever had done all this. He owed him that much. He... owed everyone the effort spent on accomplishing at least this much.

So he pushed down the fear he felt for his own life, fear that whatever it was that did this was around, and pressed onwards. Towards the throne room - the last possible place to look. Passing the white and black furred, mutilated and decapitated corpse kneeling on the floor as he entered. And then he abruptly paused in horror when he saw it all.

The survivors of this massacre must have all taken refuge in the throne room for a lack of anywhere better to go. Not that it served them; it was much the same sight in here as it was outside, but on a much wider scale. Dozens of cut apart bodies littering the floor, with so much blood pooling around half the metal flooring wasn't even visible beneath it. A picture that truly, honestly made Espio sick to his stomach and dizzy at the sight.

That's not what gave him pause, though. What gave him pause was the person standing in the center of all that mayhem. Wearing clothes completely dyed red with blood, holding a familiar, bloodied katana. Hair a mix of black and white, with red staining large portions of it even further. A right hand that looked unnatural, but quite honestly it was the last thing Espio was focusing on compared to everything else.

Because that was Sorun. Standing there. Looking almost... calm . And when he'd heard Espio make a sharp gasp, he'd turned his head towards him. Green-glowing, reptilian eyes staring right at Epsio. An unreadable expression on his face.

"Oh, look. It's you."

So Regina and Snively weren't here.

It figured. This world wasn't too keen on giving Sorun freebies, he'd long since learned that. Maybe it was like that for everyone, or maybe it just had it out for Sorun since he wasn't local. He was far beyond caring at this point, hence why he was no longer playing by its rules. Hence the bodies. And his mounting frustration at the fact there weren't two very specific bodies joining all the piles he was making.

Fine, then. Back to New Mobotropolis it was. Everyone was dead here anyways, so no point in screwing around here any longer-

His head perked up when he'd heard footsteps in the blood. A sharp gasp, the faint scent of blood containing a strong link to the Chaos Force. Just like badger lady back there. Another special one.

Sorun's head snapped towards the source, but then paused. Another chameleon. A... purple chameleon. Yellow eyes, yellow horns. Familiar getup. Espio.

For the first time since leaving that prison area, Sorun was finding himself pausing. So many thought and mixed feelings were swirling through him now... what else was he to do but talk as he sorted through it all.

"Oh, look. It's you." Sorun turned his body fully towards Espio, keeping his expression even as he regarded him. "Hey, Espio. I escaped prison. Ain't that wacky?" he asked, releasing a deep breath as he spoke. "Hey. Espio. I got my old skeleton back. Ain't that just thriller ?"

He noticed Espio's body tense. For a moment horror had flickered across the chameleon's face, though he'd steeled his expression rather quickly. Body tense as he stood across the room from Sorun.

"You know, I remember something," Sorun continued. "I remember a conversation we had about katanas. I'd asked how you even knew of them, since you claimed to grow up on Angel Island. You... gave me some half-excuse about it just being part of your culture up there, and at the time I did think it a bit odd. 'Cause geologically that just... didn't add up; that kind of culture never existed where Angel Island originated from. But you were a friend, and I trusted you. So I put it out of my mind."

And then Sorun flicked Yamato upwards. Catching another katana, a normal one wielded by one of the ones here, that was lying on the ground and sending it spinning through the air until it fell down and impaled its blade in the floor next to Espio, causing him to flinch.

"But now I'm starting to get the impression that was just a lie. I don't like being lied to. So would you like to try again?" Sorun asked. "Would you like to tell me how you know what a katana is?"

Espio didn't respond at first. He looked around at all the bodies and blood surrounding them, a shuddering breath leaving him before he focused back on Sorun. "Sorun, what did you do ?" he asked. Voice tinged in a myriad of emotions. Shock, surprise, sadness and anger and revulsion. A blend of emotions that truly made it impossible for Sorun to try and read what was going on through Espio's head.

Not that he cared to. If anything, he was just irritated at the stalling. "What do you mean? I killed everyone. It's not some grand mystery to be solved, Espio," Sorun snapped in an impatient manner. "And anyways, we're not talking about me. We're talking about you ."

"Don't try to play this off!" Epsio yelled out, going as far as to throw a hand to the side. "Look at this! Look at all this! All these bodies, all this death, you... you...!"

He didn't even seem to have the words . So disgusted, so distraught with all the death surrounding them was he that he was utterly failing to articulate his thoughts into words. It honestly looked like talking about himself was among the last thing Espio wanted to talk about. Which Sorun found irritating. He couldn't care less about the corpses surrounding them.

"Espio. You should really be less concerned about the departed you can't do a thing for, and more about yourself. Who is currently dressed the exact same way as a couple of the corpses," Sorun pointed out, pointing his sword at a pair of chameleon corpses lying dead nearby. "And move the same as them. Use the same weapons as them. It's not a good look..."

Espio stiffened at the sight of the chameleon bodies. He made a choked sound before biting his own tongue, turning his head to the side as he made a bitter sort of remorseful sound. "How could you...?" he asked, tone low before he head snapped back to Sorun. "They came here to help you, you fool! We came here to free you of this place!"

"Move faster next time, then." Sorun's eyes flicked down to the bodies. "And as it stands, they didn't seem too interested in rescuing. One stabbed me, you know."

"You have to wonder why!? I don't want to know what they saw you doing. What you..." Espio stumbled back a step. Eyes rapidly flicking around at the bodies, breathing quickening the smallest amount as he took in all the carnage, the dead meat surrounding them. He'd nearly retched again from the scent of it all alone, though he managed to keep himself composed as he looked back towards Sorun.

"You had absolutely no right to-!"

Sorun's left arm flung out, light glinting off Yamato's blade. A small slash was carved into the metal wall behind Espio and near his head, making the purple chameleon flinch a bit and causing him to fall silent.

"Espio. I won't ask again," Sorun intoned, shooting him an impatient look. He was getting tired of Espio and his complaints about the bodies, Sorun just didn't care . He cared about his answers and wanted to get back to New Mobotropolis already to end this. But this , Espio right here, right now. He needed answers from him. Felt a sudden and burning need to have all these questions swirling in his head answered. "Why are you like them? Why'd I see you go off with one of the ninja lynxes, on the day of the concert? It's not coincidence; can't be. It's all just too much. Especially ... when Sonic and that monkey guy said he saw you here. On their side."

"..." Espio's eyes widened at Sorun. Mostly in outrage, in utter disbelief. At seeing how serious he was, though, he took a deep breath to steady himself before responding. "... It's true that my origins were a fabrication. On that front, your suspicions were correct. I was born within the Shinobi Clan within Yurashia. Tasked with overseeing the Master Emerald set inside of Angel Island and the echidna Guardian who watches over it-"

"I didn't ask for your life story. I genuinely don't care. I care even less knowing it involved echidna," Sorun interrupted in a blunt tone, shaking his head at Espio. "Fine, whatever, you were born in a ninja clan and got close to Knuckles for shady reasons. Whatever . I don't need details beyond that. And I really can't be bothered to learn all the details about your little Yurashia clans that can't seem to decide whether they're apeing Chinese or Japanese culture, not that you'd even know what I'm talking about ."

He began to pace back and forth. He said that, at least. And it should have been true - he shouldn't care. He didn't live up on that island with all the rest of them. And yet... yet he did. There were still those moments, back when he and the rest of the Chaotix lived with the rest of the Freedom Fighters. And Sorun had fought alongside them, alongside Espio . The moments of camaraderie, friendship, even. He made Sorun care.

And the fact Sorun had been deceived, the others deceived... it just wasn't sitting right with him. Regardless of the reasons.

And what Sonic said, what Sonic said . Espio went here during the concert. Here . Used some means to travel halfway across the continent to join everyone here. Before Snively and Regina showed up in New Mobtropolis.

Before... before...

"Alright... liar." Sorun stopped pacing to affix Espio with a cold look. "You did all that. Why? Why did you leave and come here?"

"Because the Shinobi Clan falls under the umbrella of all the clans who were taken in under the Iron Queen's banner," Espio answered, looking down as he said the words through clenched teeth. "I was called upon - it was my duty as a shinobi to go, Sorun."

"I want you to try that again." Sorun's grip on Yamato tightened when he heard that. Oh , he didn't like that. He didn't like hearing that collection of little words coming out of Espio's mouth. "I want you to rephrase that in a way that implies you could have just ignored it if you wanted to."

Espio looked back up at Sorun with an angered look. "You wouldn't understand, Sorun. Just as I would never try and understand your life. What drove you to... this ." He gestured his arm out to the corpses surrounding them. "I don't want to understand a thing like that."

He took a deep breath. "The leader of each clan is an individual labeled as a Bride, and in my case I'm sworn to follow the directives given to me by my clan's Bride. And I had trust that she, Bride of Constant Vigil, knew what she was doing. That she wouldn't simply kowtow to the Iron Queen and working of... of finding some way. To indirectly help the others while being underneath the Iron Queen. It's the shinobi way, to act indirectly. And if not then maybe at the very least I could help in the position I found myself in." His yellow eyes slowly drifted away from Sorun's glowing green eyes. "And it took my explaining all my reasoning to the others for me to see the right of way, and even now I don't know if I'll ever be able to mend the trust destroyed."

Espio's eyes snapped back up to Sorun's. "But the Shinobi Clan is working against the Iron Queen, Sorun!" he continued. "Soon they all will be thanks to the efforts of Sonic and the others! And once her power base has fallen beneath her we can-!"

"Did you know?"

Sorun interrupted Epsio with such a straightforward question, asking in a calm and even tone. Three little words that held so much weight to them as Espio blinked once in confusion, finding it suddenly very hard to meet Sorun's eyes. Sorun, who currently looked like he was attempting to burn a hole through Espio's face.

"Snively and Regina going to New Mobotropolis. Did you know ahead of time that was gonna happen?" Sorun clarified. "Did you know they were gonna do that? 'Cause you were here at the time. So did. You. Know?"

Espio breathed out as he heard the question. "Sonic and Sally. They... told me. What became of your pet," Espio acknowledged. And Sorun visibly bristled at that tinge of regret to his tone, and at labeling Virgil as a simple pet of all things. "You have to understand, I couldn't just go out of my way to give forewarning-"

"You did know."

It was said with such a simple tone, mainly due to the fact Sorun felt shocked as he said it. As the information soaked into his brain once Espio said all that, and the realization set in. He'd known. He'd known Regina and Snively would go there, and Espio... did nothing. Not a single thing to warn anyone of anything. Hadn't made it so some defense could have been prepared beforehand. That maybe they could have been captured while visiting. A message through a computer network, a messenger, transmission. Something .

But no. Nothing. He'd chosen to be completely silent. And because of that things played out the way they had. And if he hadn't, if Espio had just done something , maybe things would be different. Maybe he wouldn't have...

Sorun laughed at the realization hit him. A small, quiet laugh that was more a breathy chuckle. He palmed his face, running his fingers through his hair as it bloomed into full-on laughter, and then soon turned into giggling shrieks as his body tilted back and shuddered on the spot. Espio . Of all people, it was Espio that had done something like this. Sorun would have never guessed, never suspected, because he trusted him. And now Virgil was dead. Sorun had been captured and taken here, and at this moment his body was being ravaged by the Chaos energy empowering him. And there he was, that traitor. Standing there all... alive and such.

"Hah..." The amusement rapidly faded from Sorun as he straightened himself as mind-number anger and grief coursed through him. Hand still on his face as he felt his blood surge, his green eyes briefly flaring out and shining with power as he stared right at the purple chameleon. "Espio... I'll ki ll you."

There was a moment that, as Sorun's emotions ran high, blue sparks of power briefly flickered over his form. His voice, just for a moment, taking on a dual-toned, metallic flange behind his words, his breath coming out as an inhuman rattle. And then he gripped his katana in both hands, crossing the distance of a few meters in just a few short strides before swiping upwards, his strike pulling the blood pooled to the ground with the blade in a rising arc.

He dared to dodge , the quick bastard. Juking to the side, a surprised and panicked look on his face. And to Sorun's consternation he could smell it - smell all that power running through Espio. He reeked even more of Chaos energy than the lady he'd decapitated back there.

"Sorun!" Espio shouted, backpedaling a few steps while holding a kunai up in a reversed grip. "Wait, just wait for a minute-!"

"Virgil's dead 'cause of you, you turncoat fuck!" He slashed out with his sword, feeling Espio catch the blade against the kunai and actually hold his own against Sorun's strength. Though there was definitely surprise in Espio's face, his knees nearly struggled from the sheer weight brought down on him, enough so that his kunai cracked. "You did dick to help and he's gone!"

"That's not what happened!" Espio argued. He leapt back a good few meters, throwing his kunai. Sorun saw it coming, growling out and grabbing it out of midair before throwing it hard enough against the bloodied floor to shatter it. "I risked compromising myself committing an action such as that! And a direct betrayal against the Iron Queen would have been a direct betrayal of my clan, besides! I couldn't-!"

"Fuck your code, fuck your honor, people are dead!" As Sorun sprinted towards Espio once more, slashing out madly with his katana, Espio pulled another kunai, just barely managing to deflect each and every strike. "Do you know know what they're planning to do to people in New Mobotropolis!? That lobotomy shit!? You thought your place in some clan was more important than all that!?"

"Of course I don't! Stop it!" He'd leapt back, throwing the kunai. Sorun had growled out as he caught it from the air, so angered was he that he'd crushed the metal tool in his grip. He released it, the once-kunai now a twisted hunk of metal that rattled against the floor. "You're missing vital context for all of this!"

"I don't want your context! I don't need context past he's dead!"

None of it mattered . Sorun couldn't care beyond the fact everything was being ruined. Again. Over and over again his life kept being ruined, Virgil was dead and Espio just... just sat there, and did nothing when he could have done something , anything, and it might have helped. And he didn't! For what!?

It infuriated Sorun, enraged him so much so that he felt his thoughts swimming. Even just seeing Espio standing there was sending him in a rage, making him swing over and over, but of course the nimble bastard just kept hopping around. Ducking left, right, dodging under his sword strike, hopping over Sorun's shoulder. He hissed out once more, whirling himself around and flashing Yamato outward.

"Forget the thrill of the fight, not against this bastard! I just want him dead! Die! I'm using everything!"

At first it'd been a small distortion in the air. A small bubble of discolored, warped space, one that Espio had keenly managed to spot with his eyes. It was a familiar sight to him - one that, back when Sorun had fought alongside the Freedom Fighters, he'd seen often. So when he saw that distortion of space his face had screwed in absolute panic , and the chameleon had leapt back once more.

It was just in time, too, before he'd been caught in the maelstrom of slashes that distorted the very light they touched, causing a chromatic aberration of colors to be seen around all those slashes. A deep frown had settled over Sorun's face at seeing Espio dodge the Judgement Cut, making him slowly turn his head over towards the Mobian with absolute contempt in his eyes.

"S-Sorun...!" Espio gasped out. The floor from where that attack had landed was absolutely riddled in cuts and slashes marring the floor, nearly enough so that it was halfway to being a hole. Espio breathed out heavily at the sight, and then looked back to Sorun. "Are you seriously attempting to kill me-!?"

Another swing of Sorun's sword. Another bubble of distorted space, only for Espio to dodge back once more. That panicked look on Espio's face remained, looking more and more fearful by the second as that cool, calm composure he'd always wore on his face began to slip. "Don't you dare- oh, you fucking suck," Sorun muttered out when he saw Espio's form shimmer, and then completely disappear altogether. It made him breath out a heavy huff, and in the next instant Sorun slammed Yamato's blade down on his own palm.

He'd barely even thought about it. It'd been more an reflex, really, an instinctual call Sorun's brain had made the moment he saw Espio turn invisible. He dragged the blade's edge along his palm, not even registering the quickly-fading pain as the bleeding wound sealed shut.

"Quit it with the hide-and-seek, we're not playing that game right now," he called out, throwing his hand out in front of him. The blood was tossed out as a result, with some of it splashing against the floor, while the rest of it seemed to spatter against something unseen. For a brief moment it looked like that blood was just hovering in the air before there was a shimmer, and Espio re-appeared. Raising a hand up to wipe the blood that'd been splashed on his face off.

To his credit he hadn't stopped to stare down at the blood in shock. Good for him that he hadn't, either, because then he would have been skewered when Sorun tried stabbing at him again. But to Sorun's mounting frustration that ninja title he loved to tote around wasn't at all one for show. That slipping composure of his was slowly starting to come back, getting used to the tempo of things. He made a few more long strides backwards, disappearing once more.

Again Sorun tried tossing his own blood in the air. Again he saw it splash against something invisible, hovering in the air, but this time Espio didn't reappear. He saw that blood move away as he rapidly circled around Sorun before it, too, shimmered away.

"Adapted." And annoyed tch sound left Sorun as he slowly turned around, eyes flicking about. Were Sorun in a different frame of mind than the one he was in at the moment he'd have called it impressive; as it stood his desire to jam this katana blade into Espio's face was so deep he couldn't be bothered to be impressed by it.

"..." He breathed out, eyes slowly scanning the blood-soaked throne room, but no Espio in sight. His head perked up when he heard it - a quiet whistling sound from something being thrown towards his leg. He'd growled out, flicking his sword sideways to bat the kunai that'd nearly plunged into his leg away. A few more whistling sounds were heard, and a few more times he batted the weapons away. A few times he'd even slashed towards the source of where the kunai were coming from, but never once did he hit anything.

His frustration grew to the point that the sound of his fingers tightening around the sword's hilt were audible. Fine. If Espio could adapt to things so quickly, then surely he could, too.

Breathing out slowly, Sorun slowly lowered the sword down to his side, grasping it with both hands. He thought back to the last hour, images flashing through his mind. Every single hallway he'd traversed, every single corpse he'd left in his wake, every body, every severed limb and decapitated head. There was a near-inaudible thrum from the sword, a slight blue glow appearing around the blade.

He'd slashed upwards, Yamato's blade arcing through the air. And after doing so they'd appeared: blue tears in space hovering just below the ceiling, dozens and dozens. The rifts expanded into portals hovering far above them. And all throughout the facility those same portals appeared under all the bodies and pools of blood Sorun had left behind. Portals upon portals all throughout the Egg Dome, enough so that even the smallest bits and pieces of gore had fallen through.

All of which resulted in those bodies and all that blood raining down from the portals up near the ceiling. The bodies and parts had hit the floor first, littering the throne room in even more corpses, though with those Sorun didn't pay them any mind. He was more focused on the blood . So, so much blood pouring in streams, covering nearly everything in red. Enough blood that the entire throne room floor was completely covered in red, a small pool forming as the room was completely flooded.

He saw it soon after. A disturbance in the blood - the ripple of a single footstep. "There you are," Sorun hissed out under his breath, slashing in the air above where he'd seen that footstep in the blood.

While he didn't hit anything, what he did see was Espio reappear as he stumbled back, eyes wildly glancing around at all the gore around them. He looked sick from the sight, sick from all the blood staining the bottom of his shoes and some of the falling blood getting on him, sick from the sight of all the corpses and the thick, metallic smell permeating the room now from all the blood.

"Y-you..." Espio stumbled back, the sounds of his footsteps splashing through the blood echoing out as he looked back to Sorun once the last of the blood fell through the portals. He'd look horrified before, but now he looked outraged. He'd seen the bodies before, but now it seemed that seeing them all together like this just made Sorun's actions all the more clear to the chameleon. "All this death, and for what!? For what, Sorun!? What did this accomplish!?"

"A bunch of maniacs invaded from a different continent with the intent of lobotomizing and enslaving the populace of a peaceful town. I killed them. This shouldn't be controversial," Sorun told Espio in a blunt tone.

"They didn't have a choice !" Espio yelled out, throwing one of his hands to the side. "The leader of every clan in Yurashia, the Brides, are subservient to the Iron Queen, whether the Brides like it or not! And any clan member who would go against their word would be excommunicated from the clans at best! Executed at worst!" He slowly lowered his hand to he side, his breathing becoming noticeably heavier as his eyes narrowed at Sorun in anger. "And for most in the clans there is nothing beyond it. No life, no future. Most of them didn't want to come here."

"They didn't seem particularly sympathetic, either." Sorun made a small hum, lifting Yamato up to tap its blunt side against his shoulder. There was an expression of mock-thought on his face, as if he were pretending to parse through Espio's words. "... And you know, Espio, after giving your words a good think I've come to the conclusion that I just can't seem to get past the whole 'lobotomizing my town' part."

"It's not nearly that simple-"

"I'm making it that simple," Sorun interrupted, a scowl on his face. "I'm not debating this. I've made up my mind on what's right and wrong here. If you disagree... then shut up and do something about it. Otherwise do me one last favor and just stand still while I run you through."

It was clear by that point that neither were interested in sharing any more words. Not Sorun, who'd slid Yamato off his shoulders and gripped its handle with both hands, breathing out lowly as he stared towards Espio. And not Espio, who'd opened and closed his mouth a few times before making a resigned sigh, shaking his head as he held up a kunai grasped in his hand. Eyes narrowing at Sorun in focused, determined expression.

As far as Sorun was concerned that was as good a starting bell as any other. He'd made a horizontal slash, though clicked his tongue in annoyance when Espio dropped down to the floor, sliding forwards through the blood as a giant slash appeared in the wall behind him. The blood pooling the floor was kicked up as he slid forwards and shot back up to his feet, stabbing forwards with the kunai-

Slice!

Sorun's own blade met Espio's. They hadn't boucned away, hadn't blocked each other or deflected in any capacity. Yamato's blade simply and effortlessly glided through the kunai with zero effort whatsoever, its power running along the length of the katana. The top half of the kunai that was cut away spun through the air, splashing into the blood surrounding them once it fell.

Ever quick on his feet, Espio jumped back. His eyes widened slightly, but he reflexively dropped the ruined weapon and grabbed at a new kunai from the bracers behind his gloves, quickly shifting back into another readying stance. When Sorun was upon him once more, he didn't try clashing blades a second time. He was dodging, spinning and weaving around all of Sorun's strikes and thrusts, doing his absolute best to not get hit. To Sorun's mounting frustration he'd tried upping the speed of all his slashing, cutting away as fast as his arms would allow, but Espio was just responding in turn, matching his speed in an aggravating show of dexterity.

"Quick one. He just had to smell special like that woman back there," Sorun thought to himself, feeling his anger grow more and more as the two of them kept moving, his ears filled with the sound of his sword whistling through the air and the blood splashing beneath their feet. A sound which, in his emotional state, caused Sorun's eyes to flick down at their feet.

Espio's feet.

He didn't let go of the sword long. For less than tenth of a second - just long enough that Sorun was able to shift his grip on Yamato and hold it in a reverse grip of his changed right arm. "Mobians and their big FUCKIN' FEET!" he snarled out, stabbing downwards with as much force as the arm could muster. It'd moved much faster on its own without the other arm holding it back. Faster than Espio anticipated, at least, leading to the blade plunging right through Espio's foot and into the floor.

There'd been a gasp from Espio. A sharp exhale of breath mixed with a pained grunt, his grip on the kunai wavering, though he'd never dropped it. Before he could do anything, though, Sorun had wrenched the sword upwards, the end of the sword's handle striking Espio right in the chin and snapping his head back. The strike seemed to daze him for just a moment, after which Sorun, still holding the sword in a reversed grip, slashed outwards and at Espio.

The purple chameleon had jumped back as a result of the slash, though too late to avoid being completely unscathed. He'd stumbled a bit at the landing, making a pained sound as he looked down and saw the thin line of red that had been cut across his chest, staining over his scales. He didn't have much time to think of the wound, though, as Sorun was rushing back in, switching the katana to his left hand for a better angle and holding it up with the intent of stabbing it down once more to pin Espio's in place so he'd stop dodging around.

To Sorun's confusion, though... Espio didn't even attempt to move. His eyes narrowed somewhat, but otherwise the ninja held his ground, didn't even try to move when Sorun brough the sword down and pierced through his other foot. And for a moment Sorun was puzzled at to why he didn't dodge, even thought for a moment that maybe Espio was just getting too exhausted to fight effectively.

But then Espio had moved, and Sorun saw why he'd done what he done: Espio may have been pinned, but with Sorun's sword stuck through his foot and into the floor, the sword itself was pinned, too. And Sorun couldn't let go of the sword without it disappearing. Which seemed to be Espio's thoughts exactly, because the moment the sword pierced through Espio stabbed forwards with a kunai and stabbed it right through Sorun's forearm.

An affronted growl left Sorun the moment he saw the tip of the kunai emerge from the other side of his arm and through his coat sleeve, feeling dulled pain lance up through his arm. It hadn't been just a random stab from Espio, but one made with purpose. The stab was position in such a way that the blade was piercing right in the gap between his radius and ulna bone, could even feel its edge scraping against them. And from there Espio had twisted , maneuvering the kunai and leveraging it against Sorun's bones in a way that his wrist and hand were forced to rotate.

Sorun had tried to hold on, truly, but due to a combination of that growing white-hot pain and his decreasing grip from the twisting, Sorun's fingers eventually slipped off from the blade's handle. For just a single moment Sorun had paused, staring in surprise, and then had attempted to reach out with his demonic hand to grab at the sword handle.

Too late. From just his grip being off of Yamato for a second there'd been a flash of light as the sword transmuted back into the Chaos Emerald, hovering in the air briefly before dropping down. And Espio, with his foot now free and un-pinned from a sword, kicked out and sent it flying to the other side of the room.

Hissing out, Sorun tried grabbing at it with his demonic hand, but he wasn't even able to do so much as scratch at the Emerald with his claws before it flew away. And evidently taking his eyes off from Espio for even that one, brief moment had been a mistake, because afterwards Espio moved . Strike upon strike landed on Sorun, on his knees and other such joints, making him feel oddly weightless for a moment as he swayed a bit.

And then Espio had put him in some hold, roughly shoving Sorun down onto his back. In that same motion he'd torn the kunai out from Sorun's arm, only to then stab it down on his hand and through his palm, pinning the hand down to the floor. Making sure his body was positioned to one side of Sorun's body in a way his demonic hand couldn't reach towards him.

"Listen to me!" Espio shouted out, grabbing at Sorun's chin and forcing him to look up at him. "You are blowing so much out of proportion-!"

There was a wet, tearing sound when Sorun yanked his arm forwards. The blade tore its way up his palm, all the way up through the gap between his middle and ring fingers, effectively splitting the hand in two. Espio had been momentarily stunned by the gruesome sight, which had been all the time Sorun had needed to grab at Espio's throat.

If he had it his way Sorun would have squeezed down and snapped Espio's neck right there. In fact he'd tried , but his split hand wasn't functioning properly. The tendons and meat in the palm were slowly reconnecting and healing the hand back together, but the regeneration just wasn't fast enough to instantly mend it and make it work. So he'd growled out, tossing Espio back to the other end of the throne room and causing his body to tumble and splash through all the blood on the floor.

In a show of deft finesse Espio had sprung up from his palms and landed on his wounded feet, wincing the smallest bit. In that same moment Sorun had reached for the kunai that'd been stabbed into his hand, grasping it with the uninjured, demonic hand and tearing it right out from the floor. Without skipping a beat he'd flipped the kunai around, gripping it by the tip of its blade before throwing it right at Espio.

Instantly Sorun regretted it due to the fact that his throw caused the kunai to spin wildly through the air, sailing right by Espio without even coming close to hitting him, and then bounced off the wall behind him before landing on the blood soaked floor. It was enough that Espio had paused, looking down where the kunai fell, blinked a few times, and then looked up at Sorun with an incredulous look, mouth slightly hung open in absolute disbelief.

"..." Not wanting to dignify the attempted throw with even as much as acknowledgement, Sorun looked away from the chameleon. Which was where he'd seen the shining Chaos Emerald laying at the end of the room opposite of where Espio was, his eyes locking right onto it. Instantly he bolted towards it, kicking up large sprays of blood behind him due to the speed at which he moved.

Speed which Espio couldn't hope to match; he'd seen and calculated that in an instant. And even if he could Sorun was just closer to the Emerald and would inevitably reach it first. So when Sorun's clawed, demonic hand reached out towards the Emerald he'd immediately whipped a throwing star towards the hand, intent on disabling it so Sorun couldn't grasp the Emerald.

Tink!

It'd bounced. The moment the throwing star hit the dark scales on Sorun's right hand there'd been a small shower of sparks, with the ninja start harmlessly bouncing off the hand without leaving so much as a scratch. On Sorun's part he hadn't even felt the star impact his hand, making the smallest of smirks tug at his lips as he picked the Emerald up.

"I'm gettin' real sick of your ninja shit, Espio," Sorun said as the Emerald transmuted into the Yamato. He flipped the sword around, holding it in a reverse grip as he turned to Espio. "Take a knee."

He stabbed the sword backwards behind him. Upon doing this, the front half of the blade disappeared, stabbing into a small blue rift in space. And at that same moment Espio had shouted out in pain; a similar tiny portal had appeared behind his leg, with the upper half of the Yamato's blade poking through and piercing right through his shin.

"You're better'n most. Admittedly. I'll give you that much," Sorun said as he pulled the sword back out. Espio had breathed out in pain as a result, kneeling down on a single knee due to the wound. Small, quiet splashes were heard as Sorun slowly approached, casually tapping the katana on his shoulder. "But," he continued, stopping right in front of Espio, "don't matter how much of that ninjutsu nonsense you pull outta your sleeve. Now I need to hear it from your mouth directly. I need to know just what exactly was going through your head when you did nothing- oh come on -!"

Right when Sorun had approached, Espio snapped his wrist forward, another kunai flying into his grasp from the bracer. He'd thrust it forwards, stabbing the blade right into Sorun's knee. Slipping it just underneath the patella bone and severing the ligaments and tendons joining it to the leg muscles.

As a result Sorun was forced to kneel down in much the same way Espio was. Without skipping a beat Espio pulled the kunai out, and then stabbed it into Sorun's left shoulder. His arm dropped uselessly as a result, more muscles severed from the precise strike, and with Sorun being unwilling to let go of the sword with in his right hand he was unable to do anything as Espio used the kunai stabbed into him as a point of leverage to slide right behind him. Immediately Espio's arms had wrapped around Sorun's neck in a chokehold once he was in position.

A choked noise left Sorun from the sensation, along with the fact that he suddenly found that he couldn't breath due to his oxygen flow being cut off. He'd tried to struggle out from Espio's grasp, but that just caused his arms to tighten further around his neck. He'd tried raising his left arm up but it wouldn't respond to him, that kunai still stabbed deep into his shoulder.

"You listen and you listen well ," Espio hissed out into Sorun's ear. "I should have told all the rest of them, Knuckles and the rest of my friends, the truth much sooner than I did, I'll freely admit that. And I will also admit that my indecisiveness on how best to proceed forwards has cost me a substantial amount of trust I've built among those I truly care for. But I did not , nor will I ever , betray my dear friends."

An indignant, choked noise left Sorun as he thrashed a bit more in the chameleon's grip. Even though his vision was slowly darkening from the chokehold every single word Espio said just made that rage churning in Sorun burn all the stronger, as though sheer anger itself was keeping him conscious despite the lack of oxygen. He couldn't even be bothered to care for that burning sensation he felt in his chest, or the lightheadedness, none of that. He wanted Espio to stop talking more than he wanted to breath.

"And I am sorry ," Espio continued, voice tight as he spoke. "I am truly sorry this travesty claimed the life of your pet, but that is not my fault . That lies in the hand of the ones truly responsible for this catastrophe, one I and many others are trying to resolve as quickly as possible! Right now as we speak Sonic, Sally, and Tails are in Yurashia gathering support from the Brides to break away from the Iron Queen, and once her forces abandon her and Snively this can all be over! And that - that , Sorun - would only have been possible through the painstaking efforts I went through to maintain my cover! I could have warned ahead of time that the Iron Queen and Snively were coming to New Mobotropolis, yes, but then what!? What do you think would have happened after-!?"

As Sorun's consciousness began to fade, the sword clutched in his clawed hand shifted, turning back into the blue Chaos Emerald. In that same instant a blue-glowing, spectral winged hand appeared from one of Sorun's shoulders, the hand reaching down and gripping

Espio by the torso. It ripped him away from Sorun, who took a massive deep breath as his vision sharpened and his mind cleared.

And then the Bringer Claw slammed Espio down onto his back, causing all the blood on the floor around him to rise up before briefly splashing back down. He coughed out, groaning out as he tried to move, but then Sorun had grabbed at his curled tail and pulled him closer after the Bringer Claw tore the kunai out from his shoulder, hand moving to grab at Espio's throat after as the Emerald turned back into the katana.

"You... you...!" He wanted to stab down so much. So, so much... but even with that cloud of rage tangling through all of Sorun's thoughts, muddling everything together, Espio's words were ringing in his head. Words that... made sense. Were logical in such an frustrating, sensible way, and he hated it . Hated that he couldn't just outright dismiss Espio's reasoning, hated they were making him have second thoughts.

And there was that look Espio was giving him. There was an almost pleading look in his eyes as he stared up at Sorun, gasping out as he uselessly grabbed at the hand squeezing down on his throat. Those same yellow eyes Sorun had seen on all those missions together, way back when during those times. Those same eyes that had regarded him every time they'd talked, the same eyes during the day at that beach-

There was a screech of metal when Sorun stabbed Yamato's blade down towards Espio. It didn't stab through his head, but it'd come close. Piercing through the metal floor just millimeters from his head. Sorun breathed out heavily as he knelt above Espio, his mind and heart feeling like a confusing whirlwind as he slowly released his throat.

... It was all just such a confusing mess and Sorun wanted it to be over with. He felt tired.

"You're right about one thing. There're people more responsible for this than you," Sorun murmured out, fingers sliding off from the purple Mobian's throat as he slowly stood up, katana loosely held in his grip after pulling it from the floor. "And I don't wanna waste more time on this. Just... just go," he continued, turning around to shuffle away. "Crawl your way out of here and into a hole for all I care. I never wanna see you again."

"And just where are you going...?" Espio asked, coughing out as he sat up. Rubbing a hand at his sore throat as he watched Sorun pause mid-step, shoulders slumping in exhaustion as he turned the sword in his hands around.

"To New Mobotropolis, to eviscerate every single invader from Yurashia who came here," he said in a plain, exhausted tone. Of all things, that hadn't changed in Sorun's mind over what to do. "What else?"

Espio grimaced a bit. He attempted to rise up to his feet, only to end up sitting back down due to his wounds. "Nobody else has to die over this, Sorun," he said in a defeated, pleading tone, still looking towards him. "I already told you Sonic-"

"And how long is that gonna take, huh?" Sorun asked. His voice adopted a clipped tone, some of that earlier exhaustion fading as he regarded his words. "You would have me wait around, twiddling my thumbs and dreaming of a better tomorrow while Sonic once again rides to the rescue and saves the day. By goin' around playing politics in some other continent so, what? The people responsible for all this just pack up and go home?"

Sorun practically ripped the katana down in a straight line, causing a blue rip in space to appear hovering right in front of him. The very idea of doing such a thing sounded appalling to Sorun. Filled him with such an indignant feeling of frustration and anger it nearly sent his vision spinning again after he'd just barely begun to calm down. No . He would not be doing such a thing. Of all the people in the world, Sonic was the last possible person Sorun would ever rely on to save everything.

He refused to be saved by someone who was so wrong and always, always so smug about thinking he was in the right.

"How many people are going to be thrown into those pods to have their brains scrambled while that's going on, Espio?" Sorun asked. He turned his head enough so that his gaze met Espio's gaze, green-glowing eye boring into his yellow ones. "I don't think people deserve to be hurt just so the invaders get to leave unharmed." His eye flicked down to the floor. "... This is faster and easier. I won't let others suffer for their sake. It isn't right."

" Killing isn't right!" Espio practically snarled out. He balled his fist up and slammed it down on the floor, splashing against the layer of blood sitting over the metal surface. "There's a path where everything can be settled peacefully, and you're just... throwing it away! For no reason!"

"I don't want a peaceful solution. I just want them dead. I don't want to think about them anymore."

The words came out in a blunt manner. And for as dispassionate Sorun tried to make it sound, the words leaving his mouth just ended up... tired. It was a strange, strange feeling. That excitement running through his body earlier, all that adrenaline running through his veins like pure lightning when he'd been cutting those Mobians apart, by now it'd ebbed significantly but it was still there . Keeping him wide awake and alert, making him want to move again.

But his mind , after having to fight Espio of all people, and the content of this conversation making it all catch up to Sorun, everything he had done and was about to do was making him feel tired, and for the life of him he didn't know why. It wasn't like there was a weight bearing down on him; of all this death, he genuinely couldn't find it in himself to care about any of the lives he'd taken. Maybe it was that look Espio was casting towards him. The feeling of a former friend who used to look at him so warmly now looking at him in abject disgust. Revulsion. Horror and... disappointment.

Maybe the exhaustion was coming from the fact Sorun was beginning to picture that same expression on everyone else's face, now that he was pausing to stop and think.

"..." He looked down at the demonic right hand grasping the katana. And yet... he didn't feel a need to stop. There was still a feeling that what he was doing was the right thing, and that he shouldn't stop. And that one fact alone outweighed everything else he felt.

"I already told you I've decided this is the right thing to do," Sorun said, slicing the blade horizontally and through the rip. The cross hanging in the air folding in on itself, turning into a dark, gaping hole in space. "You had a chance to prove me wrong. You lost. Live with it."

And that was Sorun all had to say on the matter. He didn't have an interest in arguing his point, didn't want to debate the matter. What use was there in arguing over the objective fact that he was right? So he'd simply walked through the portal, which shortly closed thereafter once Sorun crossed into it. Leaving Espio all alone, beaten and wounded amidst the unfathomable amount of viscera scattered all around him.

A/N- Alright, so here's where the comics got a bit weird with it. Regarding the pods the Iron Dominion wanted to toss people in to turn them into borg slaves, they called it being Legionized in the comics, we never actually see it happen. The closest we get is seeing Rotor dragged off to one and about to be thrown in before it's stopped, and you kinda assume that's that right after.

A few comics later, though, Sally and Mina are having a argument and there's a few pieces of dialogue that directly imply a few people were , in fact, thrown in those things offscreen. And it's never brought up again, nor do we ever actually get to see any of the victims which seems... you know, like a fairly significant plot point to just kind of ignore. I dunno, maybe they would have revealed they got fixed the same way they were building towards changing Sally back to normal after getting turned into a robot in the comics, but that plot thread's forever in the ground, so pfft ...

Maybe I'm not one to talk since I'm not showing what Sonic in the gang are doing in Yurashia, but in my defense they're canon events already told in the comic and I'm mainly sticking to Sorun's point of view here.

Also, thanks to a couple reviews informing me we got a single piece of fanart. By an artist named Velleity_Art. We did it, boys and girls, the one single desire any fanfic writer has. We reached the peak. Doesn't get better from here. I do think the artist made him look too cool, though. Sorun's a petty dick in this story's canon. I haven't been hiding this.